
The closing number of the programme was a quartet for piano and strings by Sinding, a composer strange to Boston. The quartet is a work of modern character, full of weird themes, all of which are admirably treated; especially is this so in the second movement, the andante.

The harmony in this movement is rich in grand effects. The last movement, allegro vivace, is full of difficulties in octave and scale passages for the piano.

Signor F. Busoni, pianist, assisted the quartette in this work. His playing was most conscientious throughout, and the delicate passages with which the work abounds were most daintily rendered. The three assisting performers ably seconded the pianist's artistic efforts.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XC., NO. 147.

TUESDAY, NOV. 24, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall, last evening, called out another fine audience of subscribing patrons and others, fully showing the strong following enjoyed by this most capable organization.

The programme was made with Mr. Kneisel's usual excellent good judgment, and included, as its several composition, the quartet in D major, No. 67, by Haydn; that in A major, op. 41, by Schumann, and the quintet in E minor by Sinding, an interesting novelty, in which Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, the pianist, gave his valuable assistance, his skill as a player in chamber music being delightfully prominent.

Mr. Kneisel and his associates of the quartet gave their best efforts, as usual, in their performances during the evening, and won well merited applause for all their good work.

TUESL
Union
The Kne cio Busoni, Union Ha being—
Haydn: Q
Schumann
Sinding;
The perf quartet wa playing th cially rema the Finale ment pass pane. The
The famili rably playe
But the h that, of the Sinding. T bears man Schumann itself some forte quint of the strin string qua pianoforte, the sort is d von Bronsa there are in four-p violin an but Sindin farther. H matter of c of the fou pretty plain work, if not invention—t to note a str of the first motiv in Ott of the Pilg together, a brilliant. M the part ca warm admir every point.
day evening

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1891.

DEATH IN THE TORNADO

Fatal Collapse of the New Metzerott Music Hall.

BURIED BENEATH THE RUINS

George White Killed and Two Young Women Injured.

DEMOLITION OF ONE OF THE GASOMETERS

Scenes of Alarm and Excitement in Many Parts of the City—Damages to Houses and Other Property to the Extent of $250,000.

One man with life crushed from him, two young women badly cut and bruised, and one man injured and the collapse of Metzerott's New Music Hall, on Twelfth street, near F, the ruin of one of the large gasometers of the Washington Gas Light Company, and thousands of dollars damage to other property were the effect yesterday of a storm, almost a tornado, which swept over this city.

It began at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon and ten minutes later the sky in the west was clear, and with another twenty minutes the sun was shining brightly from an almost cloudless sky. In five minutes the damage amounting to about $250,000 had been done. The dead man was George White, aged about fifty years, whose home was at No. 1511 Sixteenth street northwest, and who died in his place of business, No. 1112 F street. Near him, where they had been working together, were Ida White, aged eighteen, and Clara Grunberg, aged twenty years, of No. 32 L street. These were badly cut, and the least wounded was John Sullivan, aged 32, of No. 42 Twenty-third street.

Fitful showers had fallen all the morning, but shortly after noon the weather seemed inclined to clear, though a stiff breeze rising from the southeast set flags to fluttering and awnings to flapping. Under its influence apparently the light gray clouds began to bank in the West. Still few indications of a storm of any kind were given, save perhaps a slight sultriness just about the moment when the wind at 12:30 suddenly shifted to the southwest and started the clouds toward the city. They were not so much clouds as one big, long roll growing blacker and blacker as it advanced at the rate of sixty miles an hour, and fringing itself with an ominous green.

The middle of this roll was particularly angry looking and threatening, and from it came incessant dartings of lightning. As if a heavy pall had been drawn across the sky, there was a sudden darkening, broken by the frequen lightenings flashing immediately on the faces of observers, and with a rush and a roar in which were almost lost the reverberations of thunder, the cloud burst.

It was not rainfall, but was as if the cloud had been rent, sending forth its heavy hail and water, which were driven by the force of the wind in a horizontal direction. Occasionally, under even greater pressure, great sheets or pillars of the rain scudded along the street, dashing sharply against window panes and strewing the parking and driveways with faded leaves and broken limbs of trees.

Awnings were torn to tatters and window glasses and skylights were smashed, persons who had not found shelter were lifted from their feet and were unable to make headway against the storm, vehicles were tossed about like bits of straw, chimneys toppled and dashed upon the roofs, walls were thrown out of plumb, shutters were unhinged, and tin roofs were ripped from their fastenings and carried hundreds of feet away.

While the main force of the storm seemed to spend itself in Georgetown, and in the area between Seventeenth and Tenth streets below New York avenue, few sections of the city escaped injury to one extent or another. It was the most severe blow for Washington since the summer of 1888.

At the Weather Bureau the storm was described as having the nature of a tornado though lacking its intensity. It was due probably in the beginning to an unstable condition of the atmosphere, arising from the warm moist air of Sunday night and the early morning being up set, as it were, by the colder air from the north and west. The squall struck the bureau at 12:31 p. m. The wind vane oscillated from west to southwest to south and southest. At 12:36 about the time of maximum fury the wind was blowing from the south to the southwest.

Several flashes of lightning were noted, one in particular, accompanied with thunder at 12:34. At 12:37 a clear sky appeared on the western horizon, and within three minutes the sky was clear, with light cumuli clouds chasing along in the rear of the black status and numbus clouds. From the roof of the Weather Bureau a second squall was seen to pass from the South northeastward, apparently over the Capitol, at 12:50 p. m., while it was perfectly clear in the northwest section of the city.

[illegible] squall [illegible] occurred in the afternoon about 4 o'clock in the far Northwestern section. Probably, as is generally the case, a line could be traced from Washington, extending in a northeasterly direction beyond the Hudson River, along which squalls have occurred during the afternoon.

FALL OF METZEROTT'S HALL.

A Scene of Desolation, Wreck, Ruin, and Death on Twelfth Street.

Twelve men having finished their dinner had just returned to their task on the Metzerott building when the storm came upon them. Nine of them, iron-workers, were upon a platform near the top of the fifty-foot wall in the rear. Two bricklayers were near the top of the southeast corner, and a third bricklayer was on the front wall, which had been raised about twenty-five feet. The colored hodcarrier, the thirteenth man, had been taken sick a few moments before and had gone home, and his failure to appear after the accident led those who were unaware of his having left to believe that he was beneath the ruins.

Noticing the approach of the rain the workmen started to leave their elevated positions for shelter, but before they could do so the crash came. Two-thirds of the south wall fell into the building dragging part of the front wall with it. The bricklayer on the front jumped for his life and landed in a pile of sand in Twelfth street, escaping with a sprained ankle. Eight of the iron-workers were upon a ladder, and as they and the ninth, James Nalley, who was sitting on an iron-roof truss bolting it, saw the immense piles of scaffolding which filled the interior of the place sink to the first floor with the weight of the falling walls, and the heavy iron column intended to strengthen them, they knew that to let go meant a horrible and instant death. Nalley clung to the truss and went to the bottom with it, but escaped with a few slight scalp wounds.

The others on the ladder held to their positions, and of the eight John Sullivan was about the only one injured to any extent. They all made their way to the street in front of the building, where the roll was called, and all congratulated themselves on their narrow escape.

In the meantime the two bricklayers had been left on a swaying bit of scaffolding in the southeast corner of the ruin. Their support had been so closely shaven by the falling wall that a mortar-board hung half way over the edge. They, too, climbed from their perilous height, and joined the others who had escaped.

The building was ruined, all that was left standing of the walls being shattered and jarred by the concussion. In the walls at intervals of about twenty-five feet had been set the big iron columns, and the majority of these had toppled with the brickwork, the break occurring immediately at the edge of one of the columns, and being as clean cut as if it had been made with some huge knife or saw. Much of the debris of brick, mortar, shattered scantling and boards, ironwork, and the derrick were in a confused heap, resting partly on the joists of the first floor and partly in the cellar, while the front wall had broken off so sharply that nothing remained above the arch of the main doorway but the grotesquely-carved keystone, and the remnants of the scaffolding in front seemed ready to topple at any moment.

Nearly the whole of the north wall above the first floor had fallen, and its fall was what had lent fatality to the disaster. Between it and the buildings fronting on F street is a three-foot alley way. For some distance in from Twelfth street this alley was bridged by falling scantling, and the greater portion of the wall fell upon the rears of Nos. 1110 F street, occupied by W. G. Metzerott & Co., pianos, organs, &c.; No. 1112, by George White, ladies' tailor, and A. Gude & Bro., florists, and 1114 and 1116, by Strasburger's Sons, clothiers. The rear of the first building was two stories high, and of the other two buildings but one story high. All were crushed in, the greatest weight probably falling upon the middle of the three, and there was where death came with the crash.

That others were not killed is due, perhaps, to the demolition of the immense panes of glass in the "Glass of Fashion." According to Mr. O. W. White, this happened a moment or so before the fall of the wall, as he and his clerk, who were on the floor above the clothiers, were able to escape through the rear of the building and the narrow alley before the catastrope. The smashing glass attracted the attention of the employes in Gude & Bro.'s store, and they, by running to the front to see what was the matter, escaped the falling wall. A strange feature of the affair was that the big, heavy plate windows in front of Gude & Bro.'s and White's were hurled from their frames to the pavement by the concussion.

Inspector of Buildings Entwisle, after a hasty examination of the ruins, said that no blame could be attached to the contractor. "You see," he began, "they were green walls, and the front was only built up to the second story, leaving two walls towering above. Now, all green walls are liable to give way, no matter how thick. These were eighteen inches in thickness and fifty feet in height. The interior was nothing but scaffolding, and, therefore, it was nothing more than a skeleton with the iron roof ready to put on. If the latter had been in place the accident could not have occurred, but as it was the walls came down for want of being pinned by the roof. The rear wall of the building, you will notice, saved a portion of the south wall on account of its being connected with it, and if the roof had been on the entire building would have been unharmed. Any building would have been likely to be blown down in the same condition as this one.

The Commissioners ordered the inspector of buildings to make a rigid inspection and report to them at his earliest opportunity. Engineer Commissioner Rossell procured several samples of the mortar and cement used in the building and will have an analysis made as to the quality of the ingredients.

The Commissioners are determined to do everything in their power to have a full investigation made and to place the blame, if any.

William S. Plager was the contractor for the erection of the entire building, with the exception of a few minor items that would probably amount to $5,000. Eight proposals were made for the construction of the hall. Plager was the lowest bidder at $45,365. The other bids averaged [illegible]

[illegible] Metzerott, who was joined by Mrs. Henrietta Metzerott in the afternoon, could not estimate the loss on his building and stock exactly. Twenty-five pianos in the rear of the first floor, and about the same number of organs on the second floor, are probably ruined, as well as the rear of the F-street building.

Two thousand dollars will probably cover the damage to buildings Nos. 1112, 1114, and 1116. Gude & Brother's loss is comparatively slight, and Mr. Strasburger estimated his loss at $20,000. The latter said he was insured, but did not know exactly whether fire insurance would cover the case, as there had been no damage done his stock by fire.

MANY TO THE RESCUE.

Prompt Service by the Fire Department and the Police.

When the crash came Dr. William V. Marmion was standing at his office door close by watching the exciting scenes on F street. The elements were making such a tremendous noise, he said to a reporter of THE POST, that he did not hear the crash, but in an instant afterward he appreciated the situation, and with Mr. R. A. Parke went into White's and began the work of endeavoring to rescue those whose groans could be heard, though they were far beneath the surface of the mass of debris. Dr. Marmion heard cries of a man and of women, but soon the cry of the man was stilled forever. In the meantime an alarm had been turned in through the district box by Mrs. Ada Hazelrigg, who has a dressmaking establishment on the second floor of No. 1112 F street.

The alarm brought engine companies Nos. 2, 6, and 7, truck C, and the chemical engine. There was little for the engines to do, but the men of the companies all fell to work with hooks, picks, shovels, and saws to save the sufferers. They were later re-enforced by some laborers on a sewer, who were detailed by Commissioner Rossell. The District Commissioners were in board session when Dr. Tindall, having been notified through the telephone by a POST reporter, announced the catastrophe to them. All three, Messrs. Douglass, Ross, and Rossell hurried to the scene, and there met Maj. Moore and Chief Parris directing the work of their respective departments.

As soon as possible ropes were stretched on Twelfth and F streets to keep from all danger the immense crowds of men, women, and children who came thronging to the locality from all directions. This prevented for a time the passage of the street cars, which were kept moving, however, by jumping the track and turning around. The windows of the stores in the neighborhood were packed with people, who held their positions as long as they thought anything new could be seen, and in safety were much interested in the alarmed surging of the mass of humanity below them whenever space had to be made to allow the passing of the patrol or ambulance wagons, or when occasionally the wind, still blowing heavily, came with a sudden gust, causing swaying bits of scaffolding to fall, or nearly tearing from its fastenings the bit of awning at the southeast corner of F and and Tenth streets.

Inside of White's establishment the men were hard at their work, interference being prevented by a large force of police under the immediate direction of Lieut. Amiss, of the First precinct.

The digging had not progressed far when Miss Clara Grunberg was relieved of the great weight which had been oppressing her, and, bruised and cut, was carried to the Emergency Hospital, and afterward sent to her home. She could not make herself understood in English, but to questions in German by Dr. Marmion she said that beneath her was "the boss and two other girls."

Not long after she had been found the moans of Miss Ida White revealed her presence, but as soon as she saw daylight she recovered what proved to be superb nerve. She was lying with her lower limbs bent at the knee and an immense pile of bricks and mortar on her body, but to her rescuers she told of her position, directed their work, and expressed relief as it progressed. She is hardly twenty years old, but displayed magnificent self-control, and was sent to her home.

Near the bottom of the pile was at last discovered the body of George White. His arm was first seen, but it was pulseless, and in all probability he had been dead an hour and a half, and his were the groans heard by Dr. Marmion. The man's face was mashed terribly on the right side, and it was covered by the workmen while they released the body, which was also crushed on the trunk from the bricks, iron rods, and bits of wood which held it down.

Coroner Patterson had been carefully watching the body, and as soon as it was borne on a stretcher, covered with white cloth, to the ambulance, he summoned a jury consisting of J. H. Howarth, builder; William H. Goodacre, Charles E. Brown, George W. Miller, painter; J. D. Whitacre and John E. Nicles, painter.

They gathered around the open back of the white-topped ambulance, and while the hundreds of persons near them raised on tip-toe and tried to see the body, they were sworn as they stood bare-headed in the street, and adjourned to meet at the First precinct at 11 o'clock to-day, being advised by the coroner to make thorough examination of the building, and gather what facts they could to aid them in returning a verdict.

To the officials outside had been added Inspector of Buildings Entwisle and Sub-inspector Holmes, Inspector of Plumbing S. A. Robinson, and others, and they discussed among themselves the appearance of the building and the possibility of others being still beneath the ruins.

All kinds of rumors had been afloat, the most exaggerated, perhaps, being that thirty persons were killed. Another story with some foundation was that a colored man, George Hawkins, had been caught under the wall. His reappearance in the vicinity about an hour and a half later dispelled this illusion, but still the remark of Clara Grunberg that two other girls were in the ruins led the firemen to continue digging, even after they learned that a younger sister of Miss White had run from the building when the crash came. It was thought that perhaps some bodies might be in the cellar. The only means of reaching this place was by tearing up the lights on the sidewalk. Fireman W. B. Handy, with his head bandaged with a handkerchief, as a falling brick had cut him, opened a way with his pick, and, returning after an exploration of the cellar, reported that no one was there.

It was 4 o'clock then, and the crowd outside the ropes was augmented by employes of the Departments, to whom, as to nearly everybody in the city, had come the news of the catastrophe within an hour after it happened. Among those who appeared after the two girls had been saved was the father of Clara Grunberg. He had heard the exaggerated reports, and came expecting to find his girl a corpse. As he, also, did not seem to comprehend fully the English language, it was some time before his notion was corrected. He walked around hurriedly without the ropes, where, amid a cloud of dust, the picks and shovels were clinking against the broken bricks. For a time he was oblivions of his surroundings and tore at the sides of his head and beat the air with his hands in a most violent manner. Finally Dr. Marmion managed to explain to him that his daughter had been sent to the Emergency Hospital, not very severely injured, he thought, and the old gentleman left somewhat relieved in mind.

The search was continued until darkness came, and then it was the conviction of all that no one remained in the ruins, and the work ceased.

[illegible]

THE BIG STORM

tigating the Collapse of the Metzerott Music Hall.

THE KILLING OF GEORGE WHITE

Coroner Patterson and a Jury Hear Testimony of Expert Inspectors and Builders—Condition of the Two Women Who Were Rescued.

Nearly everybody who was able in Washington visited yesterday the scene of the tornado-wrecked Metzerott's Hall, and at no time during daylight was there not a crowd in Twelfth street or in F street where the wreck could be seen. Every thinking person who studied the ruin and considered its suddeness and completeness was impressed by the marvelous character of the escapes which had been made by the men within the building proper, and the two young women who were dug from the mass of debris a short distance from the place where George White had the life crushed out of him.

He was fifty-one years old, a native of Hungary, and had lived in Washington between fifteen and twenty years. His funeral, which will be private, will take place this morning from his late home, No. 1511 Sixteenth street northwest. A widow, one son, and four daughters survive him, and as the family is said to need relief, a fund was started for this purpose.

One of the daughters, Miss Ida White, who was so cool amid the ruins, is badly bruised, besides having her ankle twisted. She is suffering intensely, and it is supposed that some internal injury was done her. Miss Clara Grunberg, the other injured woman, has no bones broken, but her wounds are very painful.

All persons who were thought to have been within the ruins have now been accounted for, and Lieut. Amiss stated that no inquiries were being made for missing persons, and there was certainty that all had been recovered. In the three stores which had been damaged workmen were engaged all day trying to save some of the goods from the rubbish, and Mr. Strasburger was having those in his place shipped to his temporary place of business.

Mr. Frank B. Metzerott, who has arranged for a temporary stand for his place of business, was at the F street store early in the morning and watched a force of workmen clear away the fallen and splintered rafters under which lay the fragments of costly pianos and organs. Mr. Metzerott said that he could not form the least estimate of the loss on either the building or the stock. He had but recently received several new and costly pianos, and in addition to those crushed in the rear, it is thought that some temporary damage was done by the dust to those in the front of the building. Mr. Metzerott said that as soon as possible the work of rebuilding the hall would begin.

Next to Mr. Metzerott probably the persons who feel the loss of the new music hall most keenly are the members of the Choral Society, who expected the use of the hall for their concerts. They are all at sea as to what they shall do in regard to the programme which they had prepared for the season, and nothing definite will be known, it is thought, until some little communication has been had with Mr. Walter Damrosch, who has been conducting the rehearsals of the Choral Society. The extensive programmes of other musical organizations, which were to be features of the coming season, will all be subject to some modifications; but music lovers hope that arrangements may be made to carry them out as nearly as possible on the original lines.

At 11 o'clock Coroner Patterson began at the First precinct station the inquest into the death of George White. It involved of course the question of the construction of the new music hall, and the witnesses examined were experts to one extent or another in the building line. Coroner Patterson is determined to have the inquest as thorough as possible, and consequently, after an hour or more spent with the experts, the jury was adjourned until Friday morning at 11 o'clock. The members of the jury, who had been summoned on Monday and given opportunity to view the ruin, seemed inclined to probe the problem to the bottom, and more than once asked leading questions of interest. The jurymen were J. H. Howarth, John [illegible] Miles, G. W. Miller, Charles E. Brown, William H. Goodacre, and Joseph D. Whitaker.

Building Inspector Entwisle said that the walls of the music hall were eighteen inches thick, and quite thick enough. As the walls were green, they could not be expected to withstand such a gale. Scaffolding braced the building, which was as strong as it could be until the roof could be put on. But even had cement been used the walls could not have withstood such a wind. It was simply a [illegible] that a gale of sixty miles an hour should strike walls of that height just before the roof was put on. No fault could be found in the construction of the walls, and the fact that the side walls went up before the front wall did not weaken them, as is seen by the fact that the break occurred in the middle of the wall. A section of the side walls might have been held by the front, but nothing could save them all in such a storm. He had not inspected the building while it was being constructed, but his assistant [illegible]. He himself, however, had examined the walls since the accident, and found [illegible] had been raised according to the [illegible] as to thickness. They were [illegible] thick up to the first story and [illegible] inches above that.

[illegible] C. King, assistant inspector, [illegible] that as he had inspected the building [illegible] of intervals he was satisfied that [illegible] piece of work. The accident [illegible] the result of the blowing of [illegible] no evidence of defective [illegible]. A piece of plaster [illegible] from the side wall [illegible]

[illegible] inspected to the letter. In a music hall this might all be regarded as one story. Some support was afforded by the staging and scaffolding, and if the girders had been in place they might, perhaps, have held the walls. The scaffolding within the building tended to press out the north wall.

Mr. Frank L. Hanvey, builder, could not say what the ruling of the inspectors would be as to the definition of a story. Though the building would probably have been stouter had the front wall been completed, he could not say that this would have made it strong enough to stand against such wind pressure. In reply to a question by a juror Mr. Hanvey said that he would not have dared to run the walls up so high without bracing them. In support of his opinion that there was some fault in the construction of the building he called attention to the setting into the walls of the upright iron columns connected by tie beams. He had known of a number of cases of side walls being built before the front ones. Sometimes inspectors put a stop to this and sometimes they did not, though the building regulations on this point were mandatory. If the inspector did his duty he thought the regulations should be followed. This particular building, though, might be considered a one-story one, but he did not know whether the building regulations specified the number of feet to a story.

Mr. Charles A. Langley also considered the construction faulty, principally because of the insertion of the iron pillars. The building should have been braced better, and lime mortar should not have been used. Moreover, old bricks, which have not the same adhesive power as new ones, had been used. But he did not believe that any green wall, no matter how thick, could have withstood the wind's force.

Mr. W. S. Plager, the contractor, said that his work on the hall had been done according to the specifications. In talking with the inspector about the Z pillars he had expressed a preference for brick pilasters, but the inspector had said he could find no fault with the Z bars. Mr Plager thought the scaffolding afforded material support to the walls. He had allowed the side walls to go up much more rapidly because of delay in gettin the terra cotta to be used in the front.

Among the witnesses to be heard Friday are Fava, Naeff & Co., Mr. Somers, their draughtsman, and other building experts.

Minor details of the damage in different parts of the city were swapped all day, and there was hardly a person whose house had not felt the effects of the storm or who did not know of somebody's else house being damaged.

Inspector of Buildings Entwisle stated that he was engaged in making an investigation and would wait until after the verdict of the coroner's jury before making a report. "I will be ready to submit my findings to the Commissioners as soon as the verdict is rendered," he said.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Given at Infantry Hall Before a Large Audience.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder and Mrs. Nikisch the Evening's Soloists.

The concert at Infantry hall last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra was far from being the genuine musical treat the 2,000 or more people present had reason and right to expect. The program was not a model one, nor fully in accord with popular preference.

The initial number was Schumann's symphony No. 3, one of the most picturesque and melodious of his works, and a specimen of descriptive scoring with few equals. The first and the third movements were perhaps the best executed, though none were played with any too much care. The tendency of the orchestra seemed to be to rush precipitately through the very measures that ought to have been given the most thoughtful and graceful treatment; and in numerous places there was clear evidence of roughness and indifference. To the critics the music was below the orchestra's own standard.

The intermezzo from "Cavelleria Rusticana" was sweetly played. Weber's "Euryanthe" closed the concert.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was heard for the first time here as a 'cello soloist, and it is a pleasure to record the success he achieved. He was encored and then recalled, and probably the audience would willingly have sat under the spell created by his bow for a long time without weariness. His tones were charmingly limpid and mellifluous, his delicate touches were captivating and his technique and expression were admirable.

Mrs. Nikisch was the vocalist of the occasion. She sang "Mignon" and three short songs by Schumann, Strauss and Brahms, respectively, but her work called for little commendation.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11-24

The next subscription concert of the College of Music promises to be an extraordinary musical feast. Not only because Lillian Nordica will be heard, but also on account of the appearance of Signor Albino Gorno in a brilliant programme of piano selections. Signor Gorno is a musician as well as a virtuoso. His technique reaches a high degree of excellence, and his phrasing is as clear-cut as a new blade. Among other things he will interpret the brilliant transcription of the Kermess music from [illegible]'s Faust, by Saint-Saens.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,

NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Famous Boston Orchestra and Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Schroeder, in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening, under the direction of its great conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The large audience, representing art-loving and musically inclined residents of the city and vicinity, was not entirely satisfied with what Mr. Nikisch and his coterie of players had to offer on this occasion. Somehow the concert was not as interesting as others given here, so far as the orchestra is concerned, but the solo numbers by Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder made a deep and delightful impression, which evened up the symphony work and altogether made a pleasurable evening. The applause bestowed upon the soloists was spontaneous, and they were made to feel perfectly at ease by unmistakable manifestations of appreciation and kindly consideration. Mrs. Nikisch appeared nervous during her first effort, for the music sheet trembled perceptibly in her hand, but after she had made her third bow, in acknowledging the fervor of her hearers, she retired feeling that she was with friends. Mr. Schroeder quickly demonstrated that he had masterly command of his violoncello. The concert began with the orchestra's presentation of Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97. This, the last of Schumann's four beautiful symphonies, is looked upon by a great many, in fact, the majority of musicians, as the most remarkable of his creations, not so much for the instrumentation, which is quite as brilliant as in all his symphonies, as for the religious depth and understanding displayed which, interspersed as it is by bright snatches of national melodies, tend to make this work capricious to a degree. The first movement, "Vivace," opens vigorously with the full orchestra, rising and falling in little undulating waves of melody, until the motive with the strings is dropped to be taken up by the woods and violas with a running accompaniment from the violas and 'cellos. One characteristic of Schumann, the sudden transition from one key to another, entirely foreign to the first, is remarked in this first movement. An abrupt close with full orchestra forms a fitting introduction to the second charming little "Schezo" movement. In the first chords, one recognizes the measured time of the stately minuet, in fact, one can almost see those old-time lords and ladies slowly walking through this most charming dance of by-gone days. Throughout the melody, which is sustained by the woods, the strings are rippling through charming little staccato runs, so pianssimo that at times it is nothing more than a sigh. The second part of this movement is not quite so easy of understanding, but is made interesting by reason of its fugue nature. The third, an "Andante" movement, is perhaps the most charming of all, in a strictly musical point of view. It seems to be more of a deep revery than a connected melody, and the absence of all noise, together with the extremely quiet way in which the motive is introduced, first by the violins, followed by the violas and cellos, serves to deepen the impression. The movement opens with a little song of thankfulness, quaint in the extreme, which gradually lapses into a rapid, joyous melody inexpressibly charming, its contrast to the foregoing movements adding to the effect attained. Then comes the grand religious movement, which makes this symphony so famous. The motive is introduced by the trombones which have hitherto played but a little part in the composition. At the first sound of these instruments with the rich accompaniment of full orchestra, the impression which one forms is that of the grand, deep tones of an organ, which illusion is kept up to the end. Schumann composed this wonderful work knowing and feeling that the germs of insanity were slowly, but surely eating his life away, and some of the strains of this "movement religiose" are so wild and weird as can only be the outcome of a diseased mind. Here, as in the first "vivace," his abrupt change of key is frequently noticed. The "vivace," last movement, serves to effectually disperse all feelings of depression which the fourth part unconsciously created. Supposed to represent a holiday amongst the peasantry the several motives throughout are composed of little snatches of national melody, introduced with almost unexampled freshness and brilliancy of style. Here also one finds that a greater part of the work devolves upon the strings. The movement is hastened toward the end, making a brilliant finale. The first movement of this symphony as given by the Orchestra last evening did not quite come up to expectation. Something like listlessness, if not indifference, seemed to have possession of the players, and the impression of inattentiveness, perhaps, did not entirely fade all the evening. The "Molto Moderato" was attacked with more firmness, but it fell off into too slow a tempo, a defect prominent in the opening "vivace." The orchestra roused itself in the "Religiose" movement, which was rendered with telling effect, and the closing "vivace" received good treatment. The applause which supplemented the opening work was given as a matter of course to this representative band of artists, but it lacked the true ring of complete satisfaction. The second orchestra number, Mascagni's beautiful intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," already well enough known to musical patrons to be taken, like other popular works, as an addition of the hand organ repertory, appeared to lack volume where so many fine players were employed in its interpretation. Nevertheless, it was one of the enjoyable things on the programme, and received strict attention from every one. This was largely due, no doubt, to the fact that it is very much talked and written about just now.

The last number on the programme, Weber's overture, the "Euranthe," was fully appreciated. This grand romantic opera was first properly produced in America in 1887, and has not yet lost the favorable impression made at that time. Perhaps if the orchestra had another hour's sitting the impression of listlessness would have been obliterated, judging from the spirited and excellent exposition of Weber's rich, varied and grand dramatic overture. Mr. Nikisch's energy was aroused, and his associates felt the thrill of his magnetism and impelling force.

Mrs. Nikisch is already known and appreciated by Providence audiences, as was manifested on her appearance last evening. She possesses a mezzo-soprano of rare quality and scope, her lower notes, full and pure as a contralto, and her upper tones clear as a bell. Liszt's song from "Mignon" is entirely adapted to her voice, which is rather dramatic. The perfect ease with which she poured forth her flood of song, her true intonation and artistic impulses place her with the foremost vocalists. Her rendering of the song with orchestral accompaniment was noble and thoroughly gratifying. She infused so [illegible] Schumann and Strauss [illegible] in [illegible], were charmingly sung, while the sweet little "Staendchen," by Brahms, was charming. Mrs. Nikisch was artistically accompanied on the piano by her husband.

Mr. Schroder is a marvellous player. His interpretation of Bach's "Sarabande," showed a great depth and delicacy of feeling, while the two little things by Sil and Popper respectively (both living composers), were beautifully rendered. In response to repeated recalls he played a little Tarantella by B. Crossman, with wonderful staccato effects. His 'cello playing was the triumph of the evening.

The next concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday, evening, Dec. 16.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestra has not played so well all through any other programme of this season as on Saturday evening last. The programme was preposterously long, and hardly half of the audience heard the last movement of the Symphony, which was not begun until nearly ten o'clock. But the band kept up its interest and was attentive, and Mr. Nikisch was unusually apt in his reading and steady in control. Two new works were given, of which the first was the overture to that "Roi d'Ys" opera by Lalo, which is so highly esteemed in Europe. The theme of the opera is an old Breton legend of enchantment, mystery, fatal fascination and tragic punishment, in which the charms of reckless beauty, the spells of magic and demoniac wrath and power all have their place. This overture is a fit prelude to such a story if romantically and poetically told. Its colors are rich and full, now sombrely dark, now nobly brilliant; its figures are strong in shape and suggestive in character, sometimes pulsing and roaring dully like the devouring sea, sometimes gay with the trumpets of triumph and sometimes sweet with festivity and love revels; its instrumentation is often unusual and bold, always picturesque and fanciful, and the impression it leaves is one of present delight and desire for a better acquaintance. The other work was the suite for solo violin and orchestra, which Mr. C. M. Loeffler wrote last summer and led on this occasion. He calls it "Veillées d'Ukraine," after the tales which inspired it, and the theme of treatment is Russian. The movements are four—an Introduction and Pastoral, a Rune, a Dumka and a Finale. It is thoroughly and elegantly written and there is a good deal of "meat" in its material—such a work as could have been written by none but a sensitive spirit speaking through a rich musical vocabulary. Considering that it traverses one line of thought, however, it is perhaps too long, and the general listener will recur to the first movement with most pleasure. On one account the suite must fail of the effect which one would naturally expect from the ingeniousness and quietude of the scoring, unless it can be played by some violinist whose tone is more sonorous and vehement than Mr. Loeffler's. He has given a prominent place to the English horn, which is constantly moving with the solo instrument; but that peculiar wood voice frequently overpowers the strings; and so, though the combination is theoretically right, it is practically wrong. Mr. Loeffler had an amazingly ardent reception—a welcome after his long grave illness of last season—and his work was greatly applauded. The "Lenore" symphony of Raff was the other orchestral work and had first-rate handling. Miss Marguerite Hall sang, and her lovely voice and fine method were enjoyed by those who were not too far from her; for Music Hall swallows up a voice no larger than hers. Her selections were an elaborate orchestral setting by Mr. Henschel of the well-known verses, "There was an Ancient King," which was about as entertaining as an algebraic demonstration, and three songs of Schubert. These, delightfully accompanied by Mr. Nikisch, gave much more pleasure, "An der Leyer" eliciting special approbation.

For tonight a programme of three solid instrumental pieces testifies newly to Mr. Nikisch's judgment in such matters. It begins with Gluck's "Iphigenia" overture and ends with Schubert's C-major symphony, between which will be placed Brahms's D-major violin concerto, to be led by Mr. Adolph Brodsky, Mr. Damrosch's new concert-master, whose appearances in New York have elicited the highest encomiums.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The second Kneisel Quartette concert presented in the piano quintette of the young Norwegian, Sinding, a remarkable and delightful composition—a richer, stronger and more individual work than any other recent example of chamber-music. It is full of melodies, clear, distinctive, fascinating and (what interests the musician most) easily useful for development. The treatment is no less various, free and happy, whether considered as science or as sound; for while the polyphony is so fluent, so full and so constant that one is amazed to find a quintette suggesting so decidedly a small orchestra, the ear of the layman is enchanted by a music which he can follow without perplexity or fatigue. The work was exquisitely rendered, Mr. Busoni taking the piano part with entire felicity of touch and temper and complete apprehension of phrase and emphasis. The quartette also played unexceptionably well Haydn's quartette in D and Schumann's in A, op. 41, No. 3, which, being given in that order, led up gradually to the Sinding.

[61]

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 23, 1891.

AFTER THE BIG STORM

Investigating the Collapse of the Metzerott Music Hall.

THE KILLING OF GEORGE WHITE

Coroner Patterson and a Jury Hear Testimony of Expert Inspectors and Builders—Condition of the Two Women Who Were Rescued.

Nearly everybody who was able in Washington visited yesterday the scene of the tornado-wrecked Metzerott's Hall, and at no time during daylight was there not a crowd in Twelfth street or in F street where the wreck could be seen. Every thinking person who studied the ruin and considered its suddeness and completeness was impressed by the marvelous character of the escapes which had been made by the men within the building proper, and the two young women who were dug from the mass of debris a short distance from the place where George White had the life crushed out of him.

He was fifty-one years old, a native of Hungary, and had lived in Washington between fifteen and twenty years. His funeral, which will be private, will take place this morning from his late home, No. 1511 Sixteenth street northwest. A widow, one son, and four daughters survive him, and as the family is said to need relief, a fund was started for this purpose.

One of the daughters, Miss Ida White, who was so cool amid the ruins, is badly bruised, besides having her ankle twisted. She is suffering intensely, and it is supposed that some internal injury was done her. Miss Clara Grunberg, the other injured woman, has no bones broken, but her wounds are very painful.

All persons who were thought to have been within the ruins have now been accounted for, and Lieut. Amiss stated that no inquiries were being made for missing persons, and there was certainty that all had been recovered. In the three stores which had been damaged workmen were engaged all day trying to save some of the goods from the rubbish, and Mr. Strasburger was having those in his place shipped to his temporary place of business.

Mr. Frank B. Metzerott, who has arranged for a temporary stand for his place of business, was at the F street store early in the morning and watched a force of workmen clear away the fallen and splintered rafters under which lay the fragments of costly pianos and organs. Mr. Metzerott said that he could not form the least estimate of the loss on either the building or the stock. He had but recently received several new and costly pianos, and in addition to those crushed in the rear, it is thought that some temporary damage was done by the dust to those in the front of the building. Mr. Metzerott said that as soon as possible the work of rebuilding the hall would begin.

Next to Mr. Metzerott probably the persons who feel the loss of the new music hall most keenly are the members of the Choral Society, who expected the use of the hall for their concerts. They are all at sea as to what they shall do in regard to the programme which they had prepared for the season, and nothing definite will be known, it is thought, until some little communication has been had with Mr. Walter Damrosch, who has been conducting the rehearsals of the Choral Society. The extensive programmes of other musical organizations, which were to be features of the coming season, will all be subject to some modifications; but music lovers hope that arrangements may be made to carry them out as nearly as possible on the original lines.

At 11 o'clock Coroner Patterson began at the First precinct station the inquest into the death of George White. It involved of course the question of the construction of the new music hall, and the witnesses examined were experts to one extent or another in the building line. Coroner Patterson is determined to have the inquest as thorough as possible, and consequently, after an hour or more spent with the experts, the jury was adjourned until Friday morning at 11 o'clock. The members of the jury, who had been summoned on Monday and given opportunity to view the ruin, seemed inclined to probe the problem to the bottom, and more than once asked leading questions of interest. The jurymen were J. H. Howarth, John E. Miles, G. W. Miller, Charles E. Brown, William H. Goodacre, and Joseph D. Whitaker.

Building Inspector Entwisle said that the walls of the music hall were eighteen inches thick, and quite thick enough. As the walls were green, they could not be expected to withstand such a gale. Scaffolding braced the building, which was as strong as it could be until the roof could be put on. But even had cement been used the walls could not have withstood such a wind. It was simply a chance that a gale of sixty miles an hour should strike walls of that height just before the roof was put on. No fault could be found in the construction of the walls, and the fact that the side walls went up before the front wall did not weaken them, as is seen by the fact that the break occurred in the middle of the wall. A section of the side walls might have been held by the front, but nothing could save them all in such a storm. He had not inspected the building while it was being constructed, but his assistant did. He himself, however, had examined the walls since the accident, and found they had been raised according to the regulations as to thickness. They were two feet thick up to the first story and eighteen inches above that.

Mr. B. C. King, assistant inspector, said that as he had inspected the building at frequent intervals he was satisfied that it was a good piece of work. The accident was simply the result of the blowing of the wind, and no evidence of defective work existed anywhere. A piece of plaster picked up at random from the side wall he characterized as of superior quality. His [illegible] Mr. Entwisle. Asked by jurors about the regulations, he said that the rule that forbids the erection of walls more than a story above the front was interpreted to the letter. In a music hall this might all be regarded as one story. Some support was afforded by the staging and scaffolding, and if the girders had been in place they might, perhaps, have held the walls. The scaffolding within the building tended to press out the north wall.

Mr. Frank L. Hanvey, builder, could not say what the ruling of the inspectors would be as to the definition of a story. Though the building would probably have been stouter had the front wall been completed, he could not say that this would have made it strong enough to stand against such wind pressure. In reply to a question by a juror Mr. Hanvey said that he would not have dared to run the walls up so high without bracing them. In support of his opinion that there was some fault in the construction of the building he called attention to the setting into the walls of the upright iron columns connected by tie beams. He had known of a number of cases of side walls being built before the front ones. Sometimes inspectors put a stop to this and sometimes they did not, though the building regulations on this point were mandatory. If the inspector did his duty he thought the regulations should be followed. This particular building, though, might be considered a one-story one, but he did not know whether the building regulations specified the number of feet to a story.

Mr. Charles A. Langley also considered the construction faulty, principally because of the insertion of the iron pillars. The building should have been braced better, and lime mortar should not have been used. Moreover, old bricks, which have not the same adhesive power as new ones, had been used. But he did not believe that any green wall, no matter how thick, could have withstood the wind's force.

Mr. W. S. Plager, the contractor, said that his work on the hall had been done according to the specifications. In talking with the inspector about the Z pillars he had expressed a preference for brick pilasters, but the inspector had said he could find no fault with the Z bars. Mr. Plager thought the scaffolding afforded material support to the walls. He had allowed the side walls to go up much more rapidly because of delay in gettin the terra cotta to be used in the front.

Among the witnesses to be heard Friday are Fava, Naeff & Co., Mr. Somers, their draughtsman, and other building experts.

Minor details of the damage in different parts of the city were swapped all day, and there was hardly a person whose house had not felt the effects of the storm or who did not know of somebody's else house being damaged.

Inspector of Buildings Entwisle stated that he was engaged in making an investigation and would wait until after the verdict of the coroner's jury before making a report. "I will be ready to submit my findings to the Commissioners as soon as the verdict is rendered," he said.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Given at Infantry Hall Before a Large Audience.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder and Mrs. Nikisch the Evening's Soloists.

The concert at Infantry hall last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra was far from being the genuine musical treat the 2,000 or more people present had reason and right to expect. The program was not a model one, nor fully in accord with popular preference.

The initial number was Schumann's symphony No. 3, one of the most picturesque and melodious of his works, and a specimen of descriptive scoring with few equals. The first and the third movements were perhaps the best executed, though none were played with any too much care. The tendency of the orchestra seemed to be to rush precipitately through the very measures that ought to have been given the most thoughtful and graceful treatment; and in numerous places there was clear evidence of roughness and indifference. To the critics the music was below the orchestra's own standard.

The intermezzo from "Cavelleria Rusticana" was sweetly played. Weber's "Euryanthe" closed the concert.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was heard for the first time here as a 'cello soloist, and it is a pleasure to record the success he achieved. He was encored and then recalled, and probably the audience would willingly have sat under the spell created by his bow for a long time without weariness. His tones were charmingly limpid and mellifluous, his delicate touches were captivating and his technique and expression were admirable.

Mrs. Nikisch was the vocalist of the occasion. She sang "Mignon" and three short songs by Schumann, Strauss and Brahms, respectively, but her work called for little commendation.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11-24

The next subscription concert of the College of Music promises to be an extraordinary musical feast. Not only because Lillian Nordica will be heard, but also on account of the appearance of Signor Albino Gorno in a brilliant programme of piano selections. Signor Gorno is a musician as well as a virtuoso. His technique reaches a high degree of excellence, and his phrasing is as clear-cut as a new blade. Among other things he will interpret the brilliant transcription of the Kermess music from Gounod's Faust, by Saint Saens.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Famous Boston Orchestra and Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Schroeder, in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening, under the direction of its great conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The large audience, representing art-loving and musically inclined residents of the city and vicinity, was not entirely satisfied with what Mr. Nikisch and his coterie of players had to offer on this occasion. Somehow the concert was not as interesting as others given here, so far as the orchestra is concerned, but the solo numbers by Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder made a deep and delightful impression, which evened up the symphony work and altogether made a pleasurable evening. The applause bestowed upon the soloists was spontaneous, and they were made to feel perfectly at ease by unmistakable manifestations of appreciation and kindly consideration. Mrs. Nikisch appeared nervous during her first effort, for the music sheet trembled perceptibly in her hand, but after she had made her third bow, in acknowledging the fervor of her hearers, she retired feeling that she was with friends. Mr. Schroeder quickly demonstrated that he had masterly command of his violoncello. The concert began with the orchestra's presentation of Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97. This, the last of Schumann's four beautiful symphonies, is looked upon by a great many, in fact, the majority of musicians, as the most remarkable of his creations, not so much for the instrumentation, which is quite as brilliant as in all his symphonies, as for the religious depth and understanding displayed which, interspersed as it is by bright snatches of national melodies, tend to make this work capricious to a degree. The first movement, "Vivace," opens vigorously with the full orchestra, rising and falling in little undulating waves of melody, until the motive with the strings is dropped to be taken up by the woods and violas with a running accompaniment from the violas and 'cellos. One characteristic of Schumann, the sudden transition from one key to another, entirely foreign to the first, is remarked in this first movement. An abrupt close with full orchestra forms a fitting introduction to the second charming little "Schezo" movement. In the first chords, one recognizes the measured time of the stately minuet, in fact, one can almost see those old-time lords and ladies slowly walking through this most charming dance of by-gone days. Throughout the melody, which is sustained by the woods, the strings are rippling through charming little staccato runs, so pianissimo that at times it is nothing more than a sigh. The second part of this movement is not quite so easy of understanding, but is made interesting by reason of its fugue nature. The third, an "Andante" movement, is perhaps the most charming of all, in a strictly musical point of view. It seems to be more of a deep revery than a connected melody, and the absence of all noise, together with the extremely quiet way in which the motive is introduced, first by the violins, followed by the violas and cellos, serves to deepen the impression. The movement opens with a little song of thankfulness, quaint in the extreme, which gradually lapses into a rapid, joyous melody inexpressibly charming, its contrast to the foregoing movements adding to the effect attained. Then comes the grand religious movement, which makes this symphony so famous. The motive is introduced by the trombones which have hitherto played but a little part in the composition. At the first sound of these instruments with the rich accompaniment of full orchestra, the impression which one forms is that of the grand, deep tones of an organ, which illusion is kept up to the end. Schumann composed this wonderful work knowing and feeling that the germs of insanity were slowly, but surely eating his life away, and some of the strains of this "movement religioso" are so wild and weird as can only be the outcome of a diseased mind. Here, as in the first "vivace," his abrupt change of key is frequently noticed. The "vivace," last movement, serves to effectually disperse all feelings of depression which the fourth part unconsciously created. Supposed to represent a holiday amongst the peasantry the several motives throughout are composed of little snatches of national melody, introduced with almost unexampled freshness and brilliancy of style. Here also one finds that a greater part of the work devolves upon the strings. The movement is hastened toward the end, making a brilliant finale. The first movement of this symphony as given by the Orchestra last evening did not quite come up to expectation. Something like listlessness, if not indifference, seemed to have possession of the players, and the impression of inattentiveness, perhaps, did not entirely fade all the evening. The "Molto Moderato" was attacked with more firmness, but it fell off into too slow a tempo, a defect prominent in the opening "vivace." The orchestra roused itself in the "Religiose" movement, which was rendered with telling effect, and the closing "vivace" received good treatment. The applause which supplemented the opening work was given as a matter of course to this representative band of artists, but it lacked the true ring of complete satisfaction. The second orchestra number, Mascagni's beautiful intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," already well enough known to musical patrons to be taken, like other popular works, as an addition of the hand organ repertory, appeared to lack volume where so many fine players were employed in its interpretation. Nevertheless, it was one of the enjoyable things on the programme, and received strict attention from every one. This was largely due, no doubt, to the fact that it is very much talked and written about just now.

The last number on the programme, Weber's overture, the "Euranthe," was fully appreciated. This grand romantic opera was first properly produced in America in 1887, and has not yet lost the favorable impression made at that time. Perhaps if the orchestra had another hour's sitting the impression of listlessness would have been obliterated, judging from the spirited and excellent exposition of Weber's rich, varied and grand dramatic overture. Mr. Nikisch's energy was aroused, and his associates felt the thrill of his magnetism and impelling force.

Mrs. Nikisch is already known and appreciated by Providence audiences, as was manifested on her appearance last evening. She possesses a mezzo-soprano of rare quality and scope, her lower notes, full and pure as a contralto, and her upper tones clear as a bell. Liszt's song from "Mignon" is entirely adapted to her voice, which is rather dramatic. The perfect ease with which she poured forth her flood of song, her true intonation and artistic impulses place her with the foremost vocalists. Her rendering of the song with orchestral accompaniment was noble and thoroughly gratifying. She infused so much soul into the work as to [illegible] the "aria," ordinarily hard of understanding, perfectly comprehensible. The trio of songs by Schumann and Strauss, both grave in nature, were charmingly sung, while the sweet little "Staendchen," by Brahms, was charming. Mrs. Nikisch was artistically accompanied on the piano by her husband.

Mr. Schroder is a marvellous player. His interpretation of Bach's "Sarabande," showed a great depth and delicacy of feeling, while the two little things by Sitt and Popper respectively (both living composers), were beautifully rendered. In response to repeated recalls he played a little Tarantella by B. Crossman, with wonderful staccato effects. His 'cello playing was the triumph of the evening.

The next concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday, evening, Dec. 16.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestra has not played so well all through any other programme of this season as on Saturday evening last. The programme was preposterously long, and hardly half of the audience heard the last movement of the Symphony, which was not begun until nearly ten o'clock. But the band kept up its interest and was attentive, and Mr. Nikisch was unusually apt in his reading and steady in control. Two new works were given, of which the first was the overture to that "Roi d'Ys" opera by Lalo, which is so highly esteemed in Europe. The theme of the opera is an old Breton legend of enchantment, mystery, fatal fascination and tragic punishment, in which the charms of reckless beauty, the spells of magic and demoniac wrath and power all have their place. This overture is a fit prelude to such a story if romantically and poetically told. Its colors are rich and full, now sombrely dark, now nobly brilliant; its figures are strong in shape and suggestive in character, sometimes pulsing and roaring dully like the devouring sea, sometimes gay with the trumpets of triumph and sometimes sweet with festivity and love revels; its instrumentation is often unusual and bold, always picturesque and fanciful, and the impression it leaves is one of present delight and desire for a better acquaintance. The other work was the suite for solo violin and orchestra, which Mr. C. M. Loeffler wrote last summer and led on this occasion. He calls it "Veillées d'Ukraine," after the tales which inspired it, and the theme of treatment is Russian. The movements are four—an Introduction and Pastoral, a Rune, a Dumka and a Finale. It is thoroughly and elegantly written and there is a good deal of "meat" in its material—such a work as could have been written by none but a sensitive spirit speaking through a rich musical vocabulary. Considering that it traverses one line of thought, however, it is perhaps too long, and the general listener will recur to the first movement with most pleasure. On one account the suite must fail of the effect which one would naturally expect from the ingeniousness and quietude of the scoring, unless it can be played by some violinist whose tone is more sonorous and vehement than Mr. Loeffler's. He has given a prominent place to the English horn, which is constantly moving with the solo instrument; but that peculiar wood voice frequently overpowers the strings; and so, though the combination is theoretically right, it is practically wrong. Mr. Loeffler had an amazingly ardent reception—a welcome after his long grave illness of last season—and his work was greatly applauded. The "Lenore" symphony of Raff was the other orchestral work and had first-rate handling. Miss Marguerite Hall sang, and her lovely voice and fine method were enjoyed by those who were not too far from her; for Music Hall swallows up a voice no larger than hers. Her selections were an elaborate orchestral setting by Mr. Henschel of the well-known verses, "There was an Ancient King," which was about as entertaining as an algebraic demonstration, and three songs of Schubert. These, delightfully accompanied by Mr. Nikisch, gave much more pleasure, "An der Lever" eliciting special approbation.

For tonight a programme of three solid instrumental pieces testifies newly to Mr. Nikisch's judgment in such matters. It begins with Gluck's "Iphigenia" overture and ends with Schubert's C-major symphony, between which will be placed Brahms's D-major violin concerto, to be led by Mr. Adolph Brodsky, Mr. Damrosch's new concert-master, whose appearances in New York have elicited the highest encomiums.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The second Kneisel Quartette concert presented in the piano quintette of the young Norwegian, Sinding, a remarkable and delightful composition—a richer, stronger and more individual work than any other recent example of chamber-music. It is full of melodies, clear, distinctive, fascinating and (what interests the musician most) easily useful for development. The treatment is no less various, free and happy, whether considered as science or as sound: for while the polyphony is so fluent, so full and so constant that one is amazed to find a quintette suggesting so decidedly a small orchestra, the ear of the layman is enchanted by a music which he can follow without perplexity or fatigue. The work was exquisitely rendered, Mr. Busoni taking the piano part with entire felicity of touch and temper and complete apprehension of phrase and emphasis. The quartette also played unexceptionably well Haydn's quartette in D and Schumann's in A, op. 41, No. 3, which, being given in that order, led up gradually to the Sinding.

EVENING BULLETIN.

SDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Famous Boston Orchestra and Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Schroeder, in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening, under the direction of its great conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The large audience, representing art-loving and musically inclined residents of the city and vicinity, was not entirely satisfied with what Mr. Nikisch and his coterie of players had to offer on this occasion. Somehow the concert was not as interesting as others given here, so far as the orchestra is concerned, but the solo numbers by Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder made a deep and delightful impression, which evened up the symphony work and altogether made a pleasurable evening. The applause bestowed upon the soloists was spontaneous, and they were made to feel perfectly at ease by unmistakable manifestations of appreciation and kindly consideration. Mrs. Nikisch appeared nervous during her first effort, for the music sheet trembled perceptibly in her hand, but after she had made her third bow, in acknowledging the fervor of her hearers, she retired feeling that she was with friends. Mr. Schroeder quickly demonstrated that he had masterly command of his violoncello.

The concert began with the orchestra's presentation of Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97. This, the last of Schumann's four beautiful symphonies, is looked upon by a great many, in fact, the majority of musicians, as the most remarkable of his creations, not so much for the instrumentation, which is quite as brilliant as in all his symphonies, as for the religious depth and understanding displayed which, interspersed as it is by bright snatches of national melodies, tend to make this work capricious to a degree. The first movement, "Vivace," opens vigorously with the full orchestra, rising and falling in little undulating waves of melody, until the motive with the strings is dropped to be taken up by the woods and violas with a running accompaniment from the violas and 'cellos. One characteristic of Schumann, the sudden transition from one key to another, entirely foreign to the first, is remarked in this first movement. An abrupt close with full orchestra forms a fitting introduction to the second charming little "Schezo" movement. In the first chords, one recognizes the measured time of the stately minuet, in fact, one can almost see those old-time lords and ladies slowly walking through this most charming dance of by gone days. Throughout the melody, which is sustained by the woods, the strings are rippling through charming little staccato runs, so pianssimo that at times it is nothing more than a sigh. The second part of this movement is not quite so easy of understanding, but is made interesting by reason of its fugue nature. The third, an "Andante" movement, is perhaps the most charming of all, in a strictly musical point of view. It seems to be more of a deep revery than a connected melody, and the absence of all noise, together with the extremely quiet way in which the motive is introduced, first by the violins, followed by the violas and cellos, serves to deepen the impression. The movement opens with a little song of thankfulness, quaint in the extreme, which gradually lapses into a rapid, joyous melody inexpressibly charming, its contrast to the foregoing movements adding to the effect attained. Then comes the grand religious movement, which makes this symphony so famous. The motive is introduced by the trombones which have hitherto played but a little part in the composition. At the first sound of these instruments with the rich accompaniment of full orchestra, the impression which one forms is that of the grand, deep tones of an organ, which illusion is kept up to the end. Schumann composed this wonderful work knowing and feeling that the germs of insanity were slowly, but surely eating his life away, and some of the strains of this "movement religioso" are so wild and weird as can only be the outcome of a diseased mind. Here, as in the first "vivace," his abrupt change of key is frequently noticed. The "vivace," last movement, serves to effectually disperse all feelings of depression which the fourth part unconsciously created. Supposed to represent a holiday amongst the peasantry the several motives throughout are composed of little snatches of national melody, introduced with almost unexampled freshness and brilliancy of style. Here also one finds that a greater part of the work devolves upon the strings. The movement is hastened toward the end, making a brilliant finale. The first movement of this symphony as given by the Orchestra last evening did not quite come up to expectation. Something like listlessness, if not indifference, seemed to have possession of the players, and the impression of inattentiveness, perhaps, did not entirely fade all the evening. The "Molto Moderato" was attacked with more firmness, but it fell off into too slow a tempo, a defect prominent in the opening "vivace." The orchestra roused itself in the "Religiose" movement, which was rendered with telling effect, and the closing "vivace" received good treatment. The applause which supplemented the opening work was given as a matter of course to this representative band of artists, but it lacked the true ring of complete satisfaction. The second orchestra number, Mascagni's beautiful intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," already well enough known to musical patrons to be taken, like other popular works, as an addition of the hand organ repertory, appeared to lack volume where so many fine players were employed in its interpretation. Nevertheless, it was one of the enjoyable things on the programme, and received strict attention from every one. This was largely due, no doubt, to the fact that it is very much talked and written about just now.

The last number on the programme, [illegible] overture, the "Euryanthe," was fully appreciated. This grand romantic opera was first properly produced in America in 1887, and has not yet lost the favorable impression made at that time. Perhaps if the orchestra had another hour's sitting the impression of listlessness would have been obliterated, judging from the spirited and excellent exposition of Weber's rich, varied and grand dramatic overture. Mr. Nikisch's energy was aroused, and his associates felt the thrill of his magnetism and impelling force.

Mrs. Nikisch is already known and appreciated by Providence audiences, as was manifested on her appearance last evening. She possesses a mezzo-soprano of rare quality and scope, her lower notes, full and pure as a contralto, and her upper tones clear as a bell. Liszt's song from "Mignon" is entirely adapted to her voice, which is rather dramatic. The perfect ease with which she poured forth her flood of song, her true intonation and artistic [illegible] Her rendering of the song with orchestral accompaniment was [illegible]

[illegible] trio of songs by Schumann and Strauss, both grave in nature, were charmingly sung, while the sweet little "Staendchen," by Brahms, was charming. Mrs. Nikisch was artistically accompanied on the piano by her husband.

Mr. Schroder is a marvellous player. His interpretation of Bach's "Sarabande," showed a great depth and delicacy of feeling, while the two little things by Silt and Popper respectively (both living composers), were beautifully rendered. In response to repeated recalls he played a little Tarantella by B. Crossman, with wonderful staccato effects. His 'cello playing was the triumph of the evening.

The next concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday, evening, Dec. 16.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Y, NOVEMBER 28, 1891.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the sixth concert contained two entire novelties, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and a suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," by C. M. Loeffler. The Lalo overture is effectively and brilliantly scored for the full modern orchestra, and was in the main well played. It is an intensely dramatic work in which the composer has given free scope to his romantic genius. It abounds in climaxes which, heard for the first time, seem somewhat startling. Of its worth as a composition there can be no question, but that it is music for the theater and not for the concert room is equally true. It was entirely wise and just in Mr. Nikisch to let it be heard at a symphony concert, although he will hardly add it to his repertoire of classical overtures.

The announcement that Mr. Loeffler was to play an original composition was a surprise to a majority of the Symphony Orchestra patrons, although to the knowing ones his talent as a composer has been known for several years. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" is a wholly delightful work abounding in weird Russian melodies, which the composer has most skilfully woven together and ingeniously elaborated upon. It was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, who before and after its performance was accorded a veritable ovation. Much of the time the accompaniment of the orchestra was over loud, frequently making it utterly impossible for the solo violin to be heard. Miss Marguerite Hall sang the ballad "There was an Ancient King," by Henschel and three songs by Schubert. Her voice has lost much of the vibrato that was formerly so noticeable in her singing, and her efforts were painstaking and intelligent, still both voice and style are inadequate to so large a place as Music Hall. The symphony was the ever popular "Lenore" by Raff, and with the exception of the second movement was finely played. The indecision in the attack, so noticeable earlier in the season, owing undoubtedly to the numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra, was not so apparent. The second movement of the symphony was completely slaughtered by the new French horn player imported this season, and who on this occasion gave a most forcible illustration of how the French horn should not be played.

The program for the next concert will be: Overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (Wagner's ending), Gluck; Concerto for Violin in D major, op. 77, Brahms; Symphony in C major, Schubert; soloist, Mr. Adolph Brodsky.

THE COMMONWEALTH

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1891.

A PATRON OF MUSIC.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the accomplished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been talking in a very interesting manner to the News of Detroit, where he recently went to take part, with Mrs. Nikisch, in a concert by the Philharmonic Club of that city. Here at home, Mr. Nikisch has preserved a reticence in the matter of 'interviews'—a reticence for which he cannot be blamed—which increases the value of what he has to say on an occasion like this when he seems to speak with entire freedom. And what he had to say to the Detroit reporter with whom he talked, making due allowance for possible variation in the process of getting the words from his lips to the printed page, is so highly appreciative, and withal so pleasant to hear, that it deserves reproduction.

"If there were more gentlemen as public-spirited as Mr. Henry L. Higginson of Boston," he is reported to say, "musical affairs would receive a great impetus in this country." Of this, we in Boston have been fully convinced long before Mr. Nikisch said it. Mr. Higginson, indeed, more nearly fills the idea conveyed by the old phrase, a patron of music, than any other of our citizens; and he represents this character in its modern and democratic relations.

The account which Mr. Nikisch gives of the development of the Symphony Orchestra, although not altogether news, is interesting as coming from one who speaks with intimate knowledge. "Mr. Higginson," he says, "determined that Boston should have a good orchestra, cost what it might. Accordingly, he saw that there were gathered together the best musicians, and the organization placed upon a working basis. The first year about $25,000 was lost. That was nothing; he expected it. He did not cut down salaries or strive to decrease expenses. Nor did he complain. All he said was: 'The orchestra was very good last year; we will make it better this year.' Now it just about pays. There were certainly no profits last year; yet he said, 'the members should receive larger salaries.' Accordingly, this year salaries were raised $15,000. You may imagine that we are all devoted to him, for in him we find a sympathetic friend and 'father,' as he might be called. Of course, he is an excellent musician and is able to confer with us upon musical matters, so that we can perform our task in keeping pace with musical matters all over the world. When he last sent me to Europe to import foreign talent, he said, 'If you find some one who is very good and want him, offer him a most satisfactory price.'"

A glimpse of what it costs in money to maintain this great musical organization is given by Mr. Nikisch, who says that the annual salaries of the ninety members of the orchestra aggregate $130,000, in addition to which there are traveling expenses, hall rent, printing and other items of expense.

It is not fully evident why Mr. Nikisch's opinion is especially valuable as to the conditions upon which opera may be made successful in this country; but the Detroit 'interviewer,' with the audacity of his calling, put the question. He received this answer: "The reason is that we have so few singers who can render an aria or recitative in English . . . An opera company cannot be successful without a reputable, reliable manager and a company who, if they pretend to sing in English, would not sing in Italian-English or worse still in German-English."

It may be that Mr. Nikisch is correct in this diagnosis of the situation. But the suggestion may be ventured that an understanding of the words of the libretto is the last thing required for the enjoyment of opera, and, indeed, the fact that a foreign language is used is in many cases a real relief. The inane verse to which the great operas are set may better be left untranslated.

Musicians and managers, perhaps, have profited by recent evidence that there is overmuch music here in Boston, and during the past week but two concerts worthy of note have been given. At both, however, music new to Boston and of much interest in itself has been performed.

At the Symphony concert, last Saturday, Lalo's overture to 'Le Roi d' Ys' was given for the first time in Boston, and Mr. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra was played fresh from the composer's manuscript. Lalo, Spanish by birth and French by artistic sympathy and long residence in Paris, won his fame late, but since the first performance of 'Le Roi d' Ys' in 1888, his work, in France especially, has enjoyed exceptional popularity. The strength of the music lies largely in its dramatic effectiveness and, as the opera—or the legend either—is scarcely known in America, this quality counted for but little. The overture is gloomy in its themes and dark in its execution, with a touch now and then of the grim strength of the cliffs of Brittany whence the legend came. It is a sort of sombre background against which the fierce, rude, passionate men and women of the opera move to and fro, dimly seen in the twilight of a remote and barbaric age. As music it is strong and well written, with a full knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra, though a bit too deliberate, perhaps, and here and there obviously labored. Mr. Nikisch appreciated the dramatic significance of the music, if his hearers did not, and the overture was excellently played.

Mr. Loeffler, as his friends well know, has studied composition to good purpose and several works from his hand already exist in manuscript. The suite played last Saturday was written, we believe, last summer and was suggested in some measure by a group of tales of the Ukraine by the Russian, Gogol. There is much, indeed, of the quick play of Slavonic emotion in the suite, now light and gay, now deep and serious, yet always with an under-chord of sadness. But Mr. Loeffler's music scarcely hints at the underlying savagery of the Slav; it is too fanciful and too gentle. Indeed, so light is his touch sometimes, that his delicate shades and contrasts of musical meaning slip by almost unnoticed. The suite is, perhaps, a bit too long, but it is charming throughout and, but for its diffuseness, written in restrained and musicianly fashion. The solo violin, moreover, is very skillfully—and very modestly, too—made but a part of the whole.

Raff's 'Lenore,' with its passionate and romantic feeling and its occasional picturesqueness, is the sort of thing that a conducter of Mr. Nikisch's temper plays admirably. There are cheap effects enough in the symphony, to say nothing of downright vulgarity here and there, but seldom have its beauties—and it has beauties, after all—been brought out more clearly than by Mr. Nikisch's reading.

Miss Marguerite Hall's voice and style of singing are little suited to so large an auditorium as Music Hall, and her first selection, a 'ballade' for contralto and orchestra by Mr. Henschel, was not altogether well chosen. It lacks warmth and effectiveness and sorts ill with Miss Hall's methods. In the group of songs by Schubert, she did better, but they, too, were out of place in a great room like Music Hall.

Seldom have the Kneisel Quartette done more thoroughly artistic work than in the second concert of their present series, last Mondayevening. The Haydn quartette in D, with which the programme began, was played with most unusual and unmodern freshness and sympathy, with an art so perfect that it seemed but artlessness. The second movement (adagio cantabile), in particular, was played most admirably, with just the right warmth of feeling, and in the tripping finale one could almost hear the light steps of elves dancing in a forest glade by the midsummer moon. The more scholarly and abstruse Schuman quartette in A. (opus 41) was played, too, in the same masterly fashion.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday evening, Nov. 21 was:

Lalo	Overture. "Le Roi d'Ys." (First time in Boston).
Henschel.	Ballad. "There was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra. (First time in Boston).
C. M. Loeffler.	Suite in four movements for Violin and orchestra. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Rune.—Dumka.—Finale. (First time.)
Schubert.	Songs with Piano. a) Liebesbotschaft. b) An die Leyer. c) Rastlose Liebe.
Raff.	Symphony in E. "Lenore." No. 5, op. 177.
Love's Happiness.	I Allegro. II. Andante quasi Larghetto.
Separation.	III. March tempo.
Reunion in Death.	IV. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.) (After G. Buerger's "Lenore.")

Soloists: Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

This new overture, "Le Roi d' Ys," is fully as sensational as the story upon which it is founded. Mr. Lalo, if this overture is an earnest of his writing, certainly is a vigorous one. The explanatory notes of the programme tell us Lalo has no academical education, but this overture shows him to have been a good student, and that Wagner has been his master. here are several passages in the overture which, if not exactly like some in Tannhauser, are strongly remindful of them. The overture is brilliant throughout and while interesting to some, is extremely tiresome to others, because of too much noise and therefore confusing. As a new composition it may be hailed with pleasure as something to think about.

Mr. Henschel's song, as sung by Miss Hall, failed to add much pleasure or satisfaction. The song itself is doleful, and Miss Hall made it still more so. Miss Hall is an attractive young lady, has had the advantage of the best instruction, is, no doubt, a successful drawing-room singer, but Music hall is entirely unsuited to her style and voice. The orchestra, too, entirely overpowered her best efforts, and she suffered in consequence. Miss Hall was richly dressed.

The suite in four movements for violin by Mr. Loeffler may be considered fairly successful, so far as orchestral writing is concerned, but viewed as a violin solo it possesses no distinctive characteristic features. Mr. Loeffler is a good musician, a careful, painstaking but effeminate violinist; a modest gentleman and an especial favorite with all classes of Boston's musicians.

The three Schubert songs sung by Miss Hall call for no particular mention. She sang them in an acceptable manner. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her in his incomparable way on the piano.

The Raff symphony which closed the evening's programmes has been played better here several times. The Thomas orchestra, which, we believe, was the first to play it in Boston, did it far better than it was done Saturday evening. The march, as a whole, was played much too loud; there was wanting that fine quality of pianissimo, with its crescendo and diminuendo effects given it when Mr. Gericke had command over this orchestra. They were conspicuously absent at this concert. The rest of the symphony, especially the last movement, was well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1891.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Famous Boston Orchestra and Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Schroeder, in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening, under the direction of its great conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The large audience, representing art-loving and musically inclined residents of the city and vicinity, was not entirely satisfied with what Mr. Nikisch and his coterie of players had to offer on this occasion. Somehow the concert was not as interesting as others given here, so far as the orchestra is concerned, but the solo numbers by Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder made a deep and delightful impression, which evened up the symphony work and altogether made a pleasurable evening. The applause bestowed upon the soloists was spontaneous, and they were made to feel perfectly at ease by unmistakable manifestations of appreciation and kindly consideration. Mrs. Nikisch appeared nervous during her first effort, for the music sheet trembled perceptibly in her hand, but after she had made her third bow, in acknowledging the fervor of her hearers, she retired feeling that she was with friends. Mr. Schroeder quickly demonstrated that he had masterly command of his violoncello. The concert began with the orchestra's presentation of Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97. This, the last of Schumann's four beautiful symphonies, is looked upon by a great many, in fact, the majority of musicians, as the most remarkable of his creations, not so much for the instrumentation, which is quite as brilliant as in all his symphonies, as for the religious depth and understanding displayed which, interspersed as it is by bright snatches of national melodies, tend to make this work capricious to a degree. The first movement, "Vivace," opens vigorously with the full orchestra, rising and falling in little undulating waves of melody, until the motive with the strings is dropped to be taken up by the woods and violas with a running accompaniment from the violas and 'cellos. One characteristic of Schumann, the sudden transition from one key to another, entirely foreign to the first, is remarked in this first movement. An abrupt close with full orchestra forms a fitting introduction to the second charming little "Schezo" movement. In the first chords, one recognizes the measured time of the stately minuet, in fact, one can almost see those old-time lords and ladies slowly walking through this most charming dance of by gone days. Throughout the melody, which is sustained by the woods, the strings are rippling through charming little staccato runs, so pianssimo that at times it is nothing more than a sigh. The second part of this movement is not quite so easy of understanding, but is made interesting by reason of its fugue nature. The third, an "Andante" movement, is perhaps the most charming of all, in a strictly musical point of view. It seems to be more of a deep revery than a connected melody, and the absence of all noise, together with the extremely quiet way in which the motive is introduced, first by the violins, followed by the violas and cellos, serves to deepen the impression. The movement opens with a little song of thankfulness, quaint in the extreme, which gradually lapses into a rapid, joyous melody inexpressibly charming, its contrast to the foregoing movements adding to the effect attained. Then comes the grand religious movement, which makes this symphony so famous. The motive is introduced by the trombones which have hitherto played but a little part in the composition. At the first sound of these instruments with the rich accompaniment of full orchestra, the impression which one forms is that of the grand, deep tones of an organ, which illusion is kept up to the end. Schumann composed this wonderful work knowing and feeling that the germs of insanity were slowly, but surely eating his life away, and some of the strains of this "movement religioso" are so wild and weird as can only be the outcome of a diseased mind. Here, as in the first "vivace," his abrupt change of key is frequently noticed. The "vivace," last movement, serves to effectually disperse all feelings of depression which the fourth part unconsciously created. Supposed to represent a holiday amongst the peasantry the several motives throughout are composed of little snatches of national melody, introduced with almost unexampled freshness and brilliancy of style. Here also one finds that a greater part of the work devolves upon the strings. The movement is hastened toward the end, making a brilliant finale. The first movement of this symphony as given by the Orchestra last evening did not quite come up to expectation. Something like listlessness, if not indifference, seemed to have possession of the players, and the impression of inattentiveness, perhaps, did not entirely fade all the evening. The "Molto Moderato" was attacked with more firmness, but it fell off into too slow a tempo, a defect prominent in the opening "vivace." The orchestra roused itself in the "Religose" movement, which was rendered with telling effect, and the closing "vivace" received good treatment. The applause which supplemented the opening work was given as a matter of course to this representative band of artists, but it lacked the true ring of complete satisfaction. The second orchestra number, Mascagni's beautiful intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," already well enough known to musical patrons to be taken, like other popular works, as an addition of the hand organ repertory, appeared to lack volume where so many fine players were employed in its interpretation. Nevertheless, it was one of the enjoyable things on the programme, and received strict attention from every one. This was largely due, no doubt, to the fact that it is very much talked and written about just now.

The last number on the programme, Weber's overture, the "Euranthe," was fully appreciated. This grand romantic opera was first properly produced in America in 1887, and has not yet lost the favorable impression made at that time. Perhaps if the orchestra had another hour's sitting the impression of listlessness would have been obliterated, judging from the spirited and excellent exposition of Weber's rich, varied and grand dramatic overture. Mr. Nikisch's energy was aroused, and his associates felt the thrill of his magnetism and impelling force.

Mrs. Nikisch is already known and appreciated by Providence audiences, as was manifested on her appearance last evening. She possesses a mezzo-soprano of rare quality and scope, her lower notes, full and pure as a contralto, and her upper tones clear as a bell. Liszt's song from "Mignon" is entirely adapted to her voice, which is rather dramatic. The perfect ease with which she poured forth her flood of song, her true intonation and artistic impulses place her with the foremost vocalists. Her rendering of the song with orchestral accompaniment was noble and much soul into the work as to make the "aria," ordinarily hard of understanding, perfectly comprehensible. The trio of songs by Schumann and Strauss, both grave in nature, were charmingly sung, while the sweet little "Staendchen," by Brahms, was charming. Mrs. Nikisch was artistically accompanied on the piano by her husband.

Mr. Schroder is a marvellous player. His interpretation of Bach's "Sarabande," showed a great depth and delicacy of feeling, while the two little things by Silt and Popper respectively (both living composers), were beautifully rendered. In response to repeated recalls he played a little Tarantella by B. Crossman, with wonderful staccato effects. His 'cello playing was the triumph of the evening.

The next concert by the orchestra will be given Wednesday, evening, Dec. 16.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Y, NOVEMBER 28, 1891.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the sixth concert contained two entire novelties, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and a suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," by C. M. Loeffler. The Lalo overture is effectively and brilliantly scored for the full modern orchestra, and was in the main well played. It is an intensely dramatic work in which the composer has given free scope to his romantic genius. It abounds in climaxes which, heard for the first time, seem somewhat startling. Of its worth as a composition there can be no question, but that it is music for the theater and not for the concert room is equally true. It was entirely wise and just in Mr. Nikisch to let it be heard at a symphony concert, although he will hardly add it to his repertoire of classical overtures.

The announcement that Mr. Loeffler was to play an original composition was a surprise to a majority of the Symphony Orchestra patrons, although to the knowing ones his talent as a composer has been known for several years. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" is a wholly delightful work abounding in weird Russian melodies, which the composer has most skilfully woven together and ingeniously elaborated upon. It was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, who before and after its performance was accorded a veritable ovation. Much of the time the accompaniment of the orchestra was over loud, frequently making it utterly impossible for the solo violin to be heard. Miss Marguerite Hall sang the ballad "There was an Ancient King," by Henschel and three songs by Schubert. Her voice has lost much of the vibrato that was formerly so noticeable in her singing, and her efforts were painstaking and intelligent, still both voice and style are inadequate to so large a place as Music Hall. The symphony was the ever popular "Lenore" by Raff, and with the exception of the second movement was finely played. The indecision in the attack, so noticeable earlier in the season, owing undoubtedly to the numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra, was not so apparent. The second movement of the symphony was completely slaughtered by the new French horn player imported this season, and who on this occasion gave a most forcible illustration of how the French horn should not be played.

The program for the next concert will be: Overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (Wagner's ending), Gluck; Concerto for Violin in D major, op. 77, Brahms; Symphony in C major, Schubert; soloist, Mr. Adolph Brodsky.

THE COMMONWEAL

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER, 28, 1891.

A PATRON OF MUSIC.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the accomplished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been talking in a very interesting manner to the News of Detroit, where he recently went to take part, with Mrs. Nikisch, in a concert by the Philharmonic Club of that city. Here at home, Mr. Nikisch has preserved a reticence in the matter of 'interviews'—a reticence for which he cannot be blamed—which increases the value of what he has to say on an occasion like this when he seems to speak with entire freedom. And what he had to say to the Detroit reporter with whom he talked, making due allowance for possible variation in the process of getting the words from his lips to the printed page, is so highly appreciative, and withal so pleasant to hear, that it deserves reproduction.

"If there were more gentlemen as public-spirited as Mr. Henry L. Higginson of Boston," he is reported to say, "musical affairs would receive a great impetus in this country." Of this, we in Boston have been fully convinced long before Mr. Nikisch said it. Mr. Higginson, indeed, more nearly fills the idea conveyed by the old phrase, a patron of music, than any other of our citizens; and he represents this character in its modern and democratic relations.

The account which Mr. Nikisch gives of the development of the Symphony Orchestra, although not altogether news, is interesting as coming from one who speaks with intimate knowledge. "Mr. Higginson," he says, "determined that Boston should have a good orchestra, cost what it might. Accordingly, he saw that there were gathered together the best musicians, and the organization placed upon a working basis. The first year about $25,000 was lost. That was nothing; he expected it. He did not cut down salaries or strive to decrease expenses. Nor did he complain. All he said was: 'The orchestra was very good last year; we will make it better this year.' Now it just about pays. There were certainly no profits last year; yet he said, 'the members should receive larger salaries.' Accordingly, this year salaries were raised $15,000. You may imagine that we are all devoted to him, for in him we find a sympathetic friend and 'father,' as he might be called. Of course, he is an excellent musician and is able to confer with us upon musical matters, so that we can perform our task in keeping pace with musical matters all over the world. When he last sent me to Europe to import foreign talent, he said, 'If you find some one who is very good and want him, offer him a most satisfactory price.'"

A glimpse of what it costs in money to maintain this great musical organization is given by Mr. Nikisch, who says that the annual salaries of the ninety members of the orchestra aggregate $130,000, in addition to which there are traveling expenses, hall rent, printing and other items of expense.

It is not fully evident why Mr. Nikisch's opinion is especially valuable as to the conditions upon which opera may be made successful in this country; but the Detroit 'interviewer,' with the audacity of his calling, put the question. He received this answer: "The reason is that we have so few singers who can render an aria or recitative in English . . . An opera company cannot be successful without a reputable, reliable manager and a company who, if they pretend to sing in English, would not sing in Italian-English or worse still in German-English."

It may be that Mr. Nikisch is correct in this diagnosis of the situation. But the suggestion may be ventured that an understanding of the words of the libretto is the last thing required for the enjoyment of opera, and, indeed, the fact that a foreign language is used is in many cases a real relief. The inane verse to which the great operas are set may better be left untranslated.

Musicians and managers, perhaps, have profited by recent evidence that there is overmuch music here in Boston, and during the past week but two concerts worthy of note have been given. At both, however, music new to Boston and of much interest in itself has been performed.

At the Symphony concert, last Saturday, Lalo's overture to 'Le Roi d' Ys' was given for the first time in Boston, and Mr. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra was played fresh from the composer's manuscript. Lalo, Spanish by birth and French by artistic sympathy and long residence in Paris, won his fame late, but since the first performance of 'Le Roi d' Ys' in 1888, his work, in France especially, has enjoyed exceptional popularity. The strength of the music lies largely in its dramatic effectiveness and, as the opera—or the legend either—is scarcely known in America, this quality counted for but little. The overture is gloomy in its themes and dark in its execution, with a touch now and then of the grim strength of the cliffs of Brittany whence the legend came. It is a sort of sombre background against which the fierce, rude, passionate men and women of the opera move to and fro, dimly seen in the twilight of a remote and barbaric age. As music it is strong and well written, with a full knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra, though a bit too deliberate, perhaps, and here and there obviously labored. Mr. Nikisch appreciated the dramatic significance of the music, if his hearers did not, and the overture was excellently played.

Mr. Loeffler, as his friends well know, has studied composition to good purpose and several works from his hand already exist in manuscript. The suite played last Saturday was written, we believe, last summer and was suggested in some measure by a group of tales of the Ukraine by the Russian, Gogol. There is much, indeed, of the quick play of Slavonic emotion in the suite, now light and gay, now deep and serious, yet always with an under-chord of sadness. But Mr. Loeffler's music scarcely hints at the underlying savagery of the Slav; it is too fanciful and too gentle. Indeed, so light is his touch sometimes that his delicate shades and contrasts of musical meaning slip by almost unnoticed. The suite is, perhaps, a bit too long, but it is charming throughout and, but for its diffuseness, written in restrained and musicianly fashion. The solo violin, moreover, is very skillfully—and very modestly, too—made but a part of the whole.

Raff's 'Lenore,' with its passionate and romantic feeling and its occasional picturesqueness, is the sort of thing that a conductor of Mr. Nikisch's temper plays admirably. There are cheap effects enough in the symphony, to say nothing of downright vulgarity here and there, but seldom have its beauties—and it has beauties, after all—been brought out more clearly than by Mr. Nikisch's reading.

Miss Marguerite Hall's voice and style of singing are little suited to so large an auditorium as Music Hall, and her first selection, a 'ballade' for contralto and orchestra by Mr. Henschel, was not altogether well chosen. It lacks warmth and effectiveness and sorts ill with Miss Hall's methods. In the group of songs by Schubert, she did better, but they, too, were out of place in a great room like Music Hall.

Seldom have the Kneisel Quartette done more thoroughly artistic work than in the second concert of their present series, last Mondayevening. The Haydn quartette in D, with which the programme began, was played with most unusual and unmodern freshness and sympathy, with an art so perfect that it seemed but artlessness. The second movement (adagio cantabile), in particular, was played most admirably, with just the right warmth of feeling, and in the tripping finale one could almost hear the light steps of elves dancing in a forest glade by the midsummer moon. The more scholarly and abstruse Schuman quartette in A. (opus 41) was played, too, in the same masterly fashion.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday evening, Nov. 21 was:

Lalo	Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." (First time in Boston).
Henschel.	Ballad. "There was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra. (First time in Boston).
C. M. Loeffler.	Suite in four movements for Violin and orchestra. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Rune.—Dumka.—Finale. (First time.)
Schubert.	Songs with Piano. a) Liebesbotschaft. b) An die Leyer. c) Rastlose Liebe.
Raff.	Symphony in E. "Lenore." No. 5, op. 177.
Love's Happiness.	I. Allegro. II. Andante quasi Larghetto.
Separation.	III. March tempo.
Reunion in Death.	IV. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.) (After G. Buerger's "Lenore.")

Soloists: Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

This new overture, "Le Roi d' Ys," is fully as sensational as the story upon which it is founded. Mr. Lalo, if this overture is an earnest of his writing, certainly is a vigorous one. The explanatory notes of the programme tell us Lalo has no academical education, but this overture shows him to have been a good student, and that Wagner has been his master. here are several passages in the overture which, if not exactly like some in Tannhauser, are strongly remindful of them. The overture is brilliant throughout and while interesting to some, is extremely tiresome to others, because of too much noise and therefore confusing. As a new composition it may be hailed with pleasure as something to think about.

Mr. Henschel's song, as sung by Miss Hall, failed to add much pleasure or satisfaction. The song itself is doleful, and Miss Hall made it still more so. Miss Hall is an attractive young lady, has had the advantage of the best instruction, is, no doubt, a successful drawing-room singer, but Music hall is entirely unsuited to her style and voice. The orchestra, too, entirely overpowered her best efforts, and she suffered in consequence. Miss Hall was richly dressed.

The suite in four movements for violin by Mr. Loeffler may be considered fairly successful, so far as orchestral writing is concerned, but viewed as a violin solo it possesses no distinctive characteristic features. Mr. Loeffler is a good musician, a careful, painstaking but effeminate violinist; a modest gentleman and an especial favorite with all classes of Boston's musicians.

The three Schubert songs sung by Miss Hall call for no particular mention. She sang them in an acceptable manner. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her in his incomparable way on the piano.

The Raff symphony which closed the evening's programmes has been played better here several times. The Thomas orchestra, which, we believe, was the first to play it in Boston, did it far better than it was done Saturday evening. The march, as a whole, was played much too loud; there was wanting that fine quality of pianissimo, with its crescendo and diminuendo effects given it when Mr. Gericke had command over this orchestra. They were conspicuously absent at this concert. The rest of the symphony, especially the last movement, was well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Nothing in the shape of novel works was presented at the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert. Nevertheless, one can go home from a concert, after listening to Schubert's great ninth Symphony in C, and to a splendid performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto, opus 77, by one of the greatest violinists now resident in this country, with the feeling that his time has not been ill-spent.

The soloist was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the noted virtuoso, whom Mr. Walter Damrosch was far-seeing enough to secure as concert-master for his new "Symphony Orchestra, of New York." Mr. Brodsky's large, well shaped head, agreeable yet determined cast of countenance, and massive physique, indicating immense reserve force, at once told plainly that the modern Beethoven's tortuous difficulties could have no terrors for him.

Brahms' first thought, when he settles himself for composition, is not to write "thankful" passages. That sounds ambiguous; but it is likely to prove true which ever way it may be construed. Careful consideration of the many murderously difficult mechanical combinations that he has put into his larger works for solo only leaves one in a state of perplexity as to whether his chief aim was to give what he conceived to be adequate expression to certain colossal ideas, or whether it was to create obstacles that would surely stagger all contemporary virtuosos. There are passages in this concerto, for example, that even Mr. Brodsky's strong and skillful hand could not make really musical in effect; that is, unless we throw over all preconceived notions of musical effect which have become second nature through a long season of contact with older and less angular masters and accept Brahms as the only true combiner of musical sounds.

We willingly recognize the nobility of his thought, the greatness of purpose that give to almost every page of his music a character that prevents their being passed over lightly. There is something in even the obscurest of them that enchains the attention, that fascinates, as an ugly yet characterful face first repels and finally enslaves. It is possible that Brahm's creations are the true type of the music of the future. No doubt Beethoven shocked the ears and reason of the great majority of his listeners with equal facility; and as for Schumann, even the present generation is not yet wholly reconciled to his dissonances. But with the Schubert symphony ringing in one's ears, it is hard to believe that Brahms is the true prophet.

Mr. Brodsky's playing was strong, fluent and masterful. There was no lack of courage evinced in attacking some much-to-be-dreaded portions of the concerto, and no apparent evasion of the greatest difficulties. His tone in melodious and sustained passages was full and warm, and his rendering of the last movement was fiery in accent and brilliant in execution. He was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled several times.

The symphony was on the whole splendidly performed, though some of the playing here and there seemed rather perfunctory than zealous in character. The scherzo was especially well given, and from beginning to end Mr. Niksich gave an emphasis to the dramatic side of the work, and threw into relief its gorgeous tone coloring with the sure hand of a born leader. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was the first number, its style contrasting well with the concerto which followed.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall last Monday evening. It was made expressly noteworthy by the performance of a new quintet for piano and strings in E minor, and by the appearance of Mr. Ferrucio B. Busoni, pianist. Christian Sinding is a Norwegian, is thirty years old, and comes from a family talented in the arts. His musical studies were conducted in Christiana, Dresden, Munich and Leipzig; and his compositions include piano pieces, songs and a suite for violin and piano. The quintet is one of the most original, best constructed and attractive new works of this class that have been heard here for a good while. It not only possesses a brilliancy that makes it interesting both to the pianist who likes plenty of opportunities for display and the concert-goer who wants to be pleased without making too much mental exertion, but characteristics which appeal strongly to the musician who listens with the hope of hearing something that indicates talent of an unusual order. The extreme movements are full of strength and fire, and the excellent thematic material is very ingeniously handled. The andante, too, is instinct with feeling and melodic beauty; while the scherzo, like many such movements, is the most fascinating and most directly appealing part of the work. The quintet was magnificently played. The quartet were at their very best, and Mr. Busoni's playing was not only as finished as usual, but was quite in accord with the spirit of the music, which means that it was also imbued with poetic feeling and brilliancy. The other numbers were Haydn's string quartet in D and Schumann's in A, opus 41, both of which were delightfully played. A large and demonstrative audience was present.

RECORD, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-29

Second Boston Symphony Concert

THE SECOND Boston Symphony concert will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 7, when the following programme will be rendered:

Symphony in A major, No. 7, Beethoven.
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, Rubinstein.
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich .... Bach.
Overture, Euryanthe .... Weber.
Soloist, Alfred Grunfeld.

Mr. Grunfeld will be remembered as the pianist who, with his brother Heinrich, was recently heard with so much pleasure at the Chestnut Street Opera House. There [illegible] here many foreign pianists who were better managed, and better [illegible], but none of more solid musical attainments.

[63]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, gave the second in their this season's series of chamber concerts in Union Hall. The concert began with a quartet by Haydn in D, a lovely work in its composer's most delightful vein, and fascinating from beginning to end. After all, there is a charm in pure music of this order that is wholly lacking in the labored, self-conscious and feverish music of our time which has pushed it almost out of sight. In the musical reaction that is inevitable at no late date the music of the past is certain to come to the front again, and to renew its influence on the composers of the future. The quartet was exquisitely played, and its performance was a worthy companion to the wonderful interpretation of the Mozart quartet at the previous concert. Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, No. 3, followed, and was perfectly given. Then came a remarkable quintet for strings and piano by Christian Sinding, a Norwegian composer. Its originality is both refreshing and delightful. There is decided novelty in keeping the strings apart as a quartet by themselves, and leaving the piano to its own independent work without marring the unity of the whole. The sustained fire and easy flow of the quintet are astonishing. The scherzo in its wealth of melody, its vivacity and its finely contrasting effects is one of the most strikingly beautiful and masterly bits of writing that contemporary musical art has produced. Its appreciation by the audience was instant and enthusiastic. The playing of the difficult and wholly interesting piano part by Mr. Busoni is above all praise. Nothing could have been more brilliant, more artistic and more able in every essential. The next concert will take place Monday evening, Dec. 28.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall on the evening of the 21st inst., presented several novelties. First was Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," a thoroughly unconventional work, unquestionably strong and effective, but not easy to understand on a single hearing. It is carefully written throughout, and the labor that has been bestowed on it obtrudes itself constantly. The opening portions of the overture are no doubt expressive of the gloomy color of the story they illustrate, and heard before the opera, may prepare the hearer for what is to come; but heard in the concert-room as music pure and simple, they say nothing edifying. There are, however, some exquisite moments of beauty in the work, notably the lovely 'cello theme, which is appealingly tender and refined. The orchestration is rich, and the skill of a master is shown in the discreet and impressive use of tone color. It was well played, and met with a favorable reception. Another novelty was Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Les Vieilles de l'Ukraine," a suit for violin and orchestra, and inspired by some stories by the eccentric and debased Russian author Golgol. There are four movements, the first an introduction and pastorale, easy in its melodic flow, delightful in its rhythmic devices, inspiriting in its graceful swing, and musicianlike in all things. It is, perhaps, spun out to somewhat to great a length; in fact, with the exception of the finale, the various movements would be benefited by compression. The second and third movements, though abundant in fine feeling, charming harmonies, and admirable instrumental color are, in their general color, too much alike, and it must be confessed that they result in producing the effect of monotony, despite the beauties in which they abound. The finale is full of life, and brings the whole to an inspiring conclusion. From beginning to end Mr. Loeffler has shown unerring artistic taste, and the work gives him a prominent place among the best of our young resident composers. It is the achievement of a thorough musician, and the same refined judgment that is manifested in the rest of the suite is shown in the writing of the solo part, which is not given up to deliberate virtuoso display, but takes its place in preserving the due balance of the whole. This is a rare virtue in a soloist who composes his own music, and deserves the heartiest recognition. There is one important thing that still remains to be mentioned, and that is the inaudibility of the solo part through a great part of the performance. Mr. Loeffler is not lacking in a fine and searching violin tone, as has been amply evidenced by his playing on Music Hall stage; but on this occasion it did not make itself felt. It is true that the orchestra steadily played over-loud, but the fault is not there. It is to be found in the orchestration, and is to be attributed to the persistent use of the oboe when the solo part is written on the upper part of the violin, and to the equally persistent use of the horn when the solo lies on the lower notes of the violin. In both cases the wind instruments are so closely in sympathy with the violin that they absorb and neutralize its tones when they are kept on the same plane with it, and it is peculiar that nearly all through the work the oboe has been made to prevail when the violin is playing what may be called oboe tones, and the horn when the violin is playing what may in turn be called horn tones. A revision of the score in this repect would, we are sure, restore to the violin the prominence it should maintain, and the work would profit accordingly. The solo part, it will be taken for granted, was played with that elegant finish, warmth of feeling and charm of style that make Mr. Loeffler's performances always interesting and delightful. The artist was welcomed with cordial heartiness, and at the end of the suite was greeted with enthusiastic applause and impetuously recalled. The concert ended with Raff's "Lenore" symphony, which was, on the whole, sympathetically read and acceptably played. Miss Marguerite Hall appeared as a soloist and sang a setting for voice and orchestra of Heine's poem, "There was an Ancient King," by Mr. Georg Henschel. Of the music there is not much to be said in the way of praise. The simple verses are treated in a pretentious style wholly out of keeping with their simple character, and the effect of the work was dull, dry and unimpressive. There was over much of heavy orchestration, and not enough of genuine feeling. Miss Hall's voice is not of an order to impart force and interest to the ballad and a failure was the result. Later in the evening she sang a group of songs by Schubert, and here again her selection was not felicitous, for the songs are among the least pleasing of their composer's efforts. In them, however, she was heard to slightly better advantage, though her voice is hardly of the calibre to produce any striking effect in a large concert room.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night attracted a large audience. The performances began with Gluck's noble overture to "Iphegenie en Aulis." It was badly read, and proved, on the whole, one of the worst perversions of a composer's plain and unmistakable intentions that Mr. Nikisch has as yet ventured upon. The opening bars of the allegro were pumped out at an inexcusably slow pace, and without discernible meaning, except the conductor's desire for new readings of old masters at any cost. Not only this, but it was played with miserable roughness, the group of three notes that occur in the opening bars of the allegro and that are repeated so often, being given in a clumsy, "catch it as you can" fashion that would have done no credit to an ordinary theatre orchestra. The playing of this fine orchestra has steadily degenerated until it is but a shadow of what it once was in regard to finish, precision and purity. Coarseness has become a characteristic of the strings and bad intonation a feature of the wind. There is no longer unity of attack on the part of either strings or wind, owing probably in a large measure to the indecisive but showy way in which the conductor uses his baton. There is too much stick flourishing; too persevering an effort to play the music with the baton instead of using it decisively to beat the time and mark the rhythm, and the consequence is that the players are confused instead of led. In brief, there is too much personal display on the part of the conductor at the expense of the most desirable musical results. But whatever may be the cause, it is certain that the orchestra has sadly deteriorated in style from what it was. Schubert's Symphony in C—the great one—ended the concert. It was fairly read, but here again the playing was lacking in finish, and was rough and noisy. It would seem as if the nucleus of the orchestra had been sustained musically thus far on the magnificent state of discipline in which it had been left by Mr. Gericke, and that it has slowly and surely depreciated until it has reached the unsatisfactory condition in which it now is. The change is inexpressibly saddening. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who gave a masterly reading of Brahms's concerto. His intonation is exquisitely true, his bowing is admirable in its freedom and largeness, and his technique is equal to any demands that may be made on it. Every note comes out with perfect clearness, and the artist plays with equal brilliancy and precision. His cantabile playing is beautiful in its broad simplicity. On the other hand, he is lacking in elegance, his style, though pure, is stolid and pedagogic, and his tone, though full, is too often marred by rasping and scratching. At his best, however, he proved to be an artist well worth the hearing, and his success was overwhelming. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and recalled three times with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Carnival in Paris," Svensden (first time); Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski is to be the soloist, and will play a concerto of his own composition, a waltz and impromptu [illegible] Rhapsodie Hongroise."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1891.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Seventh Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."
Brahms: Violin Concerto in D, Op. 77.
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C.
Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the violinist.

Wagner did more things than one for the overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide;" he wrote a coda to it—the overture, in its original shape, having no ending, but joining on to the first number of the opera—and he invented a theory about the proper way of playing it. Wagner had pet theories about the performing of several classic compositions, some of them being based upon purely technical points in the text. His arguments were always plausible, but, unluckily, seldom convincing. He tried to prove that a certain sforzando mark in the "Freischütz" overture was really a diminuendo mark, and that consequently the coda of the overture ought to begin piano, instead of fortissimo. He noticed that Gluck had not written the word "allegro" after a double-bar in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," and argued that the movement that had always been played allegro ought to go much slower. Other people argued that the omission of the word allegro in the score was only an oversight of Gluck's, who was notoriously careless in his writing. Last Saturday evening Mr. Nikisch gave us an approximate sample of Wagner's idea, and we must say that the notion seems utterly untenable. Gluck could not have meant the movement to go so slowly; it is more than flesh and blood can stand.

The great Schubert Symphony is always a welcome guest; it is not an immaculate work, but it is unquestionably a great one. Except for the last movement, not much is to be said in favor of the performance on Saturday evening. The wind instruments were not in tune, and played roughly; the strings were by no means up to their habitual mark of precision. The Finale, however, was splendidly read, and some of the short, quick crescendos in the strings were immensely effective.

Mr. Brodsky played the wonderful Brahms concerto in a way that showed him to be an artist of very superior ability. His technique, if not to the highest degree polished, is sure, brilliant and facile; his tone is beautiful, except now and then in passages of an impetuous character, in which he is a little liable to scrape. But, intellectually and emotionally, his playing is on a very high plane, as it also has the virtue of holding the attention fast. The audience was rapturous in its applause.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paderewski, pianoforte concerto; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris;" Chopin, impromptu, valse; Liszt, rhapsodie hongroise; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe." Mr. ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As the season advances, Conductor Nikisch seems to be gradually approaching a climax of interest in the make-up of his programmes. So, when he chose Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the new concert master of the New York Damrosch Symphony Orchestra, to act as soloist for last Saturday evening it seemed as though, according to the opinions of musical critics elsewhere, he was the one artist to fill the step next to the phenomenal and only Paderewski, who will bring to Boston next week more originality and genius than has been carried in the head and heart of any musical artist since the appearance of Rubinstein. Mr. Brodsky is a jovial, good-natured, whole-souled looking man, as though he were on the best of terms with his violin and the world, but scarcely impresses one as the student who would resign everything for the perfection of his art; so in his rendition of the severely difficult test of an artist's depth of feeling and expression that is found in the Branm's concerto in D, op. 77, there appeared a certain mixture of worldliness, if one may use such a term, and art that disappointed the ear and mind patiently waiting to be inspired and uplifted beyond the interest of accuracy, fine technique and skillful performance.

The labyrinth of difficulties to be overcome with ease in this concerto is an acquirement to be reached only by a violinist of unusual ability, but beyond that one felt a lack of true greatness.

His cadenza in the allegro more nearly approached the ideal performance than any of the other movements, and the audience showed their approval of his work by giving him three hearty recalls. The orchestral work in Gluck's Iphigenia, with Wagner's ending, was given with a glowing warmth of interpretation and nicety of finish that our magnetic director always draws forth from his responsive co-artists, and the Schubert Symphony in C major No. 9 was rendered in a most masterly manner, all the delightful beauties of composition and original orchestral coloring being given with true appreciation, never overstepping the bounds of a classic or unduly exaggerating an effect.

Every music lover will be on the qui vive to hear Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the incomparable pianist, who will play a concerto of his own, as well as solos from Chopin and Liszt next week, and for a background to this exceptional performer the orchestra will give Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Svendsen's Carnival in Paris and Weber's overture "Euryanthe."

NQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

e 11-29

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second Boston Symphony Concert will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 7, when the following programme will be rendered:

Symphony in A major, No. 7 ..... Beethoven
Concerto for Pinaoforte in D minor. Rubinstein
Prelude, Adagio and Gravotte for String Orchestra (arr. by Bachrich) .... Bach
Overture Euryanthe .... Weber
Soloist .... Mr. Alfred Grunfeld

Mr. Grunfeld will be remembered as the pianist who, with his brother Heinrich, was recently heard with so much pleasure at the Chestnut Street Opera House. He is a remarkably fine player.

43

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 30, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

One could scarcely sympathize very much with the ultra-dramatic Gluck who appeared on the programme on Saturday; the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was overswollen, and an effort was made to introduce modern sensationalism into what should have been a classical specimen of the dawn of dramatic music. It was not the Wagnerian ending which gave this effect to the work, for the great master of dramatic music has evidently written a coda entirely in the vein of his predecessor but it was the palpable desire to make the work more intense than its contents, the effort to give a 19th century color to a composition that should have suggested a purer and more primitive vein, that led to this result. The ensemble was not good, and at times the attacks were very ragged.

Now followed Brahms' violin concerto in D, with Mr. Adolph Brodsky as soloist. The new violinist made an excellent impression. His surety was almost marvellous, the great difficulties of the work considered; his intonation was pure and reliable, even in the highest positions, in the most difficult double-stopped passages, and in the artificial harmonics. There was a solidity about his work that suited the Brahms' style well, and yet there was a sufficiency of feeling displayed in the pastoral simplicity of the second movement. The only fault one could find was that, for the evidently heavy bowing of the artist, there was at times rather a scratchy than a broad tone produced. The orchestral support was demoralized in the second movement, but good in the first, and excellent in the last movement. The concert closed with the great instrumental masterpiece, the C major symphony by Schubert.

Schubert charms, not by any especial development of themes (the musician's delight, and the cornerstone of symphonic treatment) but by beautiful melodies and tasteful contrasts, and therefore his work is always most keenly appreciated by the general public, and is in fact, the neutral ground where musician and non-musician can meet. The symphony is full to the brim with Hungarian touches, a result of Schubert's stay at Zelesz. The horn which began the introduction was played too loudly, and dropped very abruptly from this dynamic force into a pianissimo end, a suddenness of shading which Schubert never contemplated. The grand effect of the trombones in the coda (Schubert certainly understood the use of those instruments better than any of his contemporaries or predecessors, except Mozart) was at first unequal, but ended triumphantly enough; this noble antiphony between tenor and bass trombones is as inspiring as the sound of the clash of warriors' swords. Our orchestra is fortunate in having the proper instruments to give such phrases with (although one might demand a better bass trombone) for many orchestras try to produce the passage with two tenor trombones,—a poor makeshift. The final augmentation of the horn phrase of the introduction, for the movement symmetrically ends as it began, was broadly, but not very unitedly given.

In the second movement the first oboe won the honors, and played its important theme with much delicacy. One need not quarrel with the conductor for having used the blue pencil in this movement, and eliminating one appearance of the chief theme, for the work only gained by the excision, since Schubert often repeated themes unnecessarily. The finale was taken at a furious pace, which bore bad fruit towards the end of it, but at first the strings, upon whom the brunt of the work falls, stood it well. The terrific figure of four accented notes was given with all possible force; it is remarkable to note the way in which Schubert has here reproduced the central thought of the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto.

Summing up the performance of the whole symphony, one can emphatically say that it was an epitome of all the merits and effects of our orchestra as it is at present. There was all possible dash and energy, every iota of the Hungarian spice was preserved, and even added to, and all the delicate refinements of shading were lost. There was plenty of enthusiasm and very little of precision; there was the maximum of breadth, but the minimum of balance. At times the sub-themes disappeared altogether, and the scherzo and its trio were the acme of roughness.

Yet it would be folly to ignore the great value of the fiery and brilliant reading, only the public, which is very prone to value musical pepper above everything else, must learn to know that there are other, subtler, qualities which must not be lost in the obtaining of it. Excess in either direction is to be deprecated; one can also have too much of precision; I can recall a perfectly symmetrical performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth symphony which was spoilt because of its precision, and which would have been glorious with some of that abandon which our present conductor knows so well how to impart to a work, but there seems to be no need that this abandon should cause our orchestra to lose the elegance of performance which it was so many years in acquiring.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Nothing in the shape of novel works was presented at the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert. Nevertheless, one can go home from a concert, after listening to Schubert's great ninth Symphony in C, and to a splendid performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto, opus 77, by one of the greatest violinists now resident in this country, with the feeling that his time has not been ill-spent.

The soloist was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the noted virtuoso, whom Mr. Walter Damrosch was far-seeing enough to secure as concert-master for his new "Symphony Orchestra, of New York." Mr. Brodsky's large, well shaped head, agreeable yet determined cast of countenance, and massive physique, indicating immense reserve force, at once told plainly that the modern Beethoven's tortuous difficulties could have no terrors for him.

Brahms' first thought, when he settles himself for composition, is not to write "thankful" passages. That sounds ambiguous; but it is likely to prove true which ever way it may be construed. Careful consideration of the many murderously difficult mechanical combinations that he has put into his larger works for solo only leaves one in a state of perplexity as to whether his chief aim was to give what he conceived to be adequate expression to certain colossal ideas, or whether it was to create obstacles that would surely stagger all contemporary virtuosos. There are passages in this concerto, for example, that even Mr. Brodsky's strong and skillful hand could not make really musical in effect; that is, unless we throw over all preconceived notions of musical effect which have become second nature through a long season of contact with older and less angular masters and accept Brahms as the only true combiner of musical sounds.

We willingly recognize the nobility of his thought, the greatness of purpose that give to almost every page of his music a character that prevents their being passed over lightly. There is something in even the obscurest of them that enchains the attention, that fascinates, as an ugly yet characterful face first repels and finally enslaves. It is possible that Brahm's creations are the true type of the music of the future. No doubt Beethoven shocked the ears and reason of the great majority of his listeners with equal facility; and as for Schumann, even the present generation is not yet wholly reconciled to his dissonances. But with the Schubert symphony ringing in one's ears, it is hard to believe that Brahms is the true prophet.

Mr. Brodsky's playing was strong, fluent and masterful. There was no lack of courage evinced in attacking some much-to-be-dreaded portions of the concerto, and no apparent evasion of the greatest difficulties. His tone in melodious and sustained passages was full and warm, and his rendering of the last movement was fiery in accent and brilliant in execution. He was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled several times.

The symphony was on the whole splendidly performed, though some of the playing here and there seemed rather perfunctory than zealous in character. The scherzo was especially well given, and from beginning to end Mr. Niksich gave an emphasis to the dramatic side of the work, and threw into relief its gorgeous tone coloring with the sure hand of a born leader. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was the first number, its style contrasting well with the concerto which followed.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall last Monday evening. It was made expressly noteworthy by the performance of a new quintet for piano and strings in E minor, and by the appearance of Mr. Ferrucio B. Busoni, pianist. Christian Sinding is a Norwegian, is thirty years old, and comes from a family talented in the arts. His musical studies were conducted in Christiana, Dresden, Munich and Leipzig; and his compositions include piano pieces, songs and a suite for violin and piano. The quintet is one of the most original, best constructed and attractive new works of this class that have been heard here for a good while. It not only possesses a brilliancy that makes it interesting both to the pianist who likes plenty of opportunities for display and the concert-goer who wants to be pleased without making too much mental exertion, but characteristics which appeal strongly to the musician who listens with the hope of hearing something that indicates talent of an unusual order. The extreme movements are full of strength and fire, and the excellent thematic material is very ingeniously handled. The andante, too, is instinct with feeling and melodic beauty; while the scherzo, like many such movements, is the most fascinating and most directly appealing part of the work. The quintet was magnificently played. The quartet were at their very best, and Mr. Busoni's playing was not only as finished as usual, but was quite in accord with the spirit of the music, which means that it was also imbued with poetic feeling and brilliancy. The other numbers were Haydn's string quartet in D and Schumann's in A, opus 41, both of which were delightfully played. A large and demonstrative audience was present.

RECORD, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-29

Second Boston Symphony Concert

THE SECOND Boston Symphony concert will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 7, when the following programme will be rendered:

Symphony in A major, No. 7, Beethoven.
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, Rubinstein.
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich.......... Bach.
Overture, Euryanthe.......... Weber.
Soloist, Alfred Grunfeld.

Mr. Grunfeld will be remembered as the pianist who, with his brother Heinrich, was recently heard with so much pleasure at the Chestnut Street Opera House. There have been heard here many foreign pianists who were better managed, and better advertised, but none of more solid musicianly attainments.

[63]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, gave the second in their this season's series of chamber concerts in Union Hall. The concert began with a quartet by Haydn in D, a lovely work in its composer's most delightful vein, and fascinating from beginning to end. After all, there is a charm in pure music of this order that is wholly lacking in the labored, self-conscious and feverish music of our time which has pushed it almost out of sight. In the musical reaction that is inevitable at no late date the music of the past is certain to come to the front again, and to renew its influence on the composers of the future. The quartet was exquisitely played, and its performance was a worthy companion to the wonderful interpretation of the Mozart quartet at the previous concert. Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, No. 3, followed, and was perfectly given. Then came a remarkable quintet for strings and piano by Christian Sinding, a Norwegian composer. Its originality is both refreshing and delightful. There is decided novelty in keeping the strings apart as a quartet by themselves, and leaving the piano to its own independent work without marring the unity of the whole. The sustained fire and easy flow of the quintet are astonishing. The scherzo in its wealth of melody, its vicacity and its finely contrasting effects is one of the most strikingly beautiful and masterly bits of writing that contemporary musical art has produced. Its appreciation by the audience was instant and enthusiastic. The playing of the difficult and wholly interesting piano part by Mr. Busoni is above all praise. Nothing could have been more brilliant, more artistic and more able in every essential. The next concert will take place Monday evening, Dec. 28.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall on the evening of the 21st inst., presented several novelties. First was Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," a thoroughly unconventional work, unquestionably strong and effective, but not easy to understand on a single hearing. It is carefully written throughout, and the labor that has been bestowed on it obtrudes itself constantly. The opening portions of the overture are no doubt expressive of the gloomy color of the story they illustrate, and heard before the opera, may prepare the hearer for what is to come; but heard in the concert-room as music pure and simple, they say nothing edifying. There are, however, some exquisite moments of beauty in the work, notably the lovely 'cello theme, which is appealingly tender and refined. The orchestration is rich, and the skill of a master is shown in the discreet and impressive use of tone color. It was well played, and met with a favorable reception. Another novelty was Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Les Vielles de l'Ukraine," a suit for violin and orchestra, and inspired by some stories by the eccentric and debased Russian author Golgol. There are four movements, the first an introduction and pastorale, easy in its melodic flow, delightful in its rhythmic devices, inspiriting in its graceful swing, and musicianlike in all things. It is, perhaps, spun out to somewhat to great a length; in fact, with the exception of the finale, the various movements would be benefited by compression. The second and third movements, though abundant in fine feeling, charming harmonies, and admirable instrumental color are, in their general color, too much alike, and it must be confessed that they result in producing the effect of monotony, despite the beauties in which they abound. The finale is full of life, and brings the whole to an inspiring conclusion. From beginning to end Mr. Loeffler has shown unerring artistic taste, and the work gives him a prominent place among the best of our young resident composers. It is the achievement of a thorough musician, and the same refined judgment that is manifested in the rest of the suite is shown in the writing of the solo part, which is not given up to deliberate virtuoso display, but takes its place in preserving the due balance of the whole. This is a rare virtue in a soloist who composes his own music, and deserves the heartiest recognition. There is one important thing that still remains to be mentioned, and that is the inaudibility of the solo part through a great part of the performance. Mr. Loeffler is not lacking in a fine and searching violin tone, as has been amply evidenced by his playing on Music Hall stage; but on this occasion it did not make itself felt. It is true that the orchestra steadily played over-loud, but the fault is not there. It is to be found in the orchestration, and is to be attributed to the persistent use of the oboe when the solo part is written on the upper part of the violin, and to the equally persistent use of the horn when the solo lies on the lower notes of the violin. In both cases the wind instruments are so closely in sympathy with the violin that they absorb and neutralize its tones when they are kept on the same plane with it, and it is peculiar that nearly all through the work the oboe has been made to prevail when the violin is playing what may be called oboe tones, and the horn when the violin is playing what may in turn be called horn tones. A revision of the score in this repect would, we are sure, restore to the violin the prominence it should maintain, and the work would profit accordingly. The solo part, it will be taken for granted, was played with that elegant finish, warmth of feeling and charm of style that make Mr. Loeffler's performances always interesting and delightful. The artist was welcomed with cordial heartiness, and at the end of the suite was greeted with enthusiastic applause and impetuously recalled. The concert ended with Raff's "Lenore" symphony, which was, on the whole, sympathetically read and acceptably played. Miss Marguerite Hall appeared as a soloist and sang a setting for voice and orchestra of Heine's poem, "There was an Ancient King," by Mr. Georg Henschel. Of the music there is not much to be said in the way of praise. The simple verses are treated in a pretentious style wholly out of keeping with their simple character, and the effect of the work was dull, dry and unimpressive. There was over much of heavy orchestration, and not enough of genuine feeling. Miss Hall's voice is not of an order to impart force and interest to the ballad and a failure was the result. Later in the evening she sang a group of songs by Schubert, and here again her selection was not felicitous, for the songs are among the least pleasing of their composer's efforts. In them, however, she was heard to slightly better advantage, though her voice is hardly of the calibre to produce any striking effect in a large concert room.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night attracted a large audience. The performances began with Gluck's noble overture to "Iphegenie en Aulis." It was badly read, and proved, on the whole, one of the worst perversions of a composer's plain and unmistakable intentions that Mr. Nikisch has as yet ventured upon. The opening bars of the allegro were pumped out at an inexcusably slow pace, and without discernible meaning, except the conductor's desire for new readings of old masters at any cost. Not only this, but it was played with miserable roughness, the group of three notes that occur in the opening bars of the allegro and that are repeated so often, being given in a clumsy, "catch it as you can" fashion that would have done no credit to an ordinary theatre orchestra. The playing of this fine orchestra has steadily degenerated until it is but a shadow of what it once was in regard to finish, precision and purity. Coarseness has become a characteristic of the strings and bad intonation a feature of the wind. There is no longer unity of attack on the part of either strings or wind, owing probably in a large measure to the indecisive but showy way in which the conductor uses his baton. There is too much stick flourishing; too persevering an effort to play the music with the baton instead of using it decisively to beat the time and mark the rhythm, and the consequence is that the players are confused instead of led. In brief, there is too much personal display on the part of the conductor at the expense of the most desirable musical results. But whatever may be the cause, it is certain that the orchestra has sadly deteriorated in style from what it was. Schubert's Symphony in C—the great one—ended the concert. It was fairly read, but here again the playing was lacking in finish, and was rough and noisy. It would seem as if the nucleus of the orchestra had been sustained musically thus far on the magnificent state of discipline in which it had been left by Mr. Gericke, and that it has slowly and surely depreciated until it has reached the unsatisfactory condition in which it now is. The change is inexpressibly saddening. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who gave a masterly reading of Brahms's concerto. His intonation is exquisitely true, his bowing is admirable in its freedom and largeness, and his technique is equal to any demands that may be made on it. Every note comes out with perfect clearness, and the artist plays with equal brilliancy and precision. His cantabile playing is beautiful in its broad simplicity. On the other hand, he is lacking in elegance, his style, though pure, is stolid and pedagogic, and his tone, though full, is too often marred by rasping and scratching. At his best, however, he proved to be an artist well worth the hearing, and his success was overwhelming. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and recalled three times with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen (first time); Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski is to be the soloist, and will play a concerto of his own composition, a waltz and impromptu [illegible] Rhapsodie Hongroise."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1891.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Seventh Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."
Brahms: Violin Concerto in D, Op. 77.
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C.
Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the violinist.

Wagner did more things than one for the overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide;" he wrote a coda to it—the overture, in its original shape, having no ending, but joining on to the first number of the opera—and he invented a theory about the proper way of playing it. Wagner had pet theories about the performing of several classic compositions, some of them being based upon purely technical points in the text. His arguments were always plausible, but, unluckily, seldom convincing. He tried to prove that a certain sforzando mark in the "Freischütz" overture was really a diminuendo mark, and that consequently the coda of the overture ought to begin piano, instead of fortissimo. He noticed that Gluck had not written the word "allegro" after a double-bar in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide,' and argued that the movement that had always been played allegro ought to go much slower. Other people argued that the omission of the word allegro in the score was only an oversight of Gluck's, who was notoriously careless in his writing. Last Saturday evening Mr. Nikisch gave us an approximate sample of Wagner's idea, and we must say that the notion seems utterly untenable. Gluck could not have meant the movement to go so slowly; it is more than flesh and blood can stand.

The great Schubert Symphony is always a welcome guest; it is not an immaculate work, but it is unquestionably a great one. Except for the last movement, not much is to be said in favor of the performance on Saturday evening. The wind instruments were not in tune, and played roughly; the strings were by no means up to their habitual mark of precision. The Finale, however, was splendidly read, and some of the short, quick crescendos in the strings were immensely effective.

Mr. Brodsky played the wonderful Brahms concerto in a way that showed him to be an artist of very superior ability. His technique, if not to the highest degree polished, is sure, brilliant and facile; his tone is beautiful, except now and then in passages of an impetuous character, in which he is a little liable to scrape. But, intellectually and emotionally, his playing is on a very high plane, as it also has the virtue of holding the attention fast. The audience was rapturous in its applause.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paderewski, pianoforte concerto; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris;" Chopin, impromptu, valse; Liszt, rhapsodie hongroise; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe." Mr. ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As the season advances, Conductor Nikisch seems to be gradually approaching a climax of interest in the make-up of his programmes. So, when he chose Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the new concert master of the New York Damrosch Symphony Orchestra, to act as soloist for last Saturday evening it seemed as though, according to the opinions of musical critics elsewhere, he was the one artist to fill the step next to the phenomenal and only Paderewski, who will bring to Boston next week more originality and genius than has been carried in the head and heart of any musical artist since the appearance of Rubinstein. Mr. Brodsky is a jovial, good-natured, whole-souled looking man, as though he were on the best of terms with his violin and the world, but scarcely impresses one as the student who would resign everything for the perfection of his art; so in his rendition of the severely difficult test of an artist's depth of feeling and expression that is found in the Brahm's concerto in D, op. 77, there appeared a certain mixture of worldliness, if one may use such a term, and art that disappointed the ear and mind patiently waiting to be inspired and uplifted beyond the interest of accuracy, fine technique and skillful performance.

The labyrinth of difficulties to be overcome with ease in this concerto is an acquirement to be reached only by a violinist of unusual ability, but beyond that one felt a lack of true greatness.

His cadenza in the allegro more nearly approached the ideal performance than any of the other movements, and the audience showed their approval of his work by giving him three hearty recalls. The orchestral work in Gluck's Iphigenia, with Wagner's ending, was given with a glowing warmth of interpretation and nicety of finish that our magnetic director always draws forth from his responsive co-artists, and the Schubert Symphony in C major No. 9 was rendered in a most masterly manner, all the delightful beauties of composition and original orchestral coloring being given with true appreciation, never overstepping the bounds of a classic or unduly exaggerating an effect.

Every music lover will be on the qui vive to hear Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the incomparable pianist, who will play a concerto of his own, as well as solos from Chopin and Liszt next week, and for a background to this exceptional performer the orchestra will give Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Svendsen's Carnival in Paris and Weber's overture "Euryanthe."

NQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa. 11-29

e ....

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second Boston Symphony Concert will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 7, when the following programme will be rendered:

Symphony in A major, No. 7.... Beethoven
Concerto for Pinaoforte in D minor. Rubinstein
Prelude, Adagio and Gravotte for String Orchestra (arr. by Bachrich).......... Bach
Overture Euryanthe.......... Weber
Soloist.......... Mr. Alfred Grunfeld

Mr. Grunfeld will be remembered as the pianist who, with his brother Heinrich, was recently heard with so much pleasure at the Chestnut Street Opera House. He is a remarkably fine player.

43

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 30, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

One could scarcely sympathize very much with the ultra-dramatic Gluck who appeared on the programme on Saturday; the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was overswollen, and an effort was made to introduce modern sensationalism into what should have been a classical specimen of the dawn of dramatic music. It was not the Wagnerian ending which gave this effect to the work, for the great master of dramatic music has evidently written a coda entirely in the vein of his predecessor but it was the palpable desire to make the work more intense than its contents, the effort to give a 19th century color to a composition that should have suggested a purer and more primitive vein, that led to this result. The ensemble was not good, and at times the attacks were very ragged.

Now followed Brahms' violin concerto in D, with Mr. Adolph Brodsky as soloist. The new violinist made an excellent impression. His surety was almost marvellous, the great difficulties of the work considered; his intonation was pure and reliable, even in the highest positions, in the most difficult double-stopped passages, and in the artificial harmonics. There was a solidity about his work that suited the Brahms' style well, and yet there was a sufficiency of feeling displayed in the pastoral simplicity of the second movement. The only fault one could find was that, for the evidently heavy bowing of the artist, there was at times rather a scratchy than a broad tone produced. The orchestral support was demoralized in the second movement, but good in the first, and excellent in the last movement. The concert closed with the great instrumental masterpiece, the C major symphony by Schubert.

Schubert charms, not by any especial development of themes (the musician's delight, and the cornerstone of symphonic treatment) but by beautiful melodies and tasteful contrasts, and therefore his work is always most keenly appreciated by the general public, and is in fact, the neutral ground where musician and non-musician can meet. The symphony is full to the brim with Hungarian touches, a result of Schubert's stay at Zelesz. The horn which began the introduction was played too loudly, and dropped very abruptly from this dynamic force into a pianissimo end, a suddenness of shading which Schubert never contemplated. The grand effect of the trombones in the coda (Schubert certainly understood the use of those instruments better than any of his contemporaries or predecessors, except Mozart) was at first unequal, but ended triumphantly enough; this noble antiphony between tenor and bass trombones is as inspiring as the sound of the clash of warriors' swords. Our orchestra is fortunate in having the proper instruments to give such phrases with (although one might demand a better bass trombone) for many orchestras try to produce the passage with two tenor trombones,—a poor makeshift. The final augmentation of the horn phrase of the introduction, for the movement symmetrically ends as it began, was broadly, but not very unitedly given.

In the second movement the first oboe won the honors, and played its important theme with much delicacy. One need not quarrel with the conductor for having used the blue pencil in this movement, and eliminating one appearance of the chief theme, for the work only gained by the excision, since Schubert often repeated themes unnecessarily. The finale was taken at a furious pace, which bore bad fruit towards the end of it, but at first the strings, upon whom the brunt of the work falls, stood it well. The terrific figure of four accented notes was given with all possible force; it is remarkable to note the way in which Schubert has here reproduced the central thought of the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto.

Summing up the performance of the whole symphony, one can emphatically say that it was an epitome of all the merits and effects of our orchestra as it is at present. There was all possible dash and energy, every iota of the Hungarian spice was preserved, and even added to, and all the delicate refinements of shading were lost. There was plenty of enthusiasm and very little of precision; there was the maximum of breadth, but the minimum of balance. At times the sub-themes disappeared altogether, and the scherzo and its trio were the acme of roughness.

Yet it would be folly to ignore the great value of the fiery and brilliant reading, only the public, which is very prone to value musical pepper above everything else, must learn to know that there are other, subtler, qualities which must not be lost in the obtaining of it. Excess in either direction is to be deprecated; one can also have too much of precision; I can recall a perfectly symmetrical performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth symphony which was spoilt because of its precision, and which would have been glorious with some of that abandon which our present conductor knows so well how to impart to a work, but there seems to be no need that this abandon should cause our orchestra to lose the elegance of performance which it was so many years in acquiring.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible]

[illegible] NOV. 29, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Violinist Adolph Brodsky Receives Favorable Consideration.

The seventh in the series of symphony concerts was given in Music Hall last evening, and cordial plaudits were won from an audience which, as usual, taxed the capacity of the hall. The programme offered no novelties, but Bostonians heard for the first time Mr. Adolph Brodsky, a violinist who recently came from Russia to become the concert meister of the New York Symphony Society.

He played the exacting but not always enjoyable Brahms concerto for violin and orchestra in D. Only an artist of conscious ability would care to essay the performance of such a work before the Symphony orchestra. To state that he won enthusiastic applause and three recalls is a stronger indorsement of his playing than could be given in the few words of review possible in the limited space obtainable in this morning's paper.

His technique is, of course, above reproach, for no violinist could at this day obtain distinction who had not mastered the mechanics of his art. His tone is good, and he phrases with artistic effect and musicianly judgment.

Gluck's overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's ending, and Schubert's symphony in C, No. 9, were the welcome offerings by the orchestra. More pleasing readings of this lovely symphony have been heard here than were offered yesterday by Mr. Nikisch, but the performance was generally satisfactory.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Poderewski; carnival in Paris, Svendsen; solos for piano, impromptu, Chopin; valse, Chopin; rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt; overture "Euryanthe," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave Mr. Adolph Brodsky, concert master of the Damrosch orchestra of New York, an introduction to Boston, and the selection he made was the concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, by Brahms.

Possibly the advance information supplied in regard to the new player led to an excessive estimate of his abilities. Certain it is that there was a feeling of disappointment as he concluded his task. He is a remarkably accurate player, and is easily the master of even the maze of technical difficulties which Brahms has introduced into the opening and final movements of this concerto. He met the requirements of the opening allegro most satisfactorily, though at times his tone was pushed beyond a musical quality, and became far from pleasing. The adagio, while being given with mechanical accuracy, lacked the expression, sentiment and refinement demanded for a perfect interpretation of its beauty, and the playing in the rondo had little of the brilliancy which should characterize its performance. Mr. Brodsky has no reason to complain of the reception given him, however, and he was complimented with the usual recalls after the concerto.

Mr. Nikisch began his programme with Gluck's overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (with Wagner's ending), which he read with excellent taste, and ended it with an admirable performance of the ever enjoyable C major symphony No. 9, by Schubert.

Next week's concert will introduce Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist, in an original concerto and solo numbers by Chopin and Liszt.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11/28

Mme. Lillian Nordica is one of the few really great sopranos to be heard in Cincinnati this season. That she is to appear in concert at the Odeon Monday evening is a fact due to the management of the College of Music subscription series of concerts. It is said that Mme. Nordica is even more marvelous in the power, range and flexibility of voice than when last heard here. It will be remembered with delight the impression she then created upon music lovers. She comes to Cincinnati fresh with triumphs from critical Boston and New York, where, in conjunction with the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, the concert season was given a most auspicious opening. At the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, Mme. Nordica was accorded an ovation rarely ever before shown any of the renowned artists who have appeared on that stage. Of the local artists who will assist Mme. Nordica—Signor Gorno, pianist; Signor Mattioli, violoncellist, and Prof. Benj. Guckenberger, the accompanist, nothing further than the mere mention of their names is necessary to insure lovers of music a really enjoyable concert of high artistic attainments.

STAR, Washington, D. C.

Date 12-2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be welcomed by a great number of admirers of that superb organization. The destruction of Metzerott Hall threatened for a time to deprive the public of these entertainments, which have become a leading feature of each musical season.

By arrangement with the music committee of the Congregational Church the concerts are to be given in the church under their auspices. The dates are Wednesday evenings, December 9, January 13, February 10, March 16 and April 27. Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman and other distinguished soloists will appear in the series. [illegible] season tickets will open next Satur[illegible] Ellis & Co.'s, 937 Penn[illegible]

N. Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY.

Sonnabend, den 28. November 1891.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Aus Providence, R. I.

Providence, 26. Nov. 1891.

Es ſoll uns freuen, wenn die Manager der verſchiedenen Konzertgeſellſchaften die Kraft des hieſigen muſikaliſchen Publikums nicht unterſchätzt haben. Es iſt ein gefährliches Spiel, den Providencern womöglich jeden Abend ein Konzert zu bieten, wenn es aber zu zwei Konzerten an einem Abend kommt und ſich dieſes Ereigniß drei oder noch mehrere Male wiederholt, dann wird es gefährlich. Wir wollen aber doch der raſch pulſirenden Mannigfaltigkeit der Konzerte die vollſte Anerkennung zollen, da dieſelbe für die Zunahme des populären Muſikverſtändniſſes von weittragendſter Bedeutung iſt, daß dieſelbe aber für die Taſchen der Manager einträglich iſt, möxten wir beinahe bezweifeln und halten wir für kaum möglich.

Das zweite Konzert des Boston Symphony Orcheſters gab uns wieder den erfreulichſten Beweis von der Gediegenheit des Orcheſters. Daß dieſe Konzerte jetzt „populär" werden, bezeugt der anwachſende Beſuch derſelben. Das muſikaliſche Publikum in unſerer Stadt iſt ſehr konſervativ und erſt, wenn es überzeugt wird, daß ihm von Allem nur Gutes geboten wird, iſt es zu bewegen, Konzerte zu beſuchen.

Frau Arthur Nikiſch, eine mit reicher Erfahrung ausgeſtattete Sängerin, triumphirte unter großem Beifall mit ihren gut gewählten Solis. Der Violoncelliſt Schröder brachte ſeine Solis in befriedigender Weiſe zu Gehör, doch war die Auswahl ſeiner Nummern von muſikaliſchem Standpunkte, außer Bach's „Sarabande", nicht auf der Höhe eines gediegenen und gewiſſenhaften Muſikers.

H. M.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11/30

To-night the Nordica-Gorno-Mattioli concert at the Odeon in the College of Music subscription series. Madam Lillian Nordica is one of the vocalists of to-day, taking high rank as a soprano. As soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra she was a potent factor in assisting to the brilliancy of the season. Signor Albino Gorno's powers as a pianist are well recognized. He takes high rank in the profession. His forte lies in the interpretation of brilliant selections, and he will be a strength with Nordica on the programme.

But this is not all, for Signor Lino Mattioli, the already famous 'cellist, is one of the tripartite attraction, and with Benj. Guckenberger as accompanist, finish is promised in that direction. Nordica will be heard in the aria "La Reine de Saba" from Gounod, the polacca from "Mignon," and in the nocturne of Chopin, in which she will be accompanied by Messrs. Mattioli and Guckenberger. Gorno will play the "Variation Serieuse" of Mendelssohn, the "Bells of Geneva" from Liszt, and the Kermiss from the Faust of St. Saens. Mattioli's numbers will be the Romance in A, from Schubert, the "Spinning Song" (Pepper) and the "Chanson Grecque" of Seligman. A charming programme truly.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 12/2

The First Orchestra Concert.

The first of the series of orchestra concerts will be given at Music Hall tomorrow beginning with a matinee at 2.45 P. M., for which the small sum of 25 cents is charged. The evening concert will commence at 8. The soloist, Mme. Lillian Nordica, is conceded to be one of the greatest singers in this country. The program for both concerts is as follows.

Symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet" .... John Srndsen
Aria from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Chas. Gounod
Mme. Lillian Nordica.
Suite Sylvia .... L. Delibes
La belle dormant aux bois... P. Tschaikowsky
Melody for string orchestra .... Edw. Grieg
Intermezzo surfonics from "Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Pietro Mascagni
Aria from "Tannhaeuser" .... Wagner
Mme. Nordica.
Overture, "Rienzi" .... Wagner

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1891.

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet Club will give its second concert this season in Sherry's new concert hall, Thirty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, on Friday evening, December 11, with the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist. The program is as follows: Quartet in D, Haydn; quartet in A, opus 41, No. 3, Schumann; quintet for piano and strings in E minor, Sinding, first time in New York.

Boston Symphony Concert.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert this season at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening, December 8. The program is as follows: Symphony poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; concerto for violoncello in A minor, opus 33, Volkmann; unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert; prelude, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 3, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

E. A. MACDOWELL.	SUITE in A minor, op. 42. IN A HAUNTED FOREST. (Largamente misterioso; Allegro furioso; Maestoso). SUMMER IDYL. (Allegretto grazioso). THE SHEPHERDESS SONG. (Andantino, Semplice). FOREST SPIRITS. (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).
RUBINSTEIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G major. Moderato con moto.—Andante.—Allegro.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in A, No. 7. Poco sostennto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

SOLOIST:

MADAME HELEN HOPEKIRK.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 12-1

The Kneisel Quartet Club will have the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio Bussoni, pianist, at their next concert in Sherry's new concert hall, Thirty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, on Friday evening, December 11. Haydn's quartet in D, Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, No. 3, and a quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E minor, by Sinding, given for the first time in New York, constitute the programme.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Violinist Adolph Brodsky Receives Favorable Consideration.

The seventh in the series of symphony concerts was given in Music Hall last evening, and cordial plaudits were won from an audience which, as usual, taxed the capacity of the hall. The programme offered no novelties, but Bostonians heard for the first time Mr. Adolph Brodsky, a violinist who recently came from Russia to become the concert meister of the New York Symphony Society.

He played the exacting but not always enjoyable Brahms concerto for violin and orchestra in D. Only an artist of conscious ability would care to essay the performance of such a work before the Symphony orchestra. To state that he won enthusiastic applause and three recalls is a stronger indorsement of his playing than could be given in the few words of review possible in the limited space obtainable in this morning's paper.

His technique is, of course, above reproach, for no violinist could at this day obtain distinction who had not mastered the mechanics of his art. His tone is good, and he phrases with artistic effect and musicianly judgment.

Gluck's overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's ending, and Schubert's symphony in C, No. 9, were the welcome offerings by the orchestra. More pleasing readings of this lovely symphony have been heard here than were offered yesterday by Mr. Nikisch, but the performance was generally satisfactory.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Poderewski; carnival in Paris, Svendsen; solos for piano, impromptu, Chopin; valse, Chopin; rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt; overture "Euryanthe," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave Mr. Adolph Brodsky, concert master of the Damrosch orchestra of New York, an introduction to Boston, and the selection he made was the concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, by Brahms.

Possibly the advance information supplied in regard to the new player led to an excessive estimate of his abilities. Certain it is that there was a feeling of disappointment as he concluded his task. He is a remarkably accurate player, and is easily the master of even the maze of technical difficulties which Brahms has introduced into the opening and final movements of this concerto. He met the requirements of the opening allegro most satisfactorily, though at times his tone was pushed beyond a musical quality, and became far from pleasing. The adagio, while being given with mechanical accuracy, lacked the expression, sentiment and refinement demanded for a perfect interpretation of its beauty, and the playing in the rondo had little of the brilliancy which should characterize its performance. Mr. Brodsky has no reason to complain of the reception given him, however, and he was complimented with the usual recalls after the concerto.

Mr. Nikisch began his programme with Gluck's overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (with Wagner's ending), which he read with excellent taste, and ended it with an admirable performance of the ever enjoyable C major symphony No. 9, by Schubert.

Next week's concert will introduce Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist, in an original concerto and solo numbers by Chopin and Liszt.

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11/28

Mme. Lillian Nordica is one of the few really great sopranos to be heard in Cincinnati this season. That she is to appear in concert at the Odeon Monday evening is a fact due to the management of the College of Music subscription series of concerts. It is said that Mme. Nordica is even more marvelous in the power, range and flexibility of voice than when last heard here. It will be remembered with delight the impression she then created upon music lovers. She comes to Cincinnati fresh with triumphs from critical Boston and New York, where, in conjunction with the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, the concert season was given a most auspicious opening. At the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, Mme. Nordica was accorded an ovation rarely ever before shown any of the renowned artists who have appeared on that stage. Of the local artists who will assist Mme. Nordica—Signor Gorno, pianist; Signor Mattioli, violoncellist, and Prof. Benj. Guckenberger, the accompanist, nothing further than the mere mention of their names is necessary to insure lovers of music a really enjoyable concert of high artistic attainments.

STAR, Washington, D. C.

Date 12-2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be welcomed by a great number of admirers of that superb organization. The destruction of Metzerott Hall threatened for a time to deprive the public of these entertainments, which have become a leading feature of each musical season.

By arrangement with the music committee of the Congregational Church the concerts are to be given in the church under their auspices. The dates are Wednesday evenings, December 9, January 13, February 10, March 16 and April 27. Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman and other distinguished soloists will appear in the series. The sale of season tickets will open next Saturday morning at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s, 937 Pennsylvania avenue.

N.-Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY,

Sonnabend, den 28. November 1891.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Aus Providence, R. I.

Providence, 26. Nov. 1891.

Es ſoll uns freuen, wenn die Manager der verſchiedenen Konzertgeſellſchaften die Kraft des hieſigen muſikaliſchen Publikums nicht unterſchätzt haben. Es iſt ein gefährliches Spiel, den Providencern womöglich jeden Abend ein Konzert zu bieten, wenn es aber zu zwei Konzerten an einem Abend kommt und ſich dieſes Ereigniß drei oder noch mehrere Male wiederholt, dann wird es gefährlich. Wir wollen aber doch der raſch pulſirenden Mannigfaltigkeit der Konzerte die vollſte Anerkennung zollen, da dieſelbe für die Zunahme des populären Muſikverſtändniſſes von weittragendſter Bedeutung iſt, daß dieſelbe aber für die Taſchen der Manager einträglich iſt, möchten wir beinahe bezweifeln und halten wir für kaum möglich.

Das zweite Konzert des Boſton Symphony Orcheſters gab uns wieder den erfreulichſten Beweis von der Gediegenheit des Orcheſters. Daß dieſe Konzerte jetzt „populär" werden, bezeugt der anwachſende Beſuch derſelben. Das muſikaliſche Publikum in unſerer Stadt iſt ſehr konſervativ und erſt, wenn es überzeugt wird, daß ihm von Allem nur Gutes geboten wird, iſt es zu bewegen, Konzerte zu beſuchen.

Frau Arthur Nikiſch, eine mit reicher Erfahrung ausgeſtattete Sängerin, triumphirte unter großem Beifall mit ihren gut gewählten Solis. Der Violoncelliſt Schröder brachte ſeine Solis in befriedigender Weiſe zu Gehör, doch war die Auswahl ſeiner Nummern von muſikaliſchem Standpunkte, außer Bach's „Sarabande", nicht auf der Höhe eines gediegenen und gewiſſenhaften Muſikers.

H. M.

◆

TIMES-STAR, Cincinnati, O.

Date 11/30

To-night the Nordica-Gorno-Mattioli concert at the Odeon in the College of Music subscription series. Madam Lillian Nordica is one of the vocalists of to-day, taking high rank as a soprano. As soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra she was a potent factor in assisting to the brilliancy of the season. Signor Albino Gorno's powers as a pianist are well recognized. He takes high rank in the profession. His forte lies in the interpretation of brilliant selections, and he will be a strength with Nordica on the programme.

But this is not all, for Signor Lino Mattioli, the already famous 'cellist, is one of the tripartite attraction, and with Benj. Guckenberger as accompanist, finish is promised in that direction. Nordica will be heard in the aria "La Reine de Saba" from Gounod, the polacca from "Mignon," and in the nocturne of Chopin, in which she will be accompanied by Messrs. Mattioli and Guckenberger. Gorno will play the "Variation Serieuse" of Mendelssohn, the "Bells of Geneva" from Liszt, and the Kermiss from the Faust of St. Saens. Mattioli's numbers will be the Romance in A, from Schubert, the "Spinning Song" (Pepper) and the "Chanson Grecque" of Seligman. A charming programme truly.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 12/2

The First Orchestra Concert.

The first of the series of orchestra concerts will be given at Music Hall tomorrow beginning with a matinee at 2.45 P. M., for which the small sum of 25 cents is charged. The evening concert will commence at 8. The soloist, Mme. Lillian Nordica, is conceded to be one of the greatest singers in this country. The program for both concerts is as follows.

Symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet"	John Srndsen
Aria from "The Queen of Sheba"	Chas. Gounod
Mme. Lillian Nordica.
Suite Sylvia	L. Delibes
La belle dormant aux bois	P. Tschaikowsky
Melody for string orchestra	Edw. Grieg
Intermezzo surfonics from "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Pietro Mascagni
Aria from "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Mme. Nordica.
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

A WEEKLY PAPER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1891.

Kneisel Quartet.—The Kneisel Quartet Club will give its second concert this season in Sherry's new concert hall, Thirty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, on Friday evening, December 11, with the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist. The program is as follows: Quartet in D, Haydn; quartet in A, opus 41, No. 3, Schumann; quintet for piano and strings in E minor, Sinding, first time in New York.

Boston Symphony Concert.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert this season at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening, December 8. The program is as follows: Symphony poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; concerto for violoncello in A minor, opus 33, Volkmann; unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert; prelude, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891--92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 3, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

E. A. MACDOWELL.	SUITE in A minor, op. 42. IN A HAUNTED FOREST. (Largamente misterioso; Allegro furioso; Maestoso). SUMMER IDYL. (Allegretto grazioso). THE SHEPHERDESS SONG. (Andantino, Semplice). FOREST SPIRITS. (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).
RUBINSTEIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G major. Moderato con moto.—Andante.—Allegro.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in A, No. 7. Poco sostennto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

SOLOIST:

MADAME HELEN HOPEKIRK.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 12-1

The Kneisel Quartet Club will have the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio Bussoni, pianist, at their next concert in Sherry's new concert hall, Thirty-seventh street and Fifth avenue, on Friday evening, December 11. Haydn's quartet in D, Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, No. 3, and a quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E minor, by Sinding, given for the first time in New York, constitute the programme.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

••• Season of 1891-92. •••

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Dec. 6, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Dec. 7, at 7 A.M. Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Dec. 8, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 9, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7 05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrolton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Dec. 10, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Dec. 10, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, Dec. 11, at 7 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Dec. 12, at 8 P.M.

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues. Take Flatbush Avenue Horse-cars at Fulton Street.

Arrive Boston Sunday, Dec. 13, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, December 5, 1891.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1891

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventh concert was given before the usual magnificent audience. The program was: Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck; concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 77, Brahms; symphony in C major, Schubert. Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the soloist.

The performance of the overture was the least satisfactory of any rendering of an important work yet given by Mr. Nikisch. The exceeding roughness of the strings, the untunefulness of the wood wind and the entire lack of precision in the brass throughout the concert, call to mind painfully the extraordinary precision in the attack and beautiful tonal quality of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The opening bars of the overture were taken so slowly that the effect was a sentimentality entirely foreign to all traditional readings of the work. The allegro though taken at the proper tempo was greatly marred by the rasping fortissimos in which the various sections of strings seemed to vie with one another.

Mr. Brodsky is a violinist of magnificent parts. His tone is broad and full, his bowing remarkably free, his intonation all but perfect, and his technique fully equal to the demands of the amazing difficulties of the Brahms concerto, but much harm is done to the many fine qualities here enumerated by an over inclination to roughness, which in the cadenza of the first movement (Mr. Brodsky's own we believe) very seriously marred the effect of the entire allegro non troppo. Mr. Brodsky's best work was in the adagio, which was given with rare grace and that breadth only possessed by the greatest virtuosos. His success was unqualified and he was three times recalled. Mr. Nikisch redeemed himself by a fine reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major. The opening theme played in unison by the two horns was perfectly done, being in striking contrast to the coarse work of the horns in the Lenore symphony last week. The clumsiness of the heavy brass instruments is becoming proverbial. Their sound is articulated evidently an instant later than that of the rest of the orchestra. This was very evident throughout the symphony and was a severe blemish upon what would otherwise have been a notably fine rendition. Mr. Nikisch wisely omitted the long repetitions in the first and last movements. The program of the eighth concert will be as follows:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 4
Paderewski	Concerto for Pianoforte
Svendsen	Carnival in Paris

(FIRST TIME.)

Soli for Piano.

a Chopin	Impromptu
b Chopin	Valse
c Liszt	Rhapsodie Hongroise
Weber	Overture, "Euryanthe"

Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

THE COMMONWEALTH.
ESTABLISHED IN 1862.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER, 5, 1891.

After the riot of latter-day romantic music a fortnight ago, Mr. Nikisch's programme last Saturday seemed a severely classic one. Gluck's music is much too seldom heard in America, and the overture to 'Iphigeneia in Aulis' was most welcome. It was artistically, warmly and dramatically played—a bit too warmly perhaps; for somehow, with all its appeal to the emotions, Gluck's music has a touch of austerity, a sort of unworldly purity and severe beauty, akin to that of the Greek drama and especially difficult of interpretation. Mr. Nikisch, moreover, chose to use Wagner's amended score. It was well enough, perhaps, for Wagner to add a coda; but why, forsooth, should he tinker Gluck? 'There were kings before Agamemnŏn.' The more familiar symphony (No. 9 in C) by Schubert, in its gentleness, tenderness, occasional playfulness and pervading delicacy was an excellent foil to the overture. Its performance, however, was sadly uneven, now thoroughly good and now condemnably careless. Mr. Adolf Brodsky, the first violin of Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, played the Brahms concerto, a work better suited to his powers than to those of most violinists. His technique, of which, it goes without saying, the concerto gave ample proof, is excellent, at times even brilliant; he understands and interprets the abstract and purely intellectual qualities of Brahms's music; but he is manifestly deficient in warmth of feeling.

Ignaz Jan Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist, will be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony rehearsal and concert this week. To-night he will play his own concerto, a waltz and an impromptu by Chopin and one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. Next Wednesday night, December 9, at Music Hall, he will appear with Walter Damrosch's orchestra, playing altogether with orchestra. On Monday afternoon next, also at Music Hall, he begins a series of recitals with a representative programme from Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt. Other recitals will be given on the afternoons of December 8, 23, 28 and 29.

The programme for the Symphony concert to-night includes, beside the concerto and the shorter pieces for Paderewski, Weber's overture 'Euryanthe,' Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris' (first time) and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1891.

PADEREWSKI.

The Thin Man From Poland Conquers Boston.

The eighth Symphony Concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme included Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Weber's overture "Euryanthe." Mr. Paderewski was the pianist, and he was heard in his own concerto as well as in the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the Chopin waltz in C sharp minor and the twelfth rhapsodie and the "Campanella" of Liszt, which latter piece was played in response to the unbounded applause.

The fact that the concert of Saturday evening was primarily a symphony concert was apparently forgotten. Orchestra, director and purely orchestral music were all absorbed in the display of the personality of Ignace Jan Paderewski. Many fretted through the symphony, for they waited for Paderewski. Svendsen's "Carnival" was heard for the first time, and with its charming episodes and its ingenious instrumentation it would no doubt have excited attention on any other occasion, but Paderewski followed it, and it was nought. Even the fiery opening of the overture seemed tame after the Hungarian tumult that had just shaken the keys of the pianoforte. Nor is all this surprising, nor is it to be deplored. For the scene of excitement was not merely a triumph of virtuosoship; it was the revelation of an extraordinary individuality.

Pianists rise constantly above the musical horizon. Some shine with a steady and a serene light. Others dazzle for a season, "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." And even the greatest of them differ, as one star differeth from another star in glory. Perfection of mechanism, absolute technique, massive chords and electrical bravura—these no longer compel extraordinary admiration; they are expected, they are demanded. But the manner in which the mechanism is used, the physical and mental character of the man that stands as an interpreter between the composer and the hearer—these distinguish a pianist of to-day and set him apart. It is individuality, or temperament, or call it what you will, that exalts a few above their fellows. Now the individuality of Paderewski is unnatural, almost supernatural.

We all heard of this man before he crossed the ocean. The trumpet of his fame was blown with no uncertain sound. The story of his triumphs was shouted from the house tops. Yet these triumphs were not without alloy. The Berlin critics, who too often look at strangers askew, whispered in his ear that he was mortal. They argued from the arrangement of his hair that he was a dealer in the sensational. He was the lion of the season in Paris; and some—as Pougin—were bold enough to say that occasionally in his playing he shook a mane twisted in curl papers and showed neatly trimmed claws that he might not frighten the women who crowded the hall to hear him roar. In London he swept everything before him, and he received the honor of a caricature in Punch.

At last he came upon the stage of Music Hall, this strange being whose fiery temperament seems to have been poured into a frail body as a dangerous liquid into a Venetian glass. A romantic player, he recalls the legends loved by the old romantic school; the unknown teacher of the Sirens; the tamer of were-wolves; Hunold Singuf, who charmed the rats and the women and children of Hameln; Rath Krespel, who broke open violins and hunted their souls. Tall, thin, with eyes that seem to shed no light, with prominent cheek-bones and an apologetic chin, with a nimbus of hair of "orange shading into old gold," with feline step and bearing—here is one whom Hoffman might have dreamed of when at midnight the spirits tried to stop his pen. Without affectation, for no designed eccentricity could accentuate his personality; modest, for he knows full well his power—he could spare a little of his mechanism without throwing dice for success.

He was heard in works of the modern and the romantic school, and it is possible, nay probable, that as all other pianists, he has his limitations; but he is none the less remarkable, if this turns out to be true. Surely last Saturday he gave abundant evidence in support of his reputation. But how is it possible to describe his playing? Take down all the adjectives of praise from the shelf, dust them and arrange them properly; they are not worth a pure, full and liquid tone of his cantabile or a flash of his bravura. Prismatic words grow dull and pale, and the devices of the rhapsodist are in vain. Or put it under the microscope, or subject it to analytical tests. Call attention to his marvelous use of the pedals; point out the devitalization of certain portions of the arms by which he gains effects, or tell of any of his mechanical processes; can you thus convey to one that did not hear him, the strength, the beauty, the charm of his performance? Let it be admitted that he occasionally pounded, as in the rhapsodie; that in the waltz, delightful as it was, there was perhaps too great a desire to say something new; what then is left to the severest critic as a legitimate subject for fault-finding? This androgynal pianist combines the qualities most esteemed in man and woman—strength and beauty, manliness and grace. His phrasing is that of a born composer; he has the poet's taste; and his great mechanism serves simply to present adequately his thoughts, that they may be understood.

This much is certainly true of his first performance, and the scenes of enthusiasm that followed each and every number are of rare occurrence in this town. But Paderewski has not yet been heard here in the works of Beethoven or Schumann or their predecessors. He will give several recitals, the first this afternoon. The opening chapters of his continued story are strong and impressive. A final judgment should not be pronounced before all of his characters are introduced and play their parts to the end.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1891.

Paderewski at the Symphony Concert.

There were none of the effects and impressions of an orthodox symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening. There was a Paderewski concert, and this to be sure is a very new kind of concert. It is a concert in which the man Paderewski might easily upset almost any rules of music that have heretofore fettered the human mind, and his divine right to do so would be accepted with but the slightest questioning. Such indeed was Paderewski with the music that he played. It is not of present import that he did not play any such representative work as appeals to the understanding, such for example as Beethoven's op. 53, 57 or 106, the great Mozart concerto in D minor, or the equally great Brahms concerto in B minor. To judge an artist from the point of view of any such art work as he does not attempt to perform, and to either praise or condemn him accordingly, is a habit that prevails among certain young students in this vicinity, who are too apt to leave a concert hall after hearing a great artist just as though they "know everything"—to quote our country store philosopher, the late Josh Billings "but who really know nothing except how to spill 'vittles' on their clothes." So, if there are any of these barnacle critics in this city just at the present time, as there have been upon so many occasions when great artists have been here, it is to be hoped that they may respect the pianoforte playing of Paderewski none the less as they bear in mind the very opportune suggestion of the late Mr. Billings.

It should be stated, furthermore, that the Paderewski who played in New York to Boston musicians and a New York audience, on Nov. 24, and the Parerewski who played in Music Hall Saturday evening, are in no spiritual acceptation of the term quite the same. Not to be too paradoxical the fault of the Paderewski of the first occasion seemed with just such individualism for Bach, Beethoven, and Schumann as was then both superfluous and inartistic, but that for Paderewski, the composer, and Chopin and Liszt on Saturday evening was superbly meritorious. The Latin word genius had a particular application to him at the concert referred to in New York, in that the word originally signified the divine nature which is innate in all human beings.

In a far broader sense is Paderewski a genius, for he proved himself equal on Saturday evening to an inherently able interpretation of just the divine nature that one finds imbedded in any great art-work. There can be no two opinions as to the merit of the artist's first appearance before a Boston audience. With his own concerto, and none the less with the music of Chopin and Liszt, he magnificently set forth that he has something more than "talent which is in man's possession." He also has, to quote the lamented James Russell Lowell, the very "genius in whose possession man is."

We should not forget that this man's genius made its first Boston appearance many months ago, when Mme. Julie Rivé-King most ably played his concerto at one of the symphony concerts, and with all respect to any performer who might have played it before, one can but feel that the work was heard here for the first time from the composer himself on Saturday evening. This work plainly addresses itself to the imagination through the senses. In it there is far greater symmetry of form than one is apt to find in almost any other modern concerto. Either one of the concertos of Liszt, for example, is simply a virtuoso's concertos. Quite to the reverse, there will abundantly be found in the work that was performed on Saturday evening just such art-contents, as in the proper adjustment of the high and the low, the long and the short tones of music, is a charming masterpiece.

Even the hypercritical Heraclitus of old might easily perceive the fundamental art-principles upon which this concerto is founded; for the fundamental principles of art have been the same for ages, and are much the same in sculpture and painting as in music. The work is neither strange nor bold. It is a normal art work. The time has passed, let us bear in mind, when one can reasonably expect that there will be created any musical composition that is really and completley new. Now Paderewski is by no means fastidious in aiming for the mere effects of originality. He prefers instead to invest his creations with just such charms of naturalness as are at least synonyms of some actual newness in art. The first allegro, perhaps, bears less the impress of deep thought than of real sentiment. In the second movement especially there is a fine, broad and original vein of melody which, with all its heart feeling, is wonderfully supported by the artistic skill of a real master.

Of the three movements it seems but natural that the finale should have been most favorably received, as its spirit throughout with all its lively, fresh and vigorous rhythms is exceedingly lighthearted and joyous. Here, as in other portions of the work, the composer has had his say in a perfectly natural and straightforward manner, yet with all the musical genius, and no less with all the vigor, skill and propriety of a whole souled and superbly educated musician. The performance of it was correspondingly great, whether or not when rated by the extraordinary technique that the pianist displayed, or from the psychologist's standpoint. In polyphonic passages especially, Mr. Paderewski is amazingly successful in bringing out the theme whenever it appears. Not only with his own concerto, but later in the evening his ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising difficulties was no less effective than was the swaying, swinging, piquant, buoyancy with which for example he treated the waltz in C sharp minor by Chopin. With Liszt's Campanella which he played for an encore, there was the nicest elasticity, promptness and accuracy noticeable in his treatment of the skips.

Paderewski's fortissimos it is true are occasionally somewhat harsh and bawdish. On the other hand, no such perfectly clear, limpid, far reaching and ethereal pianissimi were probably never heard in a Boston music hall as on Saturday evening, not even from Thalberg. An inexplicable feature of his success, too, is that his virtuosic resources are on such intimate terms with his will. Yes, his pearly, drop-like whispering touch often responds with ethereal effect to the delicately fine and artistic feeling of the singing artist that he unquestionably is.

Last season a phenominal pianist with a "one story intellect" created an extraordinary sensation at one of the symphonies. It is a pleasure to bear record that he is followed this year by a far greater pianist with the "three story intellect," of the pianist, musician and composer. Paderewski created the most impressive sensation on Saturday evening that Boston has experienced from any musical artist since Rubinstein was here. The concert began with Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was delightfully played, and the programme also included the "Carnival of Paris," music by Saint Saens, and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1891–92.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Dec. 6, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Dec. 7, at 7 A.M. Broad Street Station Penna. R R.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Dec. 8, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 9, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7 05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrolton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Dec. 10, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Dec. 10, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, Dec. 11, at 7 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Dec. 12, at 8 P.M.

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues. Take Flatbush Avenue Horse-cars at Fulton Street.

Arrive Boston Sunday, Dec. 13, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, December 5, 1891.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1891

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventh concert was given before the usual magnificent audience. The program was: Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck; concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 77, Brahms; symphony in C major, Schubert. Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the soloist.

The performance of the overture was the least satisfactory of any rendering of an important work yet given by Mr. Nikisch. The exceeding roughness of the strings, the untunefulness of the wood wind and the entire lack of precision in the brass throughout the concert, call to mind painfully the extraordinary precision in the attack and beautiful tonal quality of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The opening bars of the overture were taken so slowly that the effect was a sentimentality entirely foreign to all traditional readings of the work. The allegro though taken at the proper tempo was greatly marred by the rasping fortissimos in which the various sections of strings seemed to vie with one another.

Mr. Brodsky is a violinist of magnificent parts. His tone is broad and full, his bowing remarkably free, his intonation all but perfect, and his technique fully equal to the demands of the amazing difficulties of the Brahms concerto, but much harm is done to the many fine qualities here enumerated by an over inclination to roughness, which in the cadenza of the first movement (Mr. Brodsky's own we believe) very seriously marred the effect of the entire allegro non troppo. Mr. Brodsky's best work was in the adagio, which was given with rare grace and that breadth only possessed by the greatest virtuosos. His success was unqualified and he was three times recalled. Mr. Nikisch redeemed himself by a fine reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major. The opening theme played in unison by the two horns was perfectly done, being in striking contrast to the coarse work of the horns in the Lenore symphony last week. The clumsiness of the heavy brass instruments is becoming proverbial. Their sound is articulated evidently an instant later than that of the rest of the orchestra. This was very evident throughout the symphony and was a severe blemish upon what would otherwise have been a notably fine rendition. Mr. Nikisch wisely omitted the long repetitions in the first and last movements. The program of the eighth concert will be as follows:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 4
Paderewski	Concerto for Pianoforte
Svendsen	Carnival in Paris

(FIRST TIME.)

Soli for Piano.

a Chopin	Impromptu
b Chopin	Valse
c Liszt	Rhapsodie Hongroise
Weber	Overture, "Euryanthe"

Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

THE COMMONWEALTH.
ESTABLISHED IN 1862.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER, 5, 1891.

After the riot of latter-day romantic music a fortnight ago, Mr. Nikisch's programme last Saturday seemed a severely classic one. Gluck's music is much too seldom heard in America, and the overture to 'Iphigeneia in Aulis' was most welcome. It was artistically, warmly and dramatically played—a bit too warmly perhaps; for somehow, with all its appeal to the emotions, Gluck's music has a touch of austerity, a sort of unworldly purity and severe beauty, akin to that of the Greek drama and especially difficult of interpretation. Mr. Nikisch, moreover, chose to use Wagner's amended score. It was well enough, perhaps, for Wagner to add a coda; but why, forsooth, should he tinker Gluck? 'There were kings before Agamemnon.' The more familiar symphony (No. 9 in C) by Schubert, in its gentleness, tenderness, occasional playfulness and pervading delicacy was an excellent foil to the overture. Its performance, however, was sadly uneven, now thoroughly good and now condemnably careless. Mr. Adolf Brodsky, the first violin of Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, played the Brahms concerto, a work better suited to his powers than to those of most violinists. His technique, of which, it goes without saying, the concerto gave ample proof, is excellent, at times even brilliant; he understands and interprets the abstract and purely intellectual qualities of Brahms's music; but he is manifestly deficient in warmth of feeling.

Ignaz Jan Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist, will be heard for the first times in Boston at the Symphony rehearsal and concert this week. To-night he will play his own concerto, a waltz and an impromptu by Chopin and one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. Next Wednesday night, December 9, at Music Hall, he will appear with Walter Damrosch's orchestra, playing altogether with orchestra. On Monday afternoon next, also at Music Hall, he begins a series of recitals with a representative programme from Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt. Other recitals will be given on the afternoons of December 8, 23, 28 and 29.

The programme for the Symphony concert to-night includes, beside the concerto and the shorter pieces for Paderewski, Weber's overture 'Euryanthe,' Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris' (first time) and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1891.

PADEREWSKI.

The Thin Man From Poland Conquers Boston.

The eighth Symphony Concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme included Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Weber's overture "Euryanthe." Mr. Paderewski was the pianist, and he was heard in his own concerto as well as in the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the Chopin waltz in C sharp minor and the twelfth rhapsodie and the "Campanella" of Liszt, which latter piece was played in response to the unbounded applause.

The fact that the concert of Saturday evening was primarily a symphony concert was apparently forgotten. Orchestra, director and purely orchestral music were all absorbed in the display of the personality of Ignace Jan Paderewski. Many fretted through the symphony, for they waited for Paderewski. Svendsen's "Carnival" was heard for the first time, and with its charming episodes and its ingenious instrumentation it would no doubt have excited attention on any other occasion, but Paderewski followed it, and it was nought. Even the fiery opening of the overture seemed tame after the Hungarian tumult that had just shaken the keys of the pianoforte. Nor is all this surprising, nor is it to be deplored. For the scene of excitement was not merely a triumph of virtuosoship; it was the revelation of an extraordinary individuality.

Pianists rise constantly above the musical horizon. Some shine with a steady and a serene light. Others dazzle for a season, "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." And even the greatest of them differ, as one star differeth from another star in glory. Perfection of mechanism, absolute technique, massive chords and electrical bravura—these no longer compel extraordinary admiration; they are expected, they are demanded. But the manner in which the mechanism is used, the physical and mental character of the man that stands as an interpreter between the composer and the hearer—these distinguish a pianist of to-day and set him apart. It is individuality, or temperament, or call it what you will, that exalts a few above their fellows. Now the individuality of Paderewski is unnatural, almost supernatural.

We all heard of this man before he crossed the ocean. The trumpet of his fame was blown with no uncertain sound. The story of his triumphs was shouted from the house tops. Yet these triumphs were not without alloy. The Berlin critics, who too often look at strangers askew, whispered in his ear that he was mortal. They argued from the arrangement of his hair that he was a dealer in the sensational. He was the lion of the season in Paris; and some—as Pougin—were bold enough to say that occasionally in his playing he shook a mane twisted in curl papers and showed neatly trimmed claws that he might not frighten the women who crowded the hall to hear him roar. In London he swept everything before him, and he received the honor of a caricature in Punch.

At last he came upon the stage of Music Hall, this strange being whose fiery temperament seems to have been poured into a frail body as a dangerous liquid into a Venetian glass. A romantic player, he recalls the legends loved by the old romantic school; the unknown teacher of the Sirens; the tamer of were-wolves; Hunold Singuf, who charmed the rats and the women and children of Hameln; Rath Krespel, who broke open violins and hunted their souls. Tall, thin, with eyes that seem to shed no light, with prominent cheek-bones and an apologetic chin, with a nimbus of hair of "orange shading into old gold," with feline step and bearing—here is one whom Hoffman might have dreamed of when at midnight the spirits tried to stop his pen. Without affectation, for no designed eccentricity could accentuate his personality; modest, for he knows full well his power—he could spare a little of his mechanism without throwing dice for success.

He was heard in works of the modern and the romantic school, and it is possible, nay probable, that as all other pianists, he has his limitations; but he is none the less remarkable, if this turns out to be true. Surely last Saturday he gave abundant evidence in support of his reputation. But how is it possible to describe his playing? Take down all the adjectives of praise from the shelf, dust them and arrange them properly; they are not worth a pure, full and liquid tone of his cantabile or a flash of his bravura. Prismatic words grow dull and pale, and the devices of the rhapsodist are in vain. Or put it under the microscope, or subject it to analytical tests. Call attention to his marvelous use of the pedals; point out the devitalization of certain portions of the arms by which he gains effects, or tell of any of his mechanical processes; can you thus convey to one that did not hear him, the strength, the beauty, the charm of his performance? Let it be admitted that he occasionally pounded, as in the rhapsodie; that in the waltz, delightful as it was, there was perhaps too great a desire to say something new; what then is left to the severest critic as a legitimate subject for fault-finding? This androgynal pianist combines the qualities most esteemed in man and woman—strength and beauty, manliness and grace. His phrasing is that of a born composer; he has the poet's taste; and his great mechanism serves simply to present adequately his thoughts, that they may be understood.

This much is certainly true of his first performance, and the scenes of enthusiasm that followed each and every number are of rare occurrence in this town. But Paderewski has not yet been heard here in the works of Beethoven or Schumann or their predecessors. He will give several recitals, the first this afternoon. The opening chapters of his continued story are strong and impressive. A final judgment should not be pronounced before all of his characters are introduced and play their parts to the end.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1891.

Paderewski at the Symphony Concert.

There were none of the effects and impressions of an orthodox symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening. There was a Paderewski concert, and this to be sure is a very new kind of concert. It is a concert in which the man Paderewski might easily upset almost any rules of music that have heretofore fettered the human mind, and his divine right to do so would be accepted with but the slightest questioning. Such indeed was Paderewski with the music that he played. It is not of present import that he did not play any such representative work as appeals to the understanding, such for example as Beethoven's op. 53, 57 or 106, the great Mozart concerto in D minor, or the equally great Brahms concerto in B minor. To judge an artist from the point of view of any such art work as he does not attempt to perform, and to either praise or condemn him accordingly, is a habit that prevails among certain young students in this vicinity, who are too apt to leave a concert hall after hearing a great artist just as though they "know everything"—to quote our country store philosopher, the late Josh Billings "but who really know nothing except how to spill 'vittles' on their clothes." So, if there are any of these barnacle critics in this city just at the present time, as there have been upon so many occasions when great artists have been here, it is to be hoped that they may respect the pianoforte playing of Paderewski none the less as they bear in mind the very opportune suggestion of the late Mr. Billings.

It should be stated, furthermore, that the Paderewski who played in New York to Boston musicians and a New York audience, on Nov. 24, and the Parerewski who played in Music Hall Saturday evening, are in no spiritual acceptation of the term quite the same. Not to be too paradoxical the fault of the Paderewski of the first occasion seemed with just such individualism for Bach, Beethoven, and Schumann as was then both superfluous and inartistic, but that for Paderewski, the composer, and Chopin and Liszt on Saturday evening was superbly meritorious. The Latin word genius had a particular application to him at the concert referred to in New York, in that the word originally signified the divine nature which is innate in all human beings.

In a far broader sense is Paderewski a genius, for he proved himself equal on Saturday evening to an inherently able interpretation of just the divine nature that one finds imbedded in any great art-work. There can be no two opinions as to the merit of the artist's first appearance before a Boston audience. With his own concerto, and none the less with the music of Chopin and Liszt, he magnificently set forth that he has something more than "talent which is in man's possession." He also has, to quote the lamented James Russell Lowell, the very "genius in whose possession man is."

We should not forget that this man's genius made its first Boston appearance many months ago, when Mme. Julie Rivé-King most ably played his concerto at one of the symphony concerts, and with all respect to any performer who might have played it before, one can but feel that the work was heard here for the first time from the composer himself on Saturday evening. This work plainly addresses itself to the imagination through the senses. In it there is far greater symmetry of form than one is apt to find in almost any other modern concerto. Either one of the concertos of Liszt, for example, is simply a virtuoso's concertos. Quite to the reverse, there will abundantly be found in the work that was performed on Saturday evening just such art-contents, as in the proper adjustment of the high and the low, the long and the short tones of music, is a charming masterpiece.

Even the hypercritical Heraclitus of old might easily perceive the fundamental art-principles upon which this concerto is founded; for the fundamental principles of art have been the same for ages, and are much the same in sculpture and painting as in music. The work is neither strange nor bold. It is a normal art work. The time has passed, let us bear in mind, when one can reasonably expect that there will be created any musical composition that is really and completley new. Now Paderewski is by no means fastidious in aiming for the mere effects of originality. He prefers instead to invest his creations with just such charms of naturalness as are at least synonyms of some actual newness in art. The first allegro, perhaps, bears less the impress of deep thought than of real sentiment. In the second movement especially there is a fine, broad and original vein of melody which, with all its heart feeling, is wonderfully supported by the artistic skill of a real master.

Of the three movements it seems but natural that the finale should have been most favorably received, as its spirit throughout with all its lively, fresh and vigorous rhythms is exceedingly lighthearted and joyous. Here, as in other portions of the work, the composer has had his say in a perfectly natural and straightforward manner, yet with all the musical genius, and no less with all the vigor, skill and propriety of a whole souled and superbly educated musician. The performance of it was correspondingly great, whether or not when rated by the extraordinary technique that the pianist displayed, or from the psychologist's standpoint. In polyphonic passages especially, Mr. Paderewski is amazingly successful in bringing out the theme whenever it appears. Not only with his own concerto, but later in the evening his ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising difficulties was no less effective than was the swaying, swinging, piquant, buoyancy with which for example he treated the waltz in C sharp minor by Chopin. With Liszt's Campanella which he played for an encore, there was the nicest elasticity, promptness and accuracy noticeable in his treatment of the skips.

Paderewski's fortissimos it is true are occasionally somewhat harsh and bawdish. On the other hand, no such perfectly clear, limpid, far reaching and ethereal pianissimi were probably never heard in a Boston music hall as on Saturday evening, not even from Thalberg. An inexplicable feature of his success, too, is that his virtuosic resources are on such intimate terms with his will. Yes, his pearly, drop-like whispering touch often responds with ethereal effect to the delicately fine and artistic feeling of the singing artist that he unquestionably is.

Last season a phenominal pianist with a "one story intellect" created an extraordinary sensation at one of the symphonies. It is a pleasure to bear record that he is followed this year by a far greater pianist with the "three story intellect," of the pianist, musician and composer. Paderewski created the most impressive sensation on Saturday evening that Boston has experienced from any musical artist since Rubinstein was here. The concert began with Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was delightfully played, and the programme also included the "Carnival of Paris," music by Saint Saens, and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski's Performance Enraptures One of Boston's Most Critical Audiences.

THE YOUNG PIANIST RECALLED THREE TIMES.

Such Wonderful Technique, Such a Strong Yet Delicate Touch, and Such Shading, Have Not Been Heard Here Since the Visit of Rubinstein.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series, which took place Saturday evening at Music Hall, the following programme was rendered:

Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat.

Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17.

Svendsen's Episode, "Carnival in Paris," three soli for pianoforte, and Weber's toverture "Euryanthe."

The fourth symphony is one of the most enjoyable things the orchestra plays, for Nikisch's interpretation of it is excellent. The adagio allegro vivace was well rendered, but in the second movement, which is very much dependent on the wind instruments, there seemed to be no roundness of tone. The effect in the closing measure of the allegro was splendid. The "Carnival in Paris" was new to Boston. It is the composition of Johan Leverin Svendsen, a native of Christiania, is of a high character, remarkable for strong individuality and finish. There are some splendid orchestral effects in it and it teems with color.

The Weber overture fell upon unheeding ears, as the entire audience was enraptured with Paderewski's wonderful performance. Reports concerning his phenomenal gifts have been circulated freely through the city, but even with this preparation the audience was not disposed to overwhelm with praise the unassuming man who quietly walked across the platform and took his seat at the piano. He is slight in build, delicate and refined in feature, with a wonderful head of yellow hair that has been described as a "chrysanthemum" head. He played his own composition, which has received a previous rendering in Boston. After he had played the opening measures the interest was intense, and at the close the greatest enthusiasm prevailed throughout the hall. An immense laurel wreath tied with the Polish colors, red and white, was presented the young pianist, who was recalled three times before the excitement of the audience had subsided. Such wonderful technique, such a strong yet delicate touch and such shading have not been heard here since the visit of Rubinstein. The Chopin impromptu and valse and the Rhapsodie Hongroise, which were played as piano solos, brought out his subtile gifts of interpretation, his real force and sentiment. Contrary to the usual custom at these concerts, he responded to the continued applause of the audience with another selection—a violin solo of Paganini's, arranged for piano by Liszt. Certainly Paderewski has no cause to complain of his reception by Boston's musical public, and he has forever established his position as a composer and performer of rare merit.

The first two of the five piano recitals to be given at Music Hall by Paderewski take place this afternoon and tomorrow. Today's programme is as follows:

Sonata in F minor, op. 57	L. van Beethoven
Impromptu, Minuet, Moment musical	Franz Schubert
Divertissement Hongroise	Schubert-Liszt
Fantasie, op. 17	Robert Schumann
Etude, Nocturne, Valse, Mazurka, Scherzo	Fred Chopin
Barcarolle	Anton Rubinstein
Cracovienne	Paderewski
Rhapsodie Hongroise	Franz Liszt

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1891.

—Mme. Nordica showed great strength of character and courage of will in keeping her engagement with Mr. C. A. Ellis, her manager, at Cincinnati, Monday night. She had only heard of the sudden death of her mother in London late on Saturday, and took the train Sunday for Boston to meet her sister, Mrs. Baldwin, returning in time for the concert, Monday. There was something very pathetic in her solos, never more beautifully sung than on that night, which touched her audience deeply, although but few knew of the pain she was suffering. She was exquisitely gowned in black lace, the front of the skirt of flashing jet.

WELCOME TO PADEREWSKI.

A Famous Pianist Enthusiastically Applauded at the Symphony Concert—"Cavalleria Rusticana" Sung by the Minnie Hauk Company.

Bostonians have at last had an opportunity of passing judgment upon the piano playing of Ignace J. Paderewski, an artist who has probably been more written and talked about in American musical circles during the last few weeks than was any pianist who has come to this country since the visit of Rubinstein.

It was only a few months ago that the name of Paderewski was almost unknown here, but so extensively was his coming [illegible], and so eulogistic were the [illegible] praises of his talents, that his appearance [illegible] was awaited as the most important [illegible] our musical world for many sea-

His first concert in New York fairly electrified the piano enthusiasts of the metropolis, and the several recitals that he has given there not only sustained but rather increased the fever of enthusiasm aroused over his playing.

His successes there naturally awakened much interest here, so it was not surprising that the capacity of Music Hall should have been taxed at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra. Indeed many hundred people were refused even admission tickets to these concerts, so general was the desire to hear this wonderful master of the pianoforte.

The uncommon demand upon space in the columns of this morning's paper makes it impossible to give an extended review of his performance last evening. His successes in New York have already been chronicled in THE GLOBE, so an idea of his ability may be suggested by stating that the Boston Symphony audiences seemed to heartily indorse all the eulogisms regarding his playing which have come from New York.

It is not often that the usually sedate and reserved Symphony patrons are stirred to demonstrative expressions of approval, but precedents were forgotten yesterday. The audience not only applauded but actually cheered Paderewski's performance, and insisted upon an encore number being added to his programme announcements.

Some admirer sent him a huge wreath of laurel decked with the Polish national colors and bearing in letters of gold words of homage. This was something unusual at a Symphony concert, but the audience gave cord al approval.

Mr. Paderewski first played a concerto for piano and orchestra of his own composition. It was the first concerto that he has written, and while it may not be entitled to a very high rank among the many concertos that have been written by masters of other days, it is a piece which commands admiration for its display of musicianly attainments, sympathetic and poetic sentiment and command of orchestral resources. Its melodies are Polish in character, suggestive of folk songs, and are delightfully fresh and devoid of affectation in treatment. The finale movement is the most brilliant, both for solo instrument and orchestra. It is a work that can be repeatedly heard with pleasure.

Mr. Paderewski also played three short [illegible], an impromptu and a waltz by Chopin, and a rhapsodie by Liszt. His performance [illegible] although technically [illegible] make a marked impres- [illegible] little waltz, however, [illegible]

[illegible] been stated in these [illegible] Mr. Paderewski was more at [illegible] interpretation of Liszt than in [illegible] the works of Chopin. Last [illegible] performance served to confirm [illegible] statement.

Several pianists have recently been heard [illegible] playing possesses certain quali- [illegible] excelled by Mr. Paderewski's art, but few, if any, have shown such general ability in interpreting the works of the [illegible] widely different classes of music composed for the pianoforte.

[illegible] Mr. Paderewski is not the greatest of living [illegible]

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ignace Jean Paderewski made his first appearances in Boston at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was complete and overwhelming. No other pianist, except De Pachmann, has aroused a symphony audience to such a pitch of genuine enthusiasm since the concerts were instituted, if memory serves us right.

Paderewski is a tremendously advertised artist; and doubtless Boston's interest in the brilliant Pole, first aroused by little Otto Hegner's exquisite performance of the now famous "Menuet a l'Antique," and since constantly kept warm by the reports that have been freely circulated concerning his astonishing triumphs in Europe, had not a little to do with his reception. But this interest, bordering on curiosity, was not the real cause of his success. Paderewski is undeniably a genius; there could have been few out of the vast audience that filled every seat and every foot of standing room on Friday afternoon who were not strongly impressed with this fact.

Besides this gift Paderewski possesses a personality which instantly calls out the sympathies of his listeners. His modest, winning appearance; his graceful bearing; his slender, supple figure; his fine, well-poised head covered with a mass of soft, curly hair of reddish hue; his well cut features, delicate to the verge of effeminancy; his amiable though serious expression, all command instant attention. And by the time he has finished his own concerto, many other things are revealed, One realizes with a throb of pleasure that here at last is a great musical performer who has not yet lost the indescribable enthusiasm of youth. He plays for dollars, perhaps, but surely for the love of his art. Moreover, the music he plays is to him fraught with meaning. His phrasing is not the phrasing of a player of mere talent; his fitting together of the parts of a musical composition is not that of the cultivated artisan. His readings of the works of the masters are instinct with the imagination, the poectic fervor, the true fire of a born musician. When he plays something that appeals to his nature with unusual force, his countenance is as much a study as are his readings, or his technical feats. When he gave that unforgettable performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Erl King" for an encore Friday afternoon, the pathos and intensity expressed in his face were almost as thrilling as was his playing.

Paderewski's touch is wholly beautiful. His singing tone is unsurpassed; his scale-playing is exquisitely clear and pearly in quality; his pianissimo is wonderful; his fortissimo is full and resonant; and his bravura is glittering and dazzling, but withal is never unmusical. Without doubt he has his limitations. When we heard him at a recital in New York the other day, we thought we discovered weaknesses that seemed inherent. Whether this may eventually prove to be the case or not, there were no such indications in his performance of his own concerto, or the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the waltz in C sharp minor, and the twelfth rhapsodie of Liszt.

Paderewski's fame does not rest wholly upon his pianoforte playing. His concerto is a strong work, full of ideas which are clearly, poetically and brilliantly expressed; and it will undoubtedly become a favorite with pianists when it is better known. In the pianoforte part its composer has shown a conservatism as regards modern technical difficulties that is surprising. There is no attempt to create obstacles of this sort merely for the sake of affording opportunities for the display of virtuosity. Nevertheless it shows a knowledge of the resources of the pianoforte which only a skilful pianist can possess; while the instrumentation evinces an equally clear understanding of the nature of orchestral instruments, and their proper combinations. His many smaller piano pieces too are full of poetic charm; and it is rumored that he is the composer of unpublished works for orchestra of much greater importance than any that he has yet given out.

Between the concerto and the solos came a work by Svendsen, new to Boston, an episode "Carnival in Paris." It is a brilliant piece of orchestral scoring and suggests in a marked degree the various characteristics of the kind of scene it attempts to depict in tone. The symphony, which came first, was Beethoven's fourth and the closing number was the overture to Euryanthe. The orchestral playing was generally fine, the accompaniment to the concerto being given with unusual care and finish.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, DECEMBER 6, 1891.

PADEREWSKI'S TRIUMPH.

The appearance of Paderewski, the pianist, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, called out an audience that tested the fullest capacity of Music Hall.

It was the first appearance of this pianist here, and all present were evidently eager to determine individually the correctness of the extravagant claims put forward regarding the player. The term "extravagant" is used advisedly, for the supply of English adjectives has been completely exhausted in the press comments of this country and Europe upon this pianist's performances, and there is absolutely not a complimentary phrase left for those who are compelled, at this late day, to express an opinion regarding Paderewski's abilities.

As a matter of fact, words lose their value in an attempt to use them to convey a correct impression of the results got by this player, and there is a decided inclination to say "go and hear him," rather than to make any effort to say what his playing is like.

His own concerto in A minor, op. 17, heard here a couple of seasons ago, was the work he selected for his introduction to Boston, and it was a bit curious to see the development of the enthusiasm of the audience as its performance progressed. Paderewski's entrance was so quiet and unpretentious, and he went about his work in such a businesslike fashion, that there was a disposition to suspend judgment for a time and await evidence justifying concurrence in the opinions of other musical centres concerning the gifts of the newcomer.

This inclination vanished, however, after the pianist had played his opening passages in the concerto, and at the close of the first movement he had Boston at his feet, and from that onward it was but a question of degree in the enthusiastic recognition of his abilities by his first audience here.

The opening movement gave a hint of the singular purity of tone which he produces at all times, and a suggestion of his technical attainments. It remained for the beautiful romance making the second movement to serve as an exhibition of the wonderful delicacy, refinement and expression of his playing and the rare faculty he has of making the instrument sing under his skilful touch. The final allegro then served as an illustration of his absolute mastery of the keyboard and his ability in the line of pyrotechnical piano playing that has dazzled the publics of all the great cities abroad.

He is a pianist who knows to a nicety his power over his audience, and he mastered all who heard him with as much certainty as though each and every one had been his only listener. Great as was his triumph in the concerto it was not until he was heard as a solo player in a Chopin impromptu and valse and a Liszt rhapsodie that the audience fully realized the genius of the pianist. His playing of Chopin is fairly fascinating for the grace and beauty of his interpretation and the delicacy of his tone tints in such compositions surpasses all description and gives the listener most rapturous delight. The Liszt rhapsodie again revealed the skill and resources of this veritable giant, and his brilliant playing of this number made a fitting climax to his evening's triumph.

Mr. Paderewski has no cause to complain of the Boston public in the reception given him, and it is gratifying that his first hearing here should so effectually settle the position he is to be accorded by local music lovers. His future here is one of conquest, and his recitals will unquestionably show how well the Boston public appreciates such a genius.

Lack of space prevents comment upon the very enjoyable orchestral programme arranged for the evening by Mr. Nikisch. It included the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and, as a pleasing novelty, Svendsen's "Carneval in Paris."

The Buffalo Commercial
FRIDAY EVENING. DECEMBER 4, 1891.

The Orchestra Concert.

The season of concerts by the Buffalo Orchestra opened very brilliantly last evening, the regular matinee preceding the evening performance. Large audiences were in attendance, and the program was attractive. It opened with Svendsen's beautiful symphonic Poem "Romeo and Juliette," which was followed by Delibe's Suite "Sylvia" the Intermezzo and Pizzicatti of which are more familiar to concert goers than the Prelude and "Cortege de Bacchus," and it was a pleasure to hear the four numbers together, they were carefully played and in the afternoon the Pizzicatti had to be repeated. The Grieg melody for string orchestra was one of the most delightful numbers, and though the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" by Mascagni may be somewhat out of place in the opera, it makes a charming concert piece and it received a good reading last evening. It was played a second time. The Rienzi overture is always enjoyable, but the playing in this number was not as even as it should have been; a feeling of uncertainty seemed to be present. The work of the orchestra, however, indicates that the concerts will indeed be thoroughly enjoyable and educational, as the programs will be well rendered.

Madame Lillian Nordica was introduced to Buffalonians, and better choice of soloist for the opening concert could not have been made. Her selections, arias from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" were artistically sung, especially in the latter, Elizabeth's greeting to the hall, did Mme. Nordica's beautiful, clear soprano voice bespeak the careful training and artistic ability of its possessor, and an encore was demanded and the selection was repeated. That Mme. Nordica more than came up to the expectations of many listeners is undoubtedly true, and the two vast audiences were perfectly charmed with her singing, as she was called out again and again.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

There was an enormous audience at Music Hall, last evening, the occasion being the first appearance here of Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, to whom the immense attendance was undoubtedly due. As he came forward to take his place at the piano, he was greeted with much enthusiasm and whatever may have been his confidence in his powers, such a reception could not but have steadied it by convincing him that he was about to play before a company friendly to him from the very outset. The personal presence of the artist caused a buzz of interest to pass through the hall. He is tall and slim, pallid of countenance, his face is long and thin, and with sharply-cut features. His hair, which is profuse, is of a reddish hue, and stands up as if it were electrified. A slight moustache decks his upper lip, and a very long neck protrudes above his collar—a peculiar and striking individuality generally; almost uncanny in the effect it produces at first sight, but tempered by a quiet, modest and dignified bearing. He played his own concerto in A minor, a work that was heard at these concerts in March last, when it was performed by Mrs. Julia Rive-King. It is built on the traditional model, and has little if any affinity with the modern concerto. In other words, the composer has not attempted to blend the piano and the orchestra equally, but has given full prominence to the solo part for the display of the artist's skill. The style is wholly modern, and so is the color; but it is lucid, melodious and free from that contemporaneous striving after mere novelty at the expense of all that is pleasing in art. It is abundant in life, is always clear, and is admirable in the richness and the varied contrasts of its effects. The orchestration is of a high order, and the work, as a whole, is impressive in its fine and well-sustained vigor and its genuine musical interest. It illustrates the most advanced stage of modern piano technique and that it is tremendously difficult will go without saying. Of the artist's marvellous performance of his work it is not easy to write with moderation. His technique is extraordinary in its scope and perfection; but technique of the most brilliant order has become of late so far from uncommon that we have learned to exact it rather than to be surprised into wonder or admiration over it; and were this all that made Paderewski's playing memorable, the subject could be easily dismissed, despite the beauty of his touch, the extraordinary evenness and pearliness of his scale runs, the pure singing quality he draws from the piano, and the utter freedom from all trickery that marks his playing. Those who went to be dazzled by mere finger work had enough and to spare in the way of the astonishing; but there is vastly more than finger-play in Paderewski; there are infinite purity of style, poetic feeling, deep artistic intelligence, grace and tenderness in equal measure with fire and power; youthful fervor leavened with mature and refined sentiment. His octave playing is almost bewilderingly free and impetuous; his bravura is exciting in its swing and sweep. An occasional tendency in him to thump the piano unmercifully causes a shock, and emphasizes the sad reflection that nothing is perfect in this world; but he soon causes you to forget the fault in some rare beauty of expression or caressing grace of feeling that follows. The playing of the concerto aroused a furore of enthusiasm the like of which has not been often heard in Music Hall. The applause was deafening, and did not cease until the artist had been recalled four times. Later in the evening he played an Impromptu and Waltz by Chopin and a Liszt Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, if we are not mistaken. His Chopin playing, in its chaste poetic feeling, its elegant phrasing and its delicate warmth, was indescribably fine. The sentiment was never overwrought, the taste was always pure, while a fine intellectuality dominated the whole. His readings differed from any that we had heard before, but they were so natural that they seemed as if they must be just what the composer intended. The waltz especially was given with a bewitching beauty and finish. The vulgar and brutal Liszt Rhapsody jarred on the senses after these; and it must be confessed that the artist here sank to the vulgarity and brutality of the work; for he pounded the instrument unmercifully at times, producing anything but a musical tone from it. Any other piano than a Steinway would have given way under such treatment. The display of technique at other times was dazzling but it did not atone for the noise and thumping. Again the audience went wild over him, and recalled him four times in a fury of applause, to which he responded the last time, with a fascinatingly delicate and brilliant performance of Liszt's "Campanella" His success through the whole concert was overwhelming. He fairly earned and fully deserved it. The orchestral performances were Beethoven's fourth symphony, an episode, "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, given for the first time at these concerts, and brilliant in its orchestration, though not clear in its meaning; and Weber's Euryanthe" overture. The next concert is to be in memory of Mozart, and will be devoted wholly to that composer's music. The soloists are to be Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski's Performance Enraptures One of Boston's Most Critical Audiences.

THE YOUNG PIANIST RECALLED THREE TIMES.

Such Wonderful Technique, Such a Strong Yet Delicate Touch, and Such Shading, Have Not Been Heard Here Since the Visit of Rubinstein.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series, which took place Saturday evening at Music Hall, the following programme was rendered:

Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat.

Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17.

Svendsen's Episode, "Carnival in Paris," three soli for pianoforte, and Weber's overture "Euryanthe."

The fourth symphony is one of the most enjoyable things the orchestra plays, for Nikisch's interpretation of it is excellent. The adagio allegro vivace was well rendered, but in the second movement, which is very much dependent on the wind instruments, there seemed to be no roundness of tone. The effect in the closing measure of the allegro was splendid. The "Carnival in Paris" was new to Boston. It is the composition of Johan Leverin Svendsen, a native of Christiania, is of a high character, remarkable for strong individuality and finish. There are some splendid orchestral effects in it and it teems with color.

The Weber overture fell upon unheeding ears, as the entire audience was enraptured with Paderewski's wonderful performance. Reports concerning his phenomenal gifts have been circulated freely through the city, but even with this preparation the audience was not disposed to overwhelm with praise the unassuming man who quietly walked across the platform and took his seat at the piano. He is slight in build, delicate and refined in feature, with a wonderful head of yellow hair that has been described as a "chrysanthemum" head. He played his own composition, which has received a previous rendering in Boston. After he had played the opening measures the interest was intense, and at the close the greatest enthusiasm prevailed throughout the hall. An immense laurel wreath tied with the Polish colors, red and white, was presented the young pianist, who was recalled three times before the excitement of the audience had subsided. Such wonderful technique, such a strong yet delicate touch and such shading have not been heard here since the visit of Rubinstein. The Chopin impromptu and valse and the Rhapsodie Hongroise, which were played as piano solos, brought out his subtile gifts of interpretation, his real force and sentiment. Contrary to the usual custom at these concerts, he responded to the continued applause of the audience with another selection—a violin solo of Paganini's, arranged for piano by Liszt. Certainly Paderewski has no cause to complain of his reception by Boston's musical public, and he has forever established his position as a composer and performer of rare merit.

The first two of the five piano recitals to be given at Music Hall by Paderewski take place this afternoon and tomorrow. Today's programme is as follows:

Sonata in F minor, op. 57	L. van Beethoven
Impromptu, Minuet, Moment musical	Franz Schubert
Divertissement Hongroise	Schubert-Liszt
Fantasie, op. 17	Robert Schumann
Etude, Nocturne, Valse, Mazurka, Scherzo	Fred Chopin
Barcarolle	Anton Rubinstein
Cracovienne	Paderewski
Rhapsodie Hongroise	Franz Liszt

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1891.

—Mme. Nordica showed great strength of character and courage of will in keeping her engagement with Mr. C. A. Ellis, her manager, at Cincinnati, Monday night. She had only heard of the sudden death of her mother in London late on Saturday, and took the train Sunday for Boston to meet her sister, Mrs. Baldwin, returning in time for the concert, Monday. There was something very pathetic in her solos, never more beautifully sung than on that night, which touched her audience deeply, although but few knew of the pain she was suffering. She was exquisitely gowned in black lace, the front of the skirt of flashing jet.

WELCOME TO PADEREWSKI.

A Famous Pianist Enthusiastically Applauded at the Symphony Concert—"Cavalleria Rusticana" Sung by the Minnie Hauk Company.

Bostonians have at last had an opportunity of passing judgment upon the piano playing of Ignace J. Paderewski, an artist who has probably been more written and talked about in American musical circles during the last few weeks than was any pianist who has come to this country since the visit of Rubinstein.

It was only a few months ago that the name of Paderewski was almost unknown here, but so extensively was his coming advertised, and so eulogistic were the advance praises of his talents, that his appearance was awaited as the most important event in our musical world for many seasons.

His first concert in New York fairly electrified the piano enthusiasts of the metropolis, and the several recitals that he has given there not only sustained but rather increased the fever of enthusiasm aroused over his playing.

His successes there naturally awakened much interest here, so it was not surprising that the capacity of Music Hall should have been taxed at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra. Indeed many hundred people were refused even admission tickets to these concerts, so general was the desire to hear this wonderful master of the pianoforte.

The uncommon demand upon space in the columns of this morning's paper makes it impossible to give an extended review of his performance last evening. His successes in New York have already been chronicled in THE GLOBE, so an idea of his ability may be suggested by stating that the Boston Symphony audiences seemed to heartily indorse all the eulogisms regarding his playing which have come from New York.

It is not often that the usually sedate and reserved Symphony patrons are stirred to demonstrative expressions of approval, but precedents were forgotten yesterday. The audience not only applauded but actually cheered Paderewski's performance, and insisted upon an encore number being added to his programme announcements.

Some admirer sent him a huge wreath of laurel decked with the Polish national colors and bearing in letters of gold words of homage. This was something unusual at a Symphony concert, but the audience gave cord al approval.

Mr. Paderewski first played a concerto for piano and orchestra of his own composition. It was the first concerto that he has written, and while it may not be entitled to a very high rank among the many concertos that have been written by masters of other days, it is a piece which commands admiration for its display of musicianly attainments, sympathetic and poetic sentiment and command of orchestral resources. Its melodies are Polish in character, suggestive of folk songs, and are delightfully fresh and devoid of affectation in treatment. The finale movement is the most brilliant, both for solo instrument and orchestra. It is a work that can be repeatedly heard with pleasure.

Mr. Paderewski also played three short solos, an impromptu and a waltz, by Chopin, and a rhapsodie by Liszt. His performance of the impromptu, although technically flawless, did not make a marked impression. The difficult little waltz, however, created a sensation.

It has already been stated in these columns that Mr. Paderewski was more at home in the interpretation of Liszt than in presenting the works of Chopin. Last evening's performance served to confirm this statement.

Several pianists have recently been heard here whose playing possesses certain qualities not excelled by Mr. Paderewski's art, but few, if any, have shown such general ability in interpreting the works of the widely different classes of music composed for the pianoforte.

If Mr. Paderewski is not the greatest of living pianists, his rank is so near the first that it requires exceedingly exact discrimination to properly place him.

The programme offered by Director Nikisch consisted of Beethoven's fourth symphony, Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris" (a novelty here) and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The orchestra gave a very satisfactory performance of all these selections. The next concert will be exclusively of Mozart's music, and the soloists will be Mme. Fursch-Mardi, C. M. Loeffler and [illegible]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ignace Jean Paderewski made his first appearances in Boston at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was complete and overwhelming. No other pianist, except De Pachmann, has aroused a symphony audience to such a pitch of genuine enthusiasm since the concerts were instituted, if memory serves us right.

Paderewski is a tremendously advertised artist; and doubtless Boston's interest in the brilliant Pole, first aroused by little Otto Hegner's exquisite performance of the now famous "Menuet a l'Antique," and since constantly kept warm by the reports that have been freely circulated concerning his astonishing triumphs in Europe, had not a little to do with his reception. But this interest, bordering on curiosity, was not the real cause of his success. Paderewski is undeniably a genius; there could have been few out of the vast audience that filled every seat and every foot of standing room on Friday afternoon who were not strongly impressed with this fact.

Besides this gift Paderewski possesses a personality which instantly calls out the sympathies of his listeners. His modest, winning appearance; his graceful bearing; his slender, supple figure; his fine, well-poised head covered with a mass of soft, curly hair of reddish hue; his well cut features, delicate to the verge of effeminancy; his amiable though serious expression, all command instant attention. And by the time he has finished his own concerto, many other things are revealed. One realizes with a throb of pleasure that here at last is a great musical performer who has not yet lost the indescribable enthusiasm of youth. He plays for dollars, perhaps, but surely for the love of his art. Moreover, the music he plays is to him fraught with meaning. His phrasing is not the phrasing of a player of mere talent; his fitting together of the parts of a musical composition is not that of the cultivated artisan. His readings of the works of the masters are instinct with the imagination, the poectic fervor, the true fire of a born musician. When he plays something that appeals to his nature with unusual force, his countenance is as much a study as are his readings, or his technical feats. When he gave that unforgettable performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Erl King" for an encore Friday afternoon, the pathos and intensity expressed in his face were almost as thrilling as was his playing.

Paderewski's touch is wholly beautiful. His singing tone is unsurpassed; his scale-playing is exquisitely clear and pearly in quality; his pianissimo is wonderful; his fortissimo is full and resonant; and his bravura is glittering and dazzling, but withal is never unmusical. Without doubt he has his limitations. When we heard him at a recital in New York the other day, we thought we discovered weaknesses that seemed inherent. Whether this may eventually prove to be the case or not, there were no such indications in his performance of his own concerto, or the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the waltz in C sharp minor, and the twelfth rhapsodie of Liszt.

Paderewski's fame does not rest wholly upon his pianoforte playing. His concerto is a strong work, full of ideas which are clearly, poetically and brilliantly expressed; and it will undoubtedly become a favorite with pianists when it is better known. In the pianoforte part its composer has shown a conservatism as regards modern technical difficulties that is surprising. There is no attempt to create obstacles of this sort merely for the sake of affording opportunities for the display of virtuosity. Nevertheless it shows a knowledge of the resources of the pianoforte which only a skilful pianist can possess; while the instrumentation evinces an equally clear understanding of the nature of orchestral instruments, and their proper combinations. His many smaller piano pieces too are full of poetic charm; and it is rumored that he is the composer of unpublished works for orchestra of much greater importance than any that he has yet given out.

Between the concerto and the solos came a work by Svendsen, new to Boston, an episode "Carnival in Paris." It is a brilliant piece of orchestral scoring and suggests in a marked degree the various characteristics of the kind of scene it attempts to depict in tone. The symphony, which came first, was Beethoven's fourth and the closing number was the overture to Euryanthe. The orchestral playing was generally fine, the accompaniment to the concerto being given with unusual care and finish.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 6, 1891.

PADEREWSKI'S TRIUMPH.

The appearance of Paderewski, the pianist, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, called out an audience that tested the fullest capacity of Music Hall.

It was the first appearance of this pianist here, and all present were evidently eager to determine individually the correctness of the extravagant claims put forward regarding the player. The term "extravagant" is used advisedly, for the supply of English adjectives has been completely exhausted in the press comments of this country and Europe upon this pianist's performances, and there is absolutely not a complimentary phrase left for those who are compelled, at this late day, to express an opinion regarding Paderewski's abilities.

As a matter of fact, words lose their value in an attempt to use them to convey a correct impression of the results got by this player, and there is a decided inclination to say "go and hear him," rather than to make any effort to say what his playing is like.

His own concerto in A minor, op. 17, heard here a couple of seasons ago, was the work he selected for his introduction to Boston, and it was a bit curious to see the development of the enthusiasm of the audience as its performance progressed. Paderewski's entrance was so quiet and unpretentious, and he went about his work in such a businesslike fashion, that there was a disposition to suspend judgment for a time and await evidence justifying concurrence in the opinions of other musical centres concerning the gifts of the newcomer.

This inclination vanished, however, after the pianist had played his opening passages in the concerto, and at the close of the first movement he had Boston at his feet, and from that onward it was but a question of degree in the enthusiastic recognition of his abilities by his first audience here.

The opening movement gave a hint of the singular purity of tone which he produces at all times, and a suggestion of his technical attainments. It remained for the beautiful romance making the second movement to serve as an exhibition of the wonderful delicacy, refinement and expression of his playing and the rare faculty he has of making the instrument sing under his skilful touch. The final allegro then served as an illustration of his absolute mastery of the keyboard and his ability in the line of pyrotechnical piano playing that has dazzled the publics of all the great cities abroad.

He is a pianist who knows to a nicety his power over his audience, and he mastered all who heard him with as much certainty as though each and every one had been his only listener. Great as was his triumph in the concerto it was not until he was heard as a solo player in a Chopin impromptu and valse and a Liszt rhapsodie that the audience fully realized the genius of the pianist. His playing of Chopin is fairly fascinating for the grace and beauty of his interpretation and the delicacy of his tone tints in such compositions surpasses all description and gives the listener most rapturous delight. The Liszt rhapsodie again revealed the skill and resources of this veritable giant, and his brilliant playing of this number made a fitting climax to his evening's triumph.

Mr. Paderewski has no cause to complain of the Boston public in the reception given him, and it is gratifying that his first hearing here should so effectually settle the position he is to be accorded by local music lovers. His future here is one of conquest, and his recitals will unquestionably show how well the Boston public appreciates such a genius.

Lack of space prevents comment upon the very enjoyable orchestral programme arranged for the evening by Mr. Nikisch. It included the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and, as a pleasing novelty, Svendsen's "Carneval in Paris."

The Buffalo Commercial

FRIDAY EVENING. DECEMBER 4, 1891.

The Orchestra Concert.

The season of concerts by the Buffalo Orchestra opened very brilliantly last evening, the regular matinee preceding the evening performance. Large audiences were in attendance, and the program was attractive. It opened with Svendsen's beautiful symphonic Poem "Romeo and Juliette," which was followed by Delibe's Suite "Sylvia" the Intermezzo and Pizzicatti of which are more familiar to concert goers than the Prelude and "Cortege de Bacchus," and it was a pleasure to hear the four numbers together, they were carefully played and in the afternoon the Pizzicatti had to be repeated. The Grieg melody for string orchestra was one of the most delightful numbers, and though the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" by Mascagni may be somewhat out of place in the opera, it makes a charming concert piece and it received a good reading last evening. It was played a second time. The Rienzi overture is always enjoyable, but the playing in this number was not as even as it should have been; a feeling of uncertainty seemed to be present. The work of the orchestra, however, indicates that the concerts will indeed be thoroughly enjoyable and educational, as the programs will be well rendered.

Madame Lillian Nordica was introduced to Buffalonians, and better choice of soloist for the opening concert could not have been made. Her selections, arias from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" were artistically sung, especially in the latter, Elizabeth's greeting to the hall, did Mme. Nordica's beautiful, clear soprano voice bespeak the careful training and artistic ability of its possessor, and an encore was demanded and the selection was repeated. That Mme. Nordica more than came up to the expectations of many listeners is undoubtedly true, and the two vast audiences were perfectly charmed with her singing, as she was called out again and again.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

There was an enormous audience at Music Hall, last evening, the occasion being the first appearance here of Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, to whom the immense attendance was undoubtedly due. As he came forward to take his place at the piano, he was greeted with much enthusiasm and whatever may have been his confidence in his powers, such a reception could not but have steadied it by convincing him that he was about to play before a company friendly to him from the very outset. The personal presence of the artist caused a buzz of interest to pass through the hall. He is tall and slim, pallid of countenance, his face is long and thin, and with sharply-cut features. His hair, which is profuse, is of a reddish hue, and stands up as if it were electrified. A slight moustache decks his upper lip, and a very long neck protrudes above his collar—a peculiar and striking individuality generally; almost uncanny in the effect it produces at first sight, but tempered by a quiet, modest and dignified bearing. He played his own concerto in A-minor, a work that was heard at these concerts in March last, when it was performed by Mrs. Julia Rive-King. It is built on the traditional model, and has little if any affinity with the modern concerto. In other words, the composer has not attempted to blend the piano and the orchestra equally, but has given full prominence to the solo part for the display of the artist's skill. The style is wholly modern, and so is the color; but it is lucid, melodious and free from that contemporaneous striving after mere novelty at the expense of all that is pleasing in art. It is abundant in life, is always clear, and is admirable in the richness and the varied contrasts of its effects. The orchestration is of a high order, and the work, as a whole, is impressive in its fine and well-sustained vigor and its genuine musical interest. It illustrates the most advanced stage of modern piano technique and that it is tremendously difficult will go without saying. Of the artist's marvellous performance of his work it is not easy to write with moderation. His technique is extraordinary in its scope and perfection; but technique of the most brilliant order has become of late so far from uncommon that we have learned to exact it rather than to be surprised into wonder or admiration over it; and were this all that made Paderewski's playing memorable, the subject could be easily dismissed, despite the beauty of his touch, the extraordinary evenness and pearliness of his scale runs, the pure singing quality he draws from the piano, and the utter freedom from all trickery that marks his playing. Those who went to be dazzled by mere finger work had enough and to spare in the way of the astonishing; but there is vastly more than finger-play in Paderewski; there are infinite purity of style, poetic feeling, deep artistic intelligence, grace and tenderness in equal measure with fire and power; youthful fervor leavened with mature and refined sentiment. His octave playing is almost bewilderingly free and impetuous; his bravura is exciting in its swing and sweep. An occasional tendency in him to thump the piano unmercifully causes a shock, and emphasizes the sad reflection that nothing is perfect in this world; but he soon causes you to forget the fault in some rare beauty of expression or caressing grace of feeling that follows. The playing of the concerto aroused a furore of enthusiasm the like of which has not been often heard in Music Hall. The applause was deafening, and did not cease until the artist had been recalled four times. Later in the evening he played an Impromptu and Waltz by Chopin and a Liszt Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, if we are not mistaken. His Chopin playing, in its chaste poetic feeling, its elegant phrasing and its delicate warmth, was indescribably fine. The sentiment was never overwrought, the taste was always pure, while a fine intellectuality dominated the whole. His readings differed from any that we had heard before, but they were so natural that they seemed as if they must be just what the composer intended. The waltz especially was given with a bewitching beauty and finish. The vulgar and brutal Liszt Rhapsody jarred on the senses after these; and it must be confessed that the artist here sank to the vulgarity and brutality of the work; for he pounded the instrument unmercifully at times, producing anything but a musical tone from it. Any other piano than a Steinway would have given way under such treatment. The display of technique at other times was dazzling but it did not atone for the noise and thumping. Again the audience went wild over him, and recalled him four times in a fury of applause, to which he responded the last time, with a fascinatingly delicate and brilliant performance of Liszt's "Campanella" His success through the whole concert was overwhelming. He fairly earned and fully deserved it. The orchestral performances were Beethoven's fourth symphony, an episode, "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, given for the first time at these concerts, and brilliant in its orchestration, though not clear in its meaning; and Weber's Euryanthe" overture. The next concert is to be in memory of Mozart, and will be devoted wholly to that composer's music. The soloists are to be Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kneisel.

[66]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday, November 28, was:

Glück.	Overture. "Iphigenie en Aulis." (with Wagner's ending.)
Brahms.	Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D, op. 77. Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—Rondo. — Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.
Schubert.	Symphony in C major, No. 9. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.— Scherzo (Allegro vivace.)— Andante con moto.—Finale (Allegro vivace.)

Soloist: Mr. Adolph Brodsky.

Glück's overture is real music, of the pleasant kind that all can appreciate, laymen, as well as professionals. Only one fault can be found with it, and that is, there is too much honey and very little vinegar, so it satiates quickly and leaves no lasting impressions of its beauties behind it. For so easy, playable a piece of music, the orchestra have nothing to feel proud of, for their playing was characterized by gross carelessness in their attack of many phrases. In this respect it can safely be said the playing was bad, so bad it gave the appearance of inadequate rehearsals. This orchestra is composed of unsurpassed material, making it unpardonable in them to play so carelessly. What if the music be simple, almost able to play itself, is that a good reason to let it do so? Notwithstanding this, there was some good playing by the strings, making the overture very enjoyable.

Brahms's violin concerto introduced Mr. Adolph Brodsky as the soloist. It is always agreeable to hear new comers, if they be true artists, and Mr. Brodsky certainly is one; but what about the celebrated Gewandhaus orchestra? If all the leading artists of that organization continue to come here, what is to become of that famous organization? It must have a large contingent to draw from or it will soon become extinct at the rate they are now coming. Mendelssohn will, by and by, rise up from his grave and exclaim, "O, ye ungrateful men, why do you leave my hallowed, my sanctified, my liebling orchestra for the wilds of America, where the dollar, not art, is God?" Mr. Brodsky is a fine, noble looking man, and his playing is of the same nature. He is master of his instrument, an artist in a technical sense, but he fails to reach far into the heart. His tone is in the main good, his musical intelligence of a high order. In a word, he is an artist. Farther than this there is not much to be said. The adagio of the concerto is lovely, the most musically interesting writing we have ever heard of Brahms'. The concerto, as a whole, is interesting, the last movement being the least so of the three.

Schubert was a prolific writer, as well as a poetic one. There is nothing unpleasant about any of his compositions, but the C major Symphony is an exceptionally interesting one. The first movement is the finest; the last is the least interesting. The orchestra, barring the bassoons and horn, did its best work of the evening on the symphony. In the first movement, and also the last, they succeeded in producing some very good crescendos and diminuendos.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Eagle Brooklyn
N.Y.

12/6

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra will return this week to Brooklyn, where it was heard a few weeks ago with surprise by those to whom its playing was new and with enthusiasm both by those who were making acquaintance with it and by those who were familiar with its excellences. It is as near perfection as one is likely to hear in these days, and its playing is not only smooth and melodious, but it is spirited, expressive and the instrumental coloring is delightful, for each member of the band is a soloist. Band and leader are mutually inspirative. On Friday afternoon the band will publicly rehearse and on Saturday night it will play again, in precisely the same manner—because it could hardly be better—Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture; the delicious waldweben, with its rustling leaves and piping birds, from "Siegfried," and Brahms' second symphony. The soloist at this concert will be worth hearing likewise, for he is Ignace Paderewski, one of the greatest players on the pianoforte that is now living and a composer of mark as well. His part in the programme will be the performance of his own concerto and a group of solos by Chopin and Liszt. As an executant he is wonderful, but the charm of his work abides largely in its purity and poetry. At this concert he will be heard under the most favorable conditions.

RECORD, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 12/6

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

THE SECOND Boston Symphony Concert will be given under the direction of Mr. Nikish at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The programme, one of great merit and attractiveness, contains four numbers, namely: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Rubinstein, Concerto for Piano-forte in D minor; Bach, Prelude Adagio and Gavotte for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber, overture "Euryanthe."

BUFFALO ENQUIRER

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1891.

HAPPILY OPENED.

The Season of Orchestra Concerts Starts Out Well—Other Musical Events.

The season of Buffalo orchestra concerts was opened brilliantly yesterday. The concerts which were given in the afternoon and evening were attended by large audiences, making a total attendance for the two performances of considerably over 3,000 people. The work of the orchestra was such as to assure the music-loving public that it may now look forward to a series of concerts of high artistic merit.

The boxes at the matinee were occupied by pupils of St. Margaret's School and Holy Angel's Academy. The audience was a sympathetic one. In the evening there was a fashionable house. The stage was set with a garden scene and in front were plants and floral decorations arranged so as to give a charming effect. Herr Lund was given a flattering reception as he took his stand in front of the orchestra and raised his baton for the performance of Johan Svendson's symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet," which opened the evening's entertainment. Besides this the programme of orchestral selections contained two selections by two composers who are very much the rage now, Pietro Mascagni and Peter Tschaikowsky, the familiar "Sylvia" suite by Leo Delibes, the magnificent overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" and the delightful melody for string orchestra, "The First Meeting," by Edward Grieg. The work of the orchestra throughout was at once smooth and spirited and justified the remark recently made by a local musical director regarding the musicians that they seemed to take the interest of true artists in putting soul into their performances. The ravishing Intermezzo, "Valse Lente," of the suite "Sylvia" and the vivacious and delicate Pizzicatti of the same suite were received with especial warmth. The Tschaikowsky selection, "La Belle au bois Dormant," and the melody for string orchestra by Grieg were each most pleasingly rendered while the popular Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" so charmed the audience that a repetition was insisted on.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening was aroused by the appearance of Mme. Lillian Nordica. In her first selection, an aria from "The Queen of Sheba," by Charles Gounod, she made a most favorable impression, and in her second appearance, when she sang an aria from "Tannhauser," the applause was so determined and long-continued that after several times coming out and acknowledging the compliment she repeated the solo. Since the May Festival no musical artist who has made an appearance here has been greeted so warmly. Mme. Nordica's voice is pleasing in many particulars, but, perhaps, most pleasing in its singular purity and smoothness in almost its entire range. It is not often that a Buffalo audience is moved to show the pleasure that her hearers did last night.

This review should not close without a favorable comment upon one feature of the programme, namely the request upon it which read: "The audience is requested not to rise during the last number." This request was heeded by almost every one, and the result in the quietness that prevailed until the echoes from the last notes of the last selection had died away was very gratifying. The next concert will be on Dec. 17, with Franz Rummell, the pianist, as the soloist.

Clipping No. Telegraph

Clipping from

~~BULLETIN~~, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 12/5

LOCAL AMUSEMENTS.

—The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Monday evening is made up of classical masterpieces. The symphony will be that bright, joyous, melodious composition Beethoven's seventh in A major, with which the concert will begin. The overture placed last is Weber's Euryanthe, and an arrangement for string orchestra from Bach and Rubinstein's D minor concerto complete the programme. There will be some interest felt by musical people in comparing the performance by Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, of the great Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto with that recently given by Paderewski.

Mme. Janauschek has. for the INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/6

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening is made up of classical masterpieces. The symphony will be that bright, joyous, melodious composition, Beethoven's seventh in A major, with which the concert will begin. The overture, placed last, is Weber's "Euryanthe," and an arrangement for string orchestra from Bach and Rubinstein's D minor concerto complete the programme. How the strings of the orchestra will play Bachrich's arrangement of the Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte can readily be imagined, and there will probably be much interest felt by musical people in comparing the performance by Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, of the great Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto with that recently given Paderewski. Those who heard Mr. Grunfeld play at the Chestnut Street Opera House a few weeks ago will look forward with pleasure to his reappearance. The ticket office is at 1119 Chestnut.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia,

Monday Evening, December 7, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the remaining five concerts, and single tickets now on sale at 1119 Chestnut Street.

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Congregational Church, - Corner Tenth and G Streets,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE MUSIC COMMITTEE.

Wednesday Evening, December 9, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

1

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Season tickets with reserved seats, $5 and $6, according to location, on sale at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s, 937 Penna. Avenue, Saturday, December 5, at 9 A.M.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, December 10, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1891.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 60.
Paderewski: Concerto in A minor, op. 17.
Svendsen: Episode, "Carnival in Paris."
Chopin: Impromptu in F-sharp, op. 36.
Chopin: Valse in C-sharp minor, op. 64, No. 2.
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 2, in C-sharp minor.
Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A memorable concert! The ever beautiful B-flat symphony made a noble beginning. There was, now and then, a little roughness in the playing, but the performance as a whole was an excellent one. The Adagio was especially well given: never have we heard the violins and violas creep in so imperceptibly, adding their warmth of color to the wooden wind, in the wonderful cadence that comes just before the entrance of the "conclusion theme."

Svensden's "Carnival" shows, if nothing else-good grounds for the great popularity he enjoyed in Paris during his sojourn there; it certainly has most of the vices of modern French music, the characteristics which delight the Parisian concert-goer today. It suggested to us some thoughts on descriptive and picturesque music in general. We could not help thinking what an exceedingly ephemeral life a composition of this sort must have, if its life is to depend mainly upon its descriptive or suggestive virtue. So much depends upon the point of view of this or that age! Take this piece of Svendsen's; suppose (if you can) that it could have been heard in Father Haydn's day! It would then indubitably have been set down as a daring tone painting of hell-fire and brimstone. Come down a few generations, say to Berlioz's time, and you would find it recognized as a musical picture of a witches' Sabbath. Today it calls itself a representation of carnival revelry and merriment; but who knows, if it live to be heard by our grandchildren, that they will not find in it a vivid suggestion of five o'clock tea? So do things lose their savor with time! To us last Saturday evening the piece suggested mainly a troop of intoxicated undergraduates trying to sing the march in the "Fille du Régiment," and not being able quite to catch the tune. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

The "Euryanthe" overture was grandly given; we were especially glad to find Mr. Nikisch take the cantabile second theme not so very much slower than the principal tempo.

And Paderewski? Ah, there is a man like few! During the last two or three days we have heard many people insist upon it that he was a poet. This reminds us a little of what Robert Browning once said to a lady who asked him to read a certain sermon by Theodore Parker, telling him that he would find it a perfect prose-poem. "For heaven's sake don't bring me any prose-poems," cried Browning: "that is a genre for which we poets have no respect at all!" We have had so many "poets" of the pianoforte of late years that the term has lost a good deal of its dignity. These gentry have, as a rule, had one grave failing in common; in becoming "poets" they have too often ceased to be musicians; their playing has been so very poetic that it has well-nigh knocked all the music out of the compositions they played. Let us not rank Paderewski with such as these. We will admit freely that he is as poetic as you please; but he is mainly and predominantly a musician, and this is—in his circumstances—far more important. He comes to us both as composer and pianist; let us take the composer first—a tout seigneur tout honneur!

In his A minor concerto it is probably the poetic, imaginative side that presents itself most strongly to the average hearer; but the more careful, experienced listener is struck far more forcibly with the way in which he has made his glowing poetic imagination obedient to normal musical conditions. In this beautiful work he has given to the world something a thousand times higher and better than a tone-poem, namely, a really poetic composition. Note the wealth of healthy melodic invention in the work; the stout, natural, organic construction of each one of the three movements. Note, not merely the richness and variety, but the well-considered balance of the orchestral coloring, the careful minding of what painters would call the values. His orchestration is as truly organic as his musical form; there are no random flashes of color, but every shade shows its connection with, and dependence upon, something else. This is music, and all the better for being poetic music; it is no mere half musical imaginative Pfuscherei. In a word, this concerto seems to us one of the finest of its kind we have heard for some time.

As a pianist Paderewski naturally belongs to the hors concours class. Whatever respect one may have for adjectives, one need have no hesitation in calling him great. A highly poetic player he certainly is; but what we admire most in his playing, as in his writing, is its fine musical quality. There is infinite variety of light and shade in it, a well-nigh unparalleled warmth of feeling, an ideal poetic quality; but there is also a fine sense for musical beauty—beauty of tone, beauty of outline, beauty of relation—such as is all too rare today. In the power of exciting enthusiasm, of carrying an audience along with him unresisting, he is second to no pianist we have ever heard. His phrasing is a marvel of perfection. We had rather have had him leave the second Liszt rhapsody to young ladies' seminaries, and must say that his giving the Liszt-Paganini "Campanella" was out of place at a symphony concert—wonderfully as he played it. But his playing of his own concerto and of the two things by Chopin was a pure delight not soon to be forgotten. Only a genius can play so.

The next programme (Dec. 19) is: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte;" symphonic concerto for violin and viola; symphony in E-flat; two arias—all by Mozart. Mme. Fursch-Madi will be the singer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler the violinist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violist.

NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 12/6

Madame Lillian Nordica, the vocalist of the concert, possesses a clear musical voice which the critics in the house were not slow to appreciate. In the selections chosen by Madame Nordica (arias from "The Queen of Sheba" and "Tannhaeuser") she had little opportunity to display her execution, which is said to be wonderful. The singer was liked best in the "Tannhaeuser" aria, which a rapturous audience compelled her to repeat. In high and low registers her notes rang out pure and sweet and in a rippling melody that was irresistibly charming.

The popular matinee was attended by over 1800 persons, and like the more pretentious evening performance was an emphatic success. The boxes were occupied by students of the St. Margaret's school and the Holy Angels' Academy.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert on Monday evening, at Chickering Hall, with the following programme: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor; prelude to "Die Meistersinger;" symphonic poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, and Volkmann's concerto for the violoncello in A minor, opus 33, to be played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Knersel Quartet will give its second concert at Sherry's on Friday evening, Dec. 11, with the following programme: Haydn's quartet in D; Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, and a quintet for pianoforte and strings, by Sinding, in which the musicians will have the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Brooklyn.

Friday Afternoon, December 11, at 3 o'clock.
Saturday Evening, December 12, at 8 o'clock.
Under the auspices of the
PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON - 1891-92
PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Season tickets, including reserved seats for the remaining series of five rehearsals, or for the series of five concerts, $3.50, $4.50, and $6.50, according to location, and single tickets now on sale at CHANDLER'S MUSIC STORE, 300 Fulton Street.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12-7

Lovers of music in Brooklyn are on the qui vive for the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second in their series, which will take place on Saturday evening next at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. The second public rehearsal will be given next Friday afternoon. It is unnecessary to speak of the ability of the wonderful orchestra so skillfully directed by Mr. Nikisch. By universal consent it ranks among the great orchestras, not merely of this country, but of the world. The interest of the occasion is to be immensely heightened by the first appearance here of the pianist, Paderewski. This great artist comes to this country unheralded, but he has been heard in New York sufficiently to show that those who now hear him will have an experience that is seldom vouchsafed in a lifetime. Mr. Nikisch has selected a brilliant and attractive programme, in which Paderewski will play his own concerto, with orchestra, and solos by Chopin and Liszt. Tickets for these concerts, as well as for the balance of the course, are on sale at Chandler's.

Beacon, Dorchester, Mass.

Date 12-5

—The Boston Symphony orchestra is being elbowed on its own ground by New York's lusty musical infant.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, DEC. 11.

Boston Artists in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 10.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra came over from Washington today and gave their second concert of the season here tonight in the Academy concert hall before an immense audience, which was very enthusiastic. Mr. Alfred Greenfield was the soloist of the evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97. ......Schuman Vivace. Molto moderato. Andante. Religioso. Vivace.
Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, Op. 70 ......Rubinstein Moderato. Moderato assai. Allegro assai.
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte for strings......Bach
For string orchestra. Arranged by Bachrich.
Overture, "Euryanthe."......Weber

[69]

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, DEC. 10.

CONCERT SEASON OPENED.

Mme. Nordica and Mr. Schroeder Appear Before a Washington Audience.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9.—The first of this season's concerts, under the auspices of the music committee, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given in the Congregational church tonight, before an audience that filled the edifice to overflowing.

It was a brilliant audience, too, senators and representatives, with their wives and daughters, going to make up the crowd.

Mme. Lilian Nordica and Mr. Alvin Schroeder were the soloists. Nordica sang Gounod's aria from the "Queen of Sheba," and Wagner's aria, "O Lovely Halls," from Tannhauser, while Schroeder played Tschaikowsky's suite, op. 55. Both were warmly received.

The programme was as follows:

Overture, Leonore, No. 3..................Beethoven
Aria from The Queen of Sheba..............Gounod
Suite, op. 55......................Tschaikowsky Elegie.
Valse Melancholique.
Scherzo.
Tema con Variazioni.
Soli for 'cello.
(a) Sarabande..........................Bach
(b) Serenata......................Hans Sitt
(c) Spinnlied........................Popper
Aria, O Lovely Halls, from Tannhauser...Wagner
Prelude, Die Meistersinger...............Wagner

POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 12-6

A widespread interest exists in the coming series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its accomplished conductor, Arthur Nikisch, and the many admirers of this fine organization are to be congratulated on the outlook. Five concerts are announced to be given in the Congregational Church on Wednesday evenings, December 9, January 13, February 10, March 16, and April 27. In the expectation that the new Music Hall would be available for the concerts, the management had arranged for a season of especial brilliancy and attractiveness. The plans made will be fully carried out, though for a time the destruction of the new hall threatened to deprive the musical public of these splendid entertainments. The superiority of the Boston Orchestra is too well known in this city through its concerts of past seasons to require extended notice. The organization is now in its eleventh year, and is said to be in better form than ever before. Sterling programmes will be presented, and every effort made to maintain the high standard of artistic achievement already established. During his summer in Europe Mr. Nikisch secured a number of worthy novelties, some of which will be heard here during the season. A notable and delightful feature of the concerts will be the appearance with the orchestra of a number of famous solo artists. Engagements have already been made with Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Madame Nordica, who will be the soloist at the first concert next Wednesday evening, fairly ranks as one of the world's great singers. The brilliant success of her artistic career on the other side of the Atlantic is a source of pride to all music-loving Americans. So constant is the demand for her services in London in opera and oratorio that she has found little time for several years to visit her native land. The last time she was heard here was as a member of Mr. Abbey's Patti-Tamagno opera company. The programme in full for next Wednesday's concert is as follows:

Overture—"Lenore No. 3"............Beethoven
Aria "La Reine de Saba"................Gounod
Madame Nordica.
Suite for Orchestra No. 3.........Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoncello,
Mr. Schroeder.
Elizabeth's aria from Tannhaeuser......Wagner
Madame Nordica.
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger"............Wagner

Season tickets for the five concerts are now on sale at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s, 937 Pennsylvania avenue. Single tickets for the first concert will be ready on Tuesday. The difficulty experienced in finding a house for these concerts once more emphasized the need in this city for such an auditorium as Mr. Metzerott expects to provide by another season. Though Messrs. Albaugh and Rapley showed every desire to accommodate the orchestra the engagements of their theaters made it impossible to provide the needed dates. The musical community is indebted to the music committee of the Congregational Church for making the necessary arrangements to give the concerts in the church.

* * *

THE SUN,

WEDNESDAY DECEMBER 9,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The happy thought which led Mr. Walter Damrosch to give Boston a quid pro quo for her generosity in lending us her orchestra, once in a while, allows our New England sister to hear some excellent work this week from New York musicians. And the programme will be a much more brilliant and attractive one than that offered to us by Mr. Nickisch last evening, for Damrosch has an especial talent in assembling and contrasting music upon a concert scheme, whereas, for some reason, the programme set before the audience at the Boston Symphony concert last night made rather a dull and dreary impression. As a novelty, there was a symphonic poem, by Richard Strauss, entitled "Don Juan," representing, undoubtedly, that gentleman's (we mean Don Juan's) characteristic and continual strivings after happiness. It was suggested by a poem of Nikolaus Lenaus, and in Mr. John P. Jackson's translation the first few lines runs thus:

O magic realm, illimited, eternal,
Of gloried woman, loveliness supernal!
Fain would I in the storm of stressful bliss
Expire upon the last one's lingering kiss!
Through every realm, O friend, would wing my flight,
Wherever Beauty blooms kneel down to each,
And, if for one brief moment, win delight.

* * * * * * *

I flee from surfeit and from rapture's cloy,
Keeping fresh for Beauty service and employ,
Grieving the one that all I may enjoy.

The music is not beautiful, scarcely descriptive, unless we recognize the intense restlessness which is its chief point as portraying the hero's roving propensities. There are no broad themes, and no variety of instrumentation, but a constant weaving in and out of bits and threads of musical phrases which one could hardly dignify with the name "ideas." Strauss is still a very young man of only 28, who, through the influence of Raff and Von Bulow came into prominence a few years ago, and who has written two symphonies, several symphonic poems, and many other smaller compositions. Strauss was appointed successor to Von Bulow, as conductor of the Meiningen orchestra, afterward going to Munich as assistant conductor, and later to Weimar as court conductor, which position he still holds. Whatever his other compositions may hold of charm or worth, the one presented last evening certainly made an unpleasing impression. This was presently removed, however, by Alwin Schroeder's admirable playing of Volkmann's concerto for violoncello, opus 33. It is a valuable contribution to 'cello literature, to which Mr. Scroeder's artistic rendering did full justice.

By all odds the finest performance of the evening was the "Prelude to the Meistersinger." Mr. Nikisch took it in much slower tempo than that to which we are accustomed under Seidl's bâton, but the effect was excellent, though a little pedantic and didactic, as every one of Nikisch's interpretations are. What it gained, and that in which it surpassed any former rendering, was in the clearness of the separate themes. There is but little fire or enthusiasm about Boston's conductor, but much precision and elegance. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" made the only remaining number of the programme.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 10, 1891.

UNDER NIKISCH'S BATON

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Congregational Church.

A PROGRAMME OF NOVELTIES

Mme. Lillian Nordica in Magnificent Voice — Mr. Schroeder's Distinct Success—A Fashionable and Appreciative Audience Filled the House.

The first Boston Symphony concert of this season was the attraction sufficient to fill the Congregational Church last evening with an audience of music lovers. In spite of the difficulties in the way of securing a suitable hall, persistent efforts succeeded finally in the opening of the church, which was the most desirable quarters to be had. While in other auditoriums the orchestra might have been heard to greater advantage, the members of the orchestra bravely submitted to such trivial matters as lack of space and poor arrangement of light and made a noble evening's work.

The programme consisted almost wholly of novelties, so great a number of them has hardly before been presented by the orchestra, and Nikisch had inserted but two Wagner numbers. Above all it was an emotional programme, each number being full of sentiment or passion. The third overture to Beethoven's "Leonore" is one of the strongest of overtures, and although full of rarity, deep fear and longing is often compared unfavorably to the Coriolan overture. The "Leonore 3rd" in composition is far above the grade of music demanded by the argument of the opera, and might have applied to any great struggle of the world. The sudden introduction of the trumpet calls, played behind the scenes, was a surprise to those unfamiliar with "Leonore," and the propriety of destroying the unity of the passage in such a manner was questioned, as it is wherever this overture is played. Nikisch has his men in more complete unison than ever, if that were possible, but the overture was only a prelude to a still more effective number, the principal work of the night. Tscuaikowsky, the Russian pupil and disciple of Rubenstein, is gaining in popularity with music lovers, and the suite executed by the Symphony orchestra was calculated to heighten the impression already made. Tschaikowsky is pre-eminently a dramatist in minors, and the tenderness, the plaintive gloom and passion, combined with conciseness of score, were sufficient to enchain the audience. The first movement of the "Elegie" may not have been popular, but was full of melancholy expression. The second, "Valse Melancholique," was by all odds the weirdest of the four, while the scherzo seemed commonplace beside the two previous movements, and was only noticeable for the introduction of triangle, cymbals, and tambourine.

The most lengthy and elaborate movement was the fourth, in which the theme was stated by the first violins and the variations distributed in a subtle manner among groups. In the fourth variation, where a change to the minor key and the theme assumes a new form, the accenting instruments did beautiful work. The violin solo linking the ninth and tenth variations and dominating the latter was another accurate bit, while the finale, displaying the predominant attributes of the composer, gave every instrument a grand opportunity to co-operate with Nikisch in showing how completely the conductor and orchestra can lose themselves in the composer, yet never for a second lose sight of each other.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the violoncello soloist, played three numbers, a saraband of Bach, a Hans Sitt serenade, and a spinnlied of Popper's, which all seemed to have been chosen especially to illustrate how very tenderly and daintily the soloist could execute. There was a lack of that virility that has characterized other 'celloists brought here by the Symphony previously, but the sympathetic rendition of three such selections won unlimited applause from the audience.

The beautiful soloist of the evening was Mme. Lillian Nordica, and beside those who went because they admire her so greatly were many quite as eager to hear her for the first time. The career and immense success of Lillian Nordica have always excited great interest. She is a tall, queenly woman, of superb physique and features. She was in prime humor last evening, and accordingly sang magnificently. Her first number, the famous aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," was almost new, having been heard but by few here. The principal thing it proved was that Mme. Nordica's soprano voice was plush-lined, powerful, and flawless. When it came to the Tannhaeuser aria, "O, Lovely Halls," nothing more realistic could have been desired than to see Nordica in Elizabeth's garb and acting as well as singing. Every note was a gesture in itself, and the orchestra hardly seemed to moderate its force at all while Nordica's voice soared above it in a perfect volume of sweetness. The audience called and called for her return, but the rule of "no encores" was rigorously adhered to.

The closing number was the Meistersinger prelude of Wagner's, which was extremely picturesque, especially in the introduction of the fancy instruments.

The audience was a large and fashionable one, in it being Mrs. Cameron and party, Senator and Mrs. Wolcott and party, Mrs. Manderson, Mrs. Anson G. McCook, and Lady Pauncefote and the Misses Pauncefote.

The New-York Times.
TEN PAGES.
NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 9, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as welcome as the flowers in Spring. The auditor rejoices in a sense of security when he drops into his seat in Chickering Hall, knowing full well that, whatever may be the merit of the music, it will be played with a devoted earnestness, with a true artistic purpose, and after careful and detailed preparation. It is unfortunate that one cannot always be sure of all these things at all the orchestral concerts given in this city, but such is the sad and dispiriting fact.

Last night's concert, the second given here this season by the gentlemen of Boston under Mr. Nikisch, derived its chief interest from the performance of two familiar works. The novelty of the evening was Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan." The work was suggested by a poem of Lenau's, in which Don Juan makes a few brief remarks about the beauty and variety of love. The composer has plainly striven to represent the ever fresh and aggressive ardor of the gayest of Lotharios, together with his sensuous romanticism. The final satiety and utter coldness of heart that are the retribution of the libertine, and which are depicted in the closing lines of the poem, are the foundation of the last few measures of the music.

Strauss has made an ambitious attempt at an imposing mood-picture. His orchestration is magnificent in its array of instrumental forces, its distribution of effects, and its variety of color; though it must be said that there is some writing for the trumpets which is, to say the least, experimental. It is certainly a questionable proceeding to wrest instruments from their nature in the search after effect. But the main difficulty with the composition is the baldness of its thematic material and the consequent poverty of its development. The most eloquent passages bear something more than a family resemblance to the musical language of "Tristan und Isolde," and the most striking harmonic effects, which are the best features of the work, are wholly reminiscent of the final period of Wagner's development.

The solo performer of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who chose as his vehicle of display Robert Volkmann's 'cello concerto, Opus 33. It is no news that the 'cello is but poorly suited to exhibitions of virtuosity. All the difficult and dazzling feats that are performed on the instrument are foreign to its nature, and the player who essays them enters the region occupied by Liszt's "Études Transcendentales," where technical facility reigns to the utter obscurement of real music. Volkmann's concerto is a virtuoso piece of the most pronounced type, and Mr. Schroeder's cleverness served only to surprise the injudicious while it only bored the sincere music lover. It must be added that the player's tone was by no means as clear and vibrant as could be desired, though it is quite probable that his instrument was to blame for this.

While the orchestra's performance of the Strauss symphonic poem was superb, it was in the two exquisite movements of Schubert's unfinished symphony and in Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" that the players made the happiest impression on the audience. Both works were performed with that loving attention to details which characterizes Mr. Nikisch's readings, and with the splendid precision and nice balance of tone which are the salient features of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK RECORDER,
DECEMBER 9, 1891.

SOME RARE MUSIC.

Success of the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the late Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart had perchance wandered within the portals of Chickering Hall last night he would have heard the audacious utterances of a bold, fantastic "Don Juan," but a younger cavalier than he, who has been accepted by the world as the ideal musical "Don Juan." The gay young libertine in question was the production of a Cologne composer, Richard Strauss by name, and he is served up in symphonic poem form, if form it can truthfully be said to possess.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is evidently in sympathy with works as radical as this one, and its brilliancy, youthful extravagances and bizarre orchestration make one involuntarily think of Berlioz—but a German Berlioz, with more bottom than the fantastic Frenchman and greater thematic gifts. Strauss's "Don Juan" (which Mr. Seidl first gave to New York) is a passionate production that at the very outset leaps into medias res and is full of startling climaxes. In this "poem" all the sins of the modern school find lodgment. The overladen color, restless tonality and sometimes strained instrumentation, novel enough in all faith, are present, with strong echoes of Wagner and Berlioz, but with that strong eloquence which stamps the composer as an individual musical thinker. It was wonderfully played by the orchestra, which for delicacy of nuance has no equal on this continent.

The solo player of the evening was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the solo 'cellist of the orchestra, who played Volkmann's A minor concerto in an honest, unaffected manner, his tone being musical but his style rather plegmatic. The Mendelssohn-like cantilena, with which the concerto abounds, invests it with a sentimentalism that soon becomes cloying. Mr. Schroeder has not enough of the virtuoso spirit in his fingers to make it interesting.

The symphony played was Schubert's lovely B minor, the "unfinished." It was read in a fine, free manner by Mr. Nikisch, with several important dynamic innovations, notably in the first movement. The andante was warmly and tenderly given. The concert closed with the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," delivered by the orchestra in a very finished style, but lacking in that wealth of coloring and breadth of expression which we are accustomed to in this city. The wood-wind work was particularly commendable. Indeed it fills a Gothamite with envy—and not a little spleen to listen to such a perfect tonal balance and characteristic musical quality in the wind department of this orchestra. Chickering Hall was crowded to the doors, and as usual inadequately ventilated.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, DEC. 12.

HEARD PADEREWSKI.

Famous Pianist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of their public rehearsals in the Academy of Music this afternoon, before an audience which completely filled the house.

It is a rare thing for New York people to go to Brooklyn for any cause whatever, but among the vast audience which crowded the academy this afternoon were many well-known New York faces.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was not alone the cause of this pilgrimage to the City of Churches. The fact that Ignace J. Paderewski was the soloist was in part the cause. His success has been phenomenal, and in every city where he has played the people have been charmed and fascinated by him.

The programme today was as follows:

Overture, Prometheus Bound..........Goldmark
Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in C minor, Op. 44,
....Saint-Saens
Allegro moderato; Andante.
Allegro vivace; Andante; Allegro.
Waldweben, from Siegfried..............Wagner
Soli for Piano.
(a) Impromptu........................Chopin
(b) Rhapsodie Hongroise...................Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 23...........Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegrettos grazioso (quasi andantino).
Allegro con spirito.

At the concert tomorrow night the same programme will be repeated.

The World
JOSEPH PULITZER.
Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch Secures Another Triumph at Chickering Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, took place yesterday at Chickering Hall. The soloist was the first 'cello of the orchestra, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan"..Richard Strauss
(First time in this city.)
Concerto for Violoncello, op. 33, A minor.
Volkmann
Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Symphony, B minor, No. 8, unfinished ...Schubert
Prelude, "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Wagner

"O magic realm, illimited, eternal,
Of gloried woman—loveliness supernal!
Fain would I, in the storm of stressful bliss,
Expire upon the last one's lingering kiss."

This is the motto and gist of the poem of Levant which inspired the symphonic poem by Strauss, heard for the first time last night. The work is brilliant, daring, richly orchestrated, almost too complex to be accurately judged by a single hearing. The first impression left was that the work was too energetic, too nervous, too little concentrated to convey the dreamy sensuousness of the theme. For all this a work of decided individuality and power. Richard Strauss, at present Court Conductor at Weimar, is still a young man, being only thirty-one years old, and has made a decided mark as a composer in Germany. He succeeded Von Bülow as Conductor of the Meininger Band when barely of age, and was, before taking his present position at Weimar, for three years Associate Conductor at Munich. He is incontestably a composer with a future.

In Volkmann's familiar and distinguished concerto Mr. Schroeder gave evidence of talent of a high order, both as artist and virtuoso. His tone is clear, round and sympathetic and his playing, in respect of intonation, phrasing and general style, is far above the ordinary.

It is to Sir George Grove that we owe the rescue of Schubert's despairingly beautiful symphonic fragment, so exquisitely interpreted last evening, from the dust and neglect of forty-five years, and to the same eminent critic the remark that this fascinating, while sorrowful, picture of the deepest emotion, this poem of unrequited, despairing love, is indeed and in truth "unlike the rest of the music of Schubert or of any one else." Criticism was even dumb before such almost weirdly superhuman beauty of thought expressed with such consumate mastery of art.

The interpretation was worthy of the subject, absolute in delicacy, sentiment and precision, instinct with real refinement and free from exaggeration or affectation. A finely, broad and intense reading of the "Meistersinger" prelude brought to a close an exceptionally enjoyable concert.

Each successive hearing only deepens the impression that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the most artistic leadership of Mr. Nikisch, is almost beyond criticism. This orchestra need not fear comparison with any other; it is wholly admirable. Possibly the most striking feature in its playing is the wonderful balance of tone. The various elements unite in forming a vast magnificent single instrument, capable of expressing every gradation of feeling, sentiment and emotion with the most delicate pathos or the most commanding and forceful vigor.

The next concert will take place on Tuesday, Jan. 12.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1891.

BOSTON'S BAND CAN DO BETTER.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, given under Mr. Nikisch's direction last night in Chickering Hall before a crowded house, was neither so interesting in its programme nor so satisfactory in the performance of the orchestra as might have been expected.

There was a good deal of rough work on the part of the wind instruments—never a strong department of this band—and at no time during the evening was there any such brilliancy upon the part of the strings as might make one forget other shortcomings.

The symphonic poem of Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," is an interesting and admirably scored affair, rather long drawn out, perhaps, but full of clever writing, and the orchestra did its best work with it. Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony was well played, especially the lovely allegro, but the "Meistersinger" prelude was a ragged and confused performance.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the soloist of the evening, played Volkmann's rather tedious 'cello concerto with an utter absence of delicacy, sentiment or even technical finish of an ordinary type. Altogether, it was something of an off night with Boston's admirable orchestra.

The Daily Standard-Union.
SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 12, 1891.

PADEREWSKI

Charmed the Orchestra as Well as the Audience.

His Delightful Playing at the Philharmonic Rehearsal—A Programme of Exceptional Artistic Beauty Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Philharmonic rehearsal yesterday afternoon, presented a programme of unusual beauty, calculated to attract a much larger audience than that present. It was only a fair house, but fortunately somewhat discriminating and enthusiastic. It is curious that in Brooklyn an audience of 5,000 will gather to hear a meritorious and interesting, but by no means highly finished, performance of the "Messiah," while a concert of such artistic excellence as that offered yesterday by Conductor Nikisch should go begging for listeners. Even so great an attraction as the Polish pianist Paderewski failed to fill the Academy. Obviously something is at fault here. Do Brooklyn people not know a good thing? Or is the trouble with the management?

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture was marked by his usual careful attention to details. These were in no way allowed, however, to belittle his general conception of it, which is broad and rich. Goldmark as a composer is a modern of moderns. Always melodious, he overwhelms us in the "Prometheus" with his prodigality in this respect. Melodies, picturesque and suggestive, crowd upon us, developed by a man skilled in orchestration, and keenly alive to the resources of the modern orchestra. Regarded from a popular point of view, Goldmark is more of a Frenchman than a German. His work suggests Saint-Saens and Berlioz.

Those who happened to have carried with them yesterday the programmes issued a week ago, must have been confused by the substitution of a concerto by Paderewski, for the one by Saint-Saens. The latter is ably described in the programme at some length by G. H. Wilson, but the description by no means fits the Paderewski concerto, and an attempt at reconciling the two produces discomfort. The Paderewski concerto demonstrates what we have already been told, that the composer is a musician as well as a pianist. The first movement, an allegro, is bright and spirited; it holds the interest perfectly, and is nowhere so elaborate as to be incomprehensible at a first hearing. The tempo is delightful—suave and flowing. The orchestration is rich and full, but never overpowering. The second movement, a "Romanza," is delicately sentimental; the last movement is a brilliant "allegro molto vivace."

About Paderewski himself, what can be said? His arrival in this country was preceded by announcements and quotations from English papers so superlative in character that they failed to carry weight with them. The result was to put the critics on their guard. This, as it turned out, was fortunate, and led to a mast agreeable surprise. Doubtless a great artist like Paderewski often feels that he has failed to reach his ideal. But ordinary mortals should be glad that their perceptions are less keen, and that once in a great while they may for a few minutes enjoy something like a realization of human longings after perfection. Paderewski appeals to the populace with his wonderful technique, and his emotional genius. But he adds to these the balancing power of intellect. From the first, it was evident yesterday that a cordial understanding existed between Mr. Nikisch, the orchestra, and Paderewski. The pianist watched the leader closely, and solo and orchestra parts came together with spirited precision. The two men, both so youthful in appearance, so mature and vigorous in their attainments, formed a most interesting little group, worthy of the brush of an able painter. Mr. Nikisch has a characteristic way of standing with his left thumb in his trousers pocket, a pose he rarely varies except to turn a leaf Both men are very free from affectations. At the close of the concerto, Mr. Nikisch warmly shook Paderewski's hand, and the orchestra joined in the enthusiastic applause. This sympathy between soloist and orchestra, was again apparent when Paderewski played his other selectons, the Chopin impromptu, in "D" sharp minor, opus 36, and the Liszt "Rhapsodie Hongroise." It seemed as though the musicians themselves furnished an audience of the most inspiring kind. They paid close attention, and those in the rear ranks stood up to watch the player as he gave the wonderful crescendo at the end of the rhapsody. If Paderewski had come to this country for spiritual encouragement only, it would not have been necessary yesterday to have an audience at all. The orchestra sufficed.

Paderewsk's playing has been called, perhaps justly, exaggerated, Certainly his rendering of the Liszt rhapsody was exaggerated in the extreme; but Liszt himself is often exaggerated, and nowhere more so than in the Hungarian rhapsodies. Judging by his performance of the impromptu, Paderewski, as a player of Chopin, is beyond criticism.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the Siegfried music contained no novelties, but it was finished. The Brahms symphony in D is more tuneful and less elaborate than some of the others. At the best, however, it is a work only to be thoroughly appreciated after frequent hearings. The most attractive movement is the third, a delightful "allegretto grazioso (quasi andantino.)"

The whole symphony was given in a broad spirit, and will doubtless make a deeper impression on the audience at the concert to-night.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 13, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTH CONCERT.

This was the programme for the eighth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, December 5:

Beethoven.	Symphony No. 4, in B flat. Adagio; Allegro vivace.— Adagio.—Minuet.— Allegro ma non troppo.
Paderewski.	Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in A minor, op. 17. Allegro. — Romanza (Andante).— Allegro molto vivace.
Svendsen.	Episode. "Carnival in Paris." (First time at these Concerts.)
	Soli for Piano.
a) Chopin.	Impromptu.
b) Chopin.	Valse.
c) Liszt.	Rhapsodie Hongroise.
Weber.	Overture, "Euryanthe."

Soloist: Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

Boston music people turned out in full numbers to hear the famous pianist, Ignace J. Paderewski, at his first appearance here. So much has been written of and said about this remarkable man that Bostonians were ablaze with curiosity, not to say excitement, to see and hear this veritable wizard of the pianoforte keyboard. The personality of this man is striking, if not attractive. He is not small, but somewhat below the average weight. He came on the stage in an undemonstrative manner, first bowing to his audience, then the orchestra, and lastly, but not least, to the pianoforte. We are told he always does this, because he thinks the instrument is a part of himself, human, and deserving recognition just as much as his audience. Once seated at the pianoforte, he adjusts himself to it for the ordeal of the work in hand. A good look at his face shows rather a sad expression at first, which lights up wonderfully as he proceeds, becoming more and more animated, until his face grows radiant with the fire of genius from every point. The color and bristly appearance of his hair gives rather undue prominence to the size of his head, but proves attractive than otherwise, and helps to stamp his great personality.

Paderewski is unlike any other pianist who has visited us, therefore not subject to any comparisons. To illustrate: Within a few weeks we have heard two other good pianists at Music hall. One was an artist in every sense, so far as technique and a finished performance of his work was concerned. He also possessed the physique to enable him to accomplish any amount of difficulties, which he did with apparent ease. Yet, he was only a skilled artist. The other also was an artist in the sense of technical education, playing correctly, like a student who had learned his lesson thoroughly well. There was no special attractiveness about either of the above pianists, except their technical and artistic excellence. Paderewski possesses ample technique for his purposes, but of a different kind,—original, inspired, so to speak, though not so infallibly certain as that of some others heard here. But Paderewski is more than a "technition," a machine, an artist; he is a born genius of the most pronounced stamp.

His Concerto is interestingly constructed, richly orchestrated, and with him in the title rôle commanded the closest attention and created the greatest enthusiasm. He was many times called out. Each time he was recalled he bowed to his pianoforte! He also shook hands with conductor Nikisch for the fine manner in which his orchestra accompanied him.

The solo numbers, "Impromptu in F sharp," as also the "C sharp minor waltz" of Chopin, were most fascinatingly played. The "Second Liszt Rhapsodie" received a notable and original interpretation. There are some doubts if Paderewski ever plays this Rhapsodie twice alike. He made it brilliant, taking, highly interesting, riveting attention from beginning to end, though it was nothing like the traditional interpretation we have many times heard. However, with a genius like Paderewski, there is no use in taking exception to anything he may play, for he is a power unto himself, no doubt, playing just as he feels at the moment. There is, really, no accounting for the playing of such a man.

It would be an act of injustice not to speak of the excellent work of the orchestra. They merit nothing but words of praise. The Symphony was well read, and well played, with but few minor points to criticise. The Episode of Svendsen was certainly interesting from any standpoint.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1891.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert on Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall. It was attended by an audience that filled all seating and standing room, as is usually the case at these concerts. Some of the malcontents are beginning to grumble at this series and are heard to suggest that with her almost embarassmente de riches in the orchestra line it is quite unnecssary to bring outside talent into New York at the present day. We would respectfully suggest, in return, that their view is a narrow and one-sided one. The Boston orchestra is, in the first place, a most excellent one, trained to a point of perfection that is almost unique. It is the pedantic spirit that animates our modern Athens, that engenders and inspires this peculiar sort of training. New York is more cosmopolitan, and, therefore, broader and more liberal in her views and public spirit, and our orchestral organizations play accordingly. The liberalizing effect that arises from mutual intercourse is always beneficial. We have noticed a marked improvement in many ways in our local orchestras since the Boston Symphony Society gave their first concert here. Mr. Damrosch is taking a step in the right direction, in giving a series of Boston concerts, and we trust and hope that Boston will profit by and enjoy the New York orchestra, as much as we have done their favorites.

The programme was less conservative than usual, the four composers represented being Schubert, Wagner, Volkmann and Richard Strauss, the latter a young man of exceptionally brilliant promise and talent. The symphonic poem, "Don Juan," which was performed upon this occasion, made a favorable impression, due in part to the splendid interpretation of the band under Mr. Nikisch. Richard Strauss is a protege of Von Bülow, who has fostered his genius most carefully. He was concert master of the Meiningen orchestra under Bülow and succeeded that eccentric leader upon his resignation. Strauss is now court conductor at Weimar. The "Don Juan" is based upon Nicholaus Lenau's poem, which has been excellently translated by John P. Jackson, and we quote from the house programme the following verse:

O magic realm, illimited, eternal,
Of gloried woman,—loveliness supernal!
  Fain would I, in the storm of stressful bliss,
  Expire upon the last one's lingering kiss!
Through every realm, O friend, would wing my flight,
  Wherever Beauty blooms, kneel down to each,
And—if for one brief moment, win delight!

The ecstatic plane upon which the poem is based is well expounded in the musical setting, which is as tense and high flown a composition as could be desired. The rhapsodic style is well maintained and there is plenty of melodic beauty. The instrumental effects are at times thrilling in their intensity, and Strauss shows himself to be a master of the resources of the orchestra. The reading of the work by Mr. Nikisch was impassioned in the extreme, and presented the young composer in the best possible light. The work will hardly become popular, however, on account of the continuous strain of effects that only a very skillful leader will keep from overstraining the bounds. Mr. Nikisch received hearty and well deserved applause at its close. It hardly left the tone of the audience in a state to receive the Volkmann concerto for violoncello that followed, in as favorable a mood as one would have desired. After working the sensibilities up to a state of extreme intensity there must come a reaction, and it was in the midst of this reaction that Mr. Alwin Schroeder commenced the Volkmann composition, a work also in the modern style, but so much less inspired, less dramatic, that had it not been for the superb playing of Mr. Schroeder there would have been a serious anticlimax. The work is not devoid of merit; indeed, in the paucity of a suitable répertoire for the 'cello it can be accepted, if not with enthusiasm, at least with gratitude for something to vary the monotony with. It has pleasing themes and melodies, and is most skillfully put together, while the technique of the player is not taxed to the detriment of the composition. Mr. Schroeder's playing was overflowing with inspiration and exquisite sensibility. His tone upon the instrument is not so large, but it is refined and musical, and charms one with its sweetness and deliciously liquid purity. He played with an abandon and passion that was brilliantly effective and he won several most enthusiastic recalls. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," most delightfully performed by the orchestra, and the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" completed the programme.

[71]

BALTIMORE
AMERICAN—FRIDAY
DECEMBER 11, 1891.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony's Concert—A Splendid Program.

For the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy Concert Hall last evening, Mr. Nikisch presented one of the strongest programs ever given in this city. There were four composers, Schumann, Rubinstein, Bach and Weber, each with an important, and, at the same time, characteristic work. The "Rhenish Symphony" is undoubtedly Schumann's best. It comes as near the classic form as Schumann could get without cramping himself, and yet it cannot be said to be in any form but Schumann's own; or, in other words, the classic form is altered and amended by Schumann. To Schumann, form was as a home, that he sought only when it rained outside. He regarded it as a result or effect, rather than as a cause or fixed mould, and hence did not consider himself bound to be limited by it. In music, as in everything else, when a form becomes incapable of change, it is dead. Schumann's forms are irregular, but full of life, and the "Rhenish Symphony" is one of his best examples.

As a Schumann conductor, Nikisch is unsurpassed. He is not a believer in set symmetry, and does not like to submit to its slavish tyranny; so he welcomes Schumann, giving him life and liberty. As a consequence, the rendition of the "Rhenish Symphony" was in the vein of the Boston Orchestra's very best work.

After the symphony came the Rubinstein D minor concerto. This requires a fine orchestra, a superb piano, a grand player, and a careful, conscientious and sympathetic leader, and all the conditions were fully met. The concerto is in as classic form as a Russian could be expected to employ. It does not even call for all the modern orchestra; but Rubinstein's will-power is shown all the same. Gruenfeld's rendition of the work is almost beyond praise. He brings to its interpretation the broad discernment and power of an experienced artist having well-balanced intellect, and plays without any trifling with mere virtuoso trickery. After years of playing of every kind of composition written for the piano, he has acquired the wisdom of presenting each composer in his own individual way; and Rubinstein himself could not present his work more loyally than it is given by Gruenfeld. His reception was enthusiastic. After hearing his marvelous performance, one ceases to wonder at his court positions or his universal popularity in the old world. In art, mind and manners he is beyond criticism.

The Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte, for strings, set between the Rubinstein concerto and the Von Weber overture, was like a deep and beautiful vista of the musical past, in which the purely modern dramatic element of music is conspicuously absent. The old style has a charm of its own, which is still further heightened by judicious contrast with the modern. Weber's overture to his opera "Euryanthe" ended the choice program of one of the finest concerts ever heard in this city. Gruenfeld has now been introduced to the Baltimore public in connection with the fine Boston Orchestra, and the lovers of music will be interested to hear his solo and concerted numbers in connection with his brother, the celebrated violoncellist, next Friday evening.

New York, N. Y.

te 12/12

THE KUEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Their Second Performance at Sherry's a Great Success.

The Kneisel Quartet, with the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, piano, gave their second quartet concert at Sherry's New Hall yesterday evening. The following programme was rendered:

Quartet in D	Haydn
Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3	Schumann
Quintet for Piano and Strings, E Minor (First time.)	Sinding

Good chamber music, adequately interpreted, suggests a well-painted miniature. The principal charm lies in the perfection of detail; in exquisite finish rather than in breadth or vigor. The playing of the Kneisel Quartet is eminently finished and refined, and from this point of view is wholly admirable. The acoustic properties of Sherry Hall are not remarkable, and a certain lack of sonority in the body of tone of the quartet must be attributed to this. The Haydn quartet, with its dainty if somewhat old-fashioned elegance, was charmingly played. The more elaborate and beautiful Schumann quartet also received a most artistic interpretation. The name of Sinding is an unfamiliar one to concert-goers.

The composer of the pianoforte quintet which closed the programme, is a young Norwegian composer, now resident in Leipsic, where the work was first performed by the Brodsky Quartet. He is also the author of a number of songs, a violin concerto and some additional chamber music.

The pianoforte quintet, heard for the first time last evening, is a bold, forcible, somewhat stormily bizarre and disjointed work, strongly impregnated with what we have come to call "Northern" tone color, both in melodic and harmonic structure. Of its four movements, the opening allegro and the finale are the most original, and the scherzo the most pleasing.

The andante is dull. The composer has evidently drawn considerably on Norse "Volks" music for his material, which he distorts at times somewhat unnecessarily. The piano part was played by Mr. Busoni with both sympathy and intelligence. He has a clear-cut, facile technique, and is, moreover, not lacking in power and imagination. He made a distinct impression as an artist of capability. The next concert will be in January.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Brooklyn series, held yesterday afternoon, not only showed forth the band itself in its most splendid perfection of form, but was also rendered notable by the appearance of Mr. Paderewski as soloist. The entire programme was made up of works of the most modern spirit. It included Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the Waldweben episode from "Siegfried," and Brahms's tender and elegiac second symphony. In his treatment of such music as this Mr. Nikisch is peculiarly sympathetic. The masculine ardor and tenderness of his readings, the exquisite adjustment of phrase and gradation of dynamic effect that he wins from his men, the breadth and dramatic instinct that dominate his conceptions throughout, were never more convincingly shown forth nor more unhesitatingly accepted by his hearers than at this performance.

Mr. Paderewski's desire to play his own concerto with the Boston orchestra, which led to the change of programme from the concerto of Saint-Saens originally announced, received its full justification from the audience when they had heard the beautifully luminous, discreet and glowing interpretation—for such it was—given to the orcestral part by Mr. Nikisch. The composer has divided the musical setting of his ideas so generously with the orchestra that only such loving treatment as Mr. Nikisch gave it could truly show forth the purport and beauty of the concerto. Mr. Paderewski played as if inspired by this fervid and devoted co-operation with matchless fire and passion. If any who heard him had heard his previous interpretation of the same beautiful work, it was almost as if it had rightly been made known for the first time. Mr. Paderewski played also an impromptu of Chopin, and a rhapsodie of Liszt's, to which he was finally persuaded to add Liszt's "Campanella."

The same programme [illegible] this evening.

EVENING Wisconsin, Milwaukee. Wis

ate 12-8

MME. NORDICA WILL SING.

Arion Club's Second Concert—Proceeds of "Naiad Queen" Performances.

43

A change in the Arion Musical Club's programme, with respect to the second concert of this season's series, may be made. The intention has been to make it a part song concert, introducing compositions that indicate how different composers of different periods have treated the same theme. It was thought that such a concert would be both interesting and instructive, but in some quarters there is a demand for a different class of music, and instead of part songs the club may decide to give an oratorio, which is the form of composition that seems to be most liked in Milwaukee. However, it has not been definitely decided to make the change, and the date of the concert has not been fixed. Mme. Nordica will probably be one of the soloists, whatever the decision may be regarding the programme.

The net proceeds of the recent performances of the "The Naid Queen" were not nearly sufficient to wipe out the indebtedness of the club. The Arions received only one-half of the profits, which aggregated about $1,000. A debt of about $2,000 was carried over from last year.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

BOSTON'S STRING QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its second concert this season at Sherry's Hall last night before a large and well pleased audience. A Haydn quartet, Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, and a new quintet for strings and piano by Sinding, a composer new to our concert rooms, made up the programme.

43

The Kneisel Quartet does very nice work, refined and in good taste. If it lacked in anything the Schumann quartet needed a trifle more strength.

The Sinding quintet, in which Mr. F. B. Busoni played the piano part with an abundance of vigor, is a rather effective composition, which suffers by over elaboration. Its good ideas are spun out to tedious lengths, notwithstanding which it was well worth playing, and a taking scherzo was much applauded.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1891.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert on Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall. It was attended by an audience that filled all seating and standing room, as is usually the case at these concerts. Some of the malcontents are beginning to grumble at this series and are heard to suggest that with her almost embarassmente de riches in the orchestra line it is quite unnecssary to bring outside talent into New York at the present day. We would respectfully suggest, in return, that their view is a narrow and one-sided one. The Boston orchestra is, in the first place, a most excellent one, trained to a point of perfection that is almost unique. It is the pedantic spirit that animates our modern Athens, that engenders and inspires this peculiar sort of training. New York is more cosmopolitan, and, therefore, broader and more liberal in her views and public spirit, and our orchestral organizations play accordingly. The liberalizing effect that arises from mutual intercourse is always beneficial. We have noticed a marked improvement in many ways in our local orchestras since the Boston Symphony Society gave their first concert here. Mr. Damrosch is taking a step in the right direction, in giving a series of Boston concerts, and we trust and hope that Boston will profit by and enjoy the New York orchestra, as much as we have done their favorites.

The programme was less conservative than usual, the four composers represented being Schubert, Wagner, Volkmann and Richard Strauss, the latter a young man of exceptionally brilliant promise and talent. The symphonic poem, "Don Juan," which was performed upon this occasion, made a favorable impression, due in part to the splendid interpretation of the band under Mr. Nikisch. Richard Strauss is a protege of Von Bülow, who has fostered his genius most carefully. He was concert master of the Meiningen orchestra under Bülow and succeeded that eccentric leader upon his resignation. Strauss is now court conductor at Weimar. The "Don Juan" is based upon Nicholaus Lenau's poem, which has been excellently translated by John P. Jackson, and we quote from the house programme the following verse:

O magic realm, illimited, eternal,
Of gloried woman,—loveliness supernal!
  Fain would I, in the storm of stressful bliss,
  Expire upon the last one's lingering kiss!
Through every realm, O friend, would wing my flight,
  Wherever Beauty blooms, kneel down to each,
And—if for one brief moment, win delight!

The ecstatic plane upon which the poem is based is well expounded in the musical setting, which is as tense and high flown a composition as could be desired. The rhapsodic style is well maintained and there is plenty of melodic beauty. The instrumental effects are at times thrilling in their intensity, and Strauss shows himself to be a master of the resources of the orchestra. The reading of the work by Mr. Nikisch was impassioned in the extreme, and presented the young composer in the best possible light. The work will hardly become popular, however, on account of the continuous strain of effects that only a very skillful leader will keep from overstraining the bounds. Mr. Nikisch received hearty and well deserved applause at its close. It hardly left the tone of the audience in a state to receive the Volkmann concerto for violoncello that followed, in as favorable a mood as one would have desired. After working the sensibilities up to a state of extreme intensity there must come a reaction, and it was in the midst of this reaction that Mr. Alwin Schroeder commenced the Volkmann composition, a work also in the modern style, but so much less inspired, less dramatic, that had it not been for the superb playing of Mr. Schroeder there would have been a serious anticlimax. The work is not devoid of merit; indeed, in the paucity of a suitable répertoire for the 'cello it can be accepted, if not with enthusiasm, at least with gratitude for something to vary the monotony with. It has pleasing themes and melodies, and is most skillfully put together, while the technique of the player is not taxed to the detriment of the composition. Mr. Schroeder's playing was overflowing with inspiration and exquisite sensibility. His tone upon the instrument is not so large, but it is refined and musical, and charms one with its sweetness and deliciously liquid purity. He played with an abandon and passion that was brilliantly effective and he won several most enthusiastic recalls. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," most delightfully performed by the orchestra, and the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" completed the programme.

BALTIMORE
AMERICAN—FRIDAY
DECEMBER 11, 1891.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony's Concert—A Splendid Program.

For the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy Concert Hall last evening, Mr. Nikisch presented one of the strongest programs ever given in this city. There were four composers, Schumann, Rubinstein, Bach and Weber, each with an important, and, at the same time, characteristic work. The "Rhenish Symphony" is undoubtedly Schumann's best. It comes as near the classic form as Schumann could get without cramping himself, and yet it cannot be said to be in any form but Schumann's own; or, in other words, the classic form is altered and amended by Schumann. To Schumann, form was as a home, that he sought only when it rained outside. He regarded it as a result or effect, rather than as a cause or fixed mould, and hence did not consider himself bound to be limited by it. In music, as in everything else, when a form becomes incapable of change, it is dead. Schumann's forms are irregular, but full of life, and the "Rhenish Symphony" is one of his best examples.

As a Schumann conductor, Nikisch is unsurpassed. He is not a believer in set symmetry, and does not like to submit to its slavish tyranny; so he welcomes Schumann, giving him life and liberty. As a consequence, the rendition of the "Rhenish Symphony" was in the vein of the Boston Orchestra's very best work.

After the symphony came the Rubinstein D minor concerto. This requires a fine orchestra, a superb piano, a grand player, and a careful, conscientious and sympathetic leader, and all the conditions were fully met. The concerto is in as classic form as a Russian could be expected to employ. It does not even call for all the modern orchestra; but Rubinstein's will-power is shown all the same. Gruenfeld's rendition of the work is almost beyond praise. He brings to its interpretation the broad discernment and power of an experienced artist having well-balanced intellect, and plays without any trifling with mere virtuoso trickery. After years of playing of every kind of composition written for the piano, he has acquired the wisdom of presenting each composer in his own individual way; and Rubinstein himself could not present his work more loyally than it is given by Gruenfeld. His reception was enthusiastic. After hearing his marvelous performance, one ceases to wonder at his court positions or his universal popularity in the old world. In art, mind and manners he is beyond criticism.

The Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte, for strings, set between the Rubinstein concerto and the Von Weber overture, was like a deep and beautiful vista of the musical past, in which the purely modern dramatic element of music is conspicuously absent. The old style has a charm of its own, which is still further heightened by judicious contrast with the modern. Weber's overture to his opera "Euryanthe" ended the choice program of one of the finest concerts ever heard in this city. Gruenfeld has now been introduced to the Baltimore public in connection with the fine Boston Orchestra, and the lovers of music will be interested to hear his solo and concerted numbers in connection with his brother, the celebrated violoncellist, next Friday evening.

N. Y.

te 12/12

THE KUEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Their Second Performance at Sherry's a Great Success.

The Kneisel Quartet, with the assistance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, piano, gave their second quartet concert at Sherry's New Hall yesterday evening. The following programme was rendered:

Quartet in D	Haydn
Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3	Schumann
Quintet for Piano and Strings, E Minor (First time.)	Sinding

Good chamber music, adequately interpreted, suggests a well-painted miniature. The principal charm lies in the perfection of detail; in exquisite finish rather than in breadth or vigor. The playing of the Kneisel Quartet is eminently finished and refined, and from this point of view is wholly admirable. The acoustic properties of Sherry Hall are not remarkable, and a certain lack of sonority in the body of tone of the quartet must be attributed to this. The Haydn quartet, with its dainty if somewhat old-fashioned elegance, was charmingly played. The more elaborate and beautiful Schumann quartet also received a most artistic interpretation. The name of Sinding is an unfamiliar one to concert-goers.

The composer of the pianoforte quintet which closed the programme, is a young Norwegian composer, now resident in Leipsic, where the work was first performed by the Brodsky Quartet. He is also the author of a number of songs, a violin concerto and some additional chamber music.

The pianoforte quintet, heard for the first time last evening, is a bold, forcible, somewhat stormily bizarre and disjointed work, strongly impregnated with what we have come to call "Northern" tone color, both in melodic and harmonic structure. Of its four movements, the opening allegro and the finale are the most original, and the scherzo the most pleasing.

The andante is dull. The composer has evidently drawn considerably on Norse "Volks" music for his material, which he distorts at times somewhat unnecessarily. The piano part was played by Mr. Busoni with both sympathy and intelligence. He has a clear-cut, facile technique, and is, moreover, not lacking in power and imagination. He made a distinct impression as an artist of capability. The next concert will be in January.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Brooklyn series, held yesterday afternoon, not only showed forth the band itself in its most splendid perfection of form, but was also rendered notable by the appearance of Mr. Paderewski as soloist. The entire programme was made up of works of the most modern spirit. It included Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the Waldweben episode from "Siegfried," and Brahms's tender and elegiac second symphony. In his treatment of such music as this Mr. Nikisch is peculiarly sympathetic. The masculine ardor and tenderness of his readings, the exquisite adjustment of phrase and gradation of dynamic effect that he wins from his men, the breadth and dramatic instinct that dominate his conceptions throughout, were never more convincingly shown forth nor more unhesitatingly accepted by his hearers than at this performance.

Mr. Paderewski's desire to play his own concerto with the Boston orchestra, which led to the change of programme from the concerto of Saint-Saens originally announced, received its full justification from the audience when they had heard the beautifully luminous, discreet and glowing interpretation—for such it was—given to the orcestral part by Mr. Nikisch. The composer has divided the musical setting of his ideas so generously with the orchestra that only such loving treatment as Mr. Nikisch gave it could truly show forth the purport and beauty of the concerto. Mr. Paderewski played as if inspired by this fervid and devoted co-operation with matchless fire and passion. If any who heard him had heard his previous interpretation of the same beautiful work, it was almost as if it had rightly been made known for the first time. Mr. Paderewski played also an impromptu of Chopin, and a rhapsodie of Liszt's, to which he was finally persuaded to add Liszt's "Campanella."

~~The same programme will be repeated at the concert~~ this evening.

EVENING Wisconsin, Milwaukee.

ate 12-8

MME. NORDICA WILL SING.

Arion Club's Second Concert—Proceeds of "Naiad Queen" Performances.

A change in the Arion Musical Club's programme, with respect to the second concert of this season's series, may be made. The intention has been to make it a part song concert, introducing compositions that indicate how different composers of different periods have treated the same theme. It was thought that such a concert would be both interesting and instructive, but in some quarters there is a demand for a different class of music, and instead of part songs the club may decide to give an oratorio, which is the form of composition that seems to be most liked in Milwaukee. However, it has not been definitely decided to make the change, and the date of the concert has not been fixed. Mme. Nordica will probably be one of the soloists, whatever the decision may be regarding the programme.

The net proceeds of the recent performances of the "The Naid Queen" were not nearly sufficient to wipe out the indebtedness of the club. The Arions received only one-half of the profits, which aggregated about $1,000. A debt of about $2,000 was carried over from last year.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

BOSTON'S STRING QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its second concert this season at Sherry's Hall last night before a large and well pleased audience. A Haydn quartet, Schumann's quartet in A, op. 41, and a new quintet for strings and piano by Sinding, a composer new to our concert rooms, made up the programme.

The Kneisel Quartet does very nice work, refined and in good taste. If it lacked in anything the Schumann quartet needed a trifle more strength.

The Sinding quintet, in which Mr. F. B. Busoni played the piano part with an abundance of vigor, is a rather effective composition, which suffers by over elaboration. Its good ideas are spun out to tedious lengths, notwithstanding which it was well worth playing, and a taking scherzo was much applauded.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The sensation of the eighth Symphony concert was the début of Paderewski. The hall was packed and the sale of admission tickets had been stopped some days before the concert. The young Polish composer and artist was received with warmth and recalled after his performance with an intense and sustained enthusiasm such as Boston rarely manifests, and was now nobly won by him in his double capacity. His own concerto in A-minor, which he had chosen for his entrée, is replete with beauty, proportionate in its elements, poetic and logical. It was not unknown to all the audience, because Mme. Rivé-King had played it on a Philharmonic evening in March last. The fact is interesting that Paderewski proposed to devote himself to composition long before he discovered such an eminent ability and love for the piano, and his concerto has therefore the characteristics of a general writer rather than those of a specialist. True it is that the solo part is so treated that any but a pianist of the first rank must come quickly to confusion in it; but the orchestra is no less strongly, brilliantly and feelingly displayed, and there are many bits of obbligato which must gratify by their grace, their vivacity, or their pointedness the bandsmen to whom they fall as the work proceeds. The piano part, as delivered by its author, was resplendent with all the resources of display in figure or in force; its audacious octaves, its scintillating double trills, its flying scales, its sweeping arpeggios, its thunderous chords and its wild leaps from peak to peak of phrase were magnificent exhibitions of the most sure and lucent technique of the time, while its cantabili, the subdued gracefulness of its lighter adornment and the perfect consideration of its passages of accompaniment, demonstrated that the player was not merely a virtuoso of unfaltering fingers, nerves of elastic steel and fatigueless wrists, but an artist with poetic fancies and pulsating sympathies. For this stupendous technique seemed to come without thought and without exertion, and to be the most natural and unaffected means to the end of making the music most true and telling. The orchestra seconded Paderewski admirably. Later in the evening he gave three solo numbers—two from Chopin, and one, a Hungarian rhapsody, from Liszt, and evoked no less ardent delight than before, being by turns captivating and dominant. The new number of the programme was Svendsen's gay, hurly-burly-ish "Paris Carnival," a clever picture of the eager, hurrying, mercurial moods which sway the most volatile of cities in the hour of its greatest freedom and abandon. Beethoven's fourth symphony, in an unexceptionable rendering, begun the evening, and a good reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture ended a programme which was a half-hour too long. Tonight the orchestra will be away, but on next Saturday evening the centenary of Mozart's death—December 5, 1791—will be honored by a programme drawn wholly from his writing. The band will play the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel will play the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola, and Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing two large airs.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 12/11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gruenfeld the Pianist's Appearance—Another Nikisch Success.

It is an encouraging sign when one finds an audience like that which attended the concert given last night by Mr. Nikisch's superb company of musicians—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Academy of Music Concert Hall was filled, and those who listened to the admirable programme presented showed by their discriminating applause that Baltimore is fast becoming an intelligent musical centre. And the fact must not be overlooked that much of the impetus in the direction of an advanced culture of this art is due to Mr. Nikisch's previous visits here.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld, count pianist to the Emperors of Germany and Austria, who has lately arrived in this country. Mr. Gruenfeld played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4, Opus 70—a work full of force. It gave the performer ample opportunity to display his brilliant technique, as it taxed his digital ability to no small degree. He played with much power and showed what a tremendous volume of tone may be evoked from the piano. He was so enthusiastically applauded that he was forced to respond, playing a morceau without orchestral accompaniment, showing that while his fortissimo is intense his pianissimo is both distinct and delicate. He will be heard again next week in concert with his brother, a noted violoncellist.

The orchestral numbers were all that could have been desired. The first was Schumann's magnificent Rhenish Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, Opus 97. It was played divinely. The next was a selection from Bach, for strings only, embracing a prelude, an adagio and a gavotte. The Bach music was in delightful contrast with Schumann and Rubinstein in its classic freshness and simplicity. The gavotte so charmed the audience that in spite of his reluctance Mr. Nikisch was compelled to repeat it. The overture to Weber's romantic opera "Euryanthe" closed the programme. The evening was a most enjoyable one, and the audience dispersed in a thoroughly satisfied frame of mind. The next concert will be given on Thursday, January 14.

S, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

Taken altogether, yesterday was one of the brightest days for music that have been seen in this neighborhood of late. Leaving for to-morrow's consideration the Mozart memorial concert of the Philharmonic Society, which will be repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House to-night, the afternoon was signalized by the second public rehearsal in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, an entertainment whose memory will linger long in the mind of every true music lover like some sweet dream of Spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, and Paderewski—there is a combination on which all the muses might smile. Let us say at once that Paderewski, despite the fact that he was suffering from a badly-bruised thumb, was heard at his best yesterday afternoon; and better than his best no living pianist can give. Together with the gentlemen of Boston, he gave an ideal performance of his own lovely concerto, a work which grows upon the hearer with every repetition. It is lovely in its themes, lovely in its exquisite division of ideas between orchestra and solo instrument, lovely in its perfect adaptation to all the beauties of contemporaneous piano technique, lovely in the unfailing poetry of its musical treatment.

The orchestra gave the solo player absolutely perfect support. Mr. Nikisch, without once obtruding his own intensely magnetic personality, was in full command of his forces and in complete sympathy with the pianist. Paderewski had no need to think about his accompaniment; his mind was concentrated on his work. Therefore, all his wonderful powers were revealed, and the result was an indescribably beautiful performance. The name of Rubinstein is one to conjure with; but it is safe to say that never did Rubinstein show to an American audience such perfection of technique, such moving tenderness of touch, such deep and subtle poetry. There are left to the critic, after yesterday's performance, no words but those of Schumann on Chopin: "Hats off, gentlemen; a genius!"

The orchestra played Goldmark's fine "Prometheus" overture, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and Brahms's second symphony. Paderewski played as solo numbers a Chopin impromptu and Liszt's sixth Hungarian rhapsody, supplementing the latter on recall with the same composer's "Campanella." The concert as a whole was thoroughly enjoyable. It will be repeated to-night.

At Sherry's, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-seventh Street, last evening, the Kneisel String Quartet, composed of four members of the Boston orchestra, gave its second chamber music recital, having the assistance of Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist. The numbers performed were a Haydn quartet in D, Schumann's quartet in A, Opus 41, No. 3, and Sinding's quintet in E minor, for piano and strings, the last being heard for the first time here.

To speak of the playing of the Kneisel Quartet in such words of praise as it thoroughly deserves is to use language that has the appearance of extravagance. But it is, happily, not the whole duty of criticism to discover flaws. It is the dearest, as it is, unfortunately, the rarest, privilege of the commentator on musical doings to utter words of unqualified praise. After such performances as those of the clear and fluent Haydn quartet, given with a matchless finish of ensemble, and of the Schumann composition, played with a most admirable earnestness and a just appreciation of its emotional content, there is room only for enthusiastic and satisfied approval.

The Sinding quintet is an interesting work, full of Scandinavian color, even to the free use of forbidden fifths. The first movement and the last, however, are not equal to the second and third in fecundity of idea or felicity of treatment. These two movements are very musical in thought and are effectively constructed. The concluding measures of the andante, written for muted strings without the piano, are particularly taking. In the scherzo the piano part is especially well made, and the movement as a whole is brilliant and forceful. The work in its entirety is somewhat deficient in balance, owing to the extreme richness of the piano part.

Mr. Busoni is a gifted young Italian who a little over a year ago was awarded the Rubinstein prize for the performance of an original work at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He was at once secured by the New-England Conservatory, where he is now an instructor. Mr. Busoni is a genuine artist. His technical ability as shown last evening is large: his playing is characterized by crystalline clearness and by a fine vigor. His tone seemed to be somewhat hard last evening, but we are inclined to think that was due quite as much to the wretched acoustics of the room as to the apparent lack of flexibility in his wrists. He certainly possesses a musical temperament, and would probably be heard to better advantage in a larger hall with orchestra.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

PADEREWSKI DELIGHTS BROOKLYN.

Herr Paderewski played at the Philharmonic rehearsal in the Brooklyn Academy yesterday afternoon, and of course the building was thronged. He chose his own concerto, No. 1, and with the skilful assistance of Herr Nikisch and the Boston Orchestra the result was delightful. In the Chopin Impromptu in F sharp and in Liszt's Sixth Rhapsody Herr Paderewski was even more successful in winning applause than with the concerto. He played the Impromptu with exquisite taste, ending it with soft chords instead of with the loud crash indicated in all editions. The whole character of the Impromptu forbids a burst of sound at its close, and although Von Bülow, if I remember rightly, follows the printed directions, it is a custom much honored in the breach.

After the Liszt Rhapsody Herr Paderewski was recalled many times and at last sat down again and gave a beautifully finished performance of the Liszt "Campanella."

Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the "Siegfried," "Waldweben" and Brahms' Second Symphony made up the orchestral programme. The symphony, one of the best of modern days, was especially well played, and its performance ought to have had ten times the applause it received.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12-13

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra played to an immense audience at the Academy of Music last night, and Paderewski, the soloist, was lionized to the top of his bent, the listeners almost shaking the building with the force of their plaudits. The orchestra gave Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the Waldweben from "Siegfried" and Brahms' symphony with its wonted power, finish and expression, and Paderewski beside his own concerto, in which he was beholden to Mr. Nikisch for the artistic accompaniment, played a Chopin impromptu with extreme sweetness and a Liszt rhapsody with wonderful fire. The tumultuous applause wrung a recall piece from him. He was in the best of form and never showed to better advantage the beauty of his tone or the marvel of his technique.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

CONCERT OF THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet's second concert of the season, which was given last night in Sherry's new concert hall, brought forward a pianist new to New-York, Ferruccio B. Busoni, in a new quintet for piano and strings, by Christian Sinding. The latter is a young Swede at present resident in Leipzig, whose work has come to public notice only within the last year or two, but in a way to mark him as a man of promise. The quintette gave much pleasure to the numerous audience. It is a strong work in many respects, and bears in some of its parts obvious traces of a Scandinavian national feeling. The programme included beside this novelty, Haydn's quartet in D, and Schumann's in A, in which the work of the accomplished concert master and his associates was dominated by the same lovely, artistic feeling and sincerity that have become known to admirers of the best in quartet playing.

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

SECOND KNEISEL CONCERT.

Applause Follows the Excellent Work of the Quartet.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last night at Sherry's new concert hall, Fifth avenue and Thirty-seventh street, before an exceedingly appreciative audience, who made the pretty little hall ring with their encouraging applause.

The most interesting number was the Schuman quartet in a. The change from the andante expressivo to the allegro molto moderato was most skillfully managed, and was an excellent test of technique. In the second movement the tempo risoluto gave occasion for some very broad, firm bowing, and led admirably up to the dainty, graceful work in the allegro vivace which concluded the number.

In the quintet of Sinding Mr. Ferruccio Busoni at the piano did some brilliant work. His touch is clear and good, his phrasing excellent, while his shading is most artistic. Alwin Schroeder came nearer doing himself justice than he has so far this winter. A programme of even greater interest has been arranged for the third concert, which will be held January 15, 1892.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/13

The Kneisel Quartet.

A so-called "chamber concert" is a sort of musical Mecca toward which pious pilgrims and worshippers of art love to turn their steps. A sort of religious atmosphere pervades the audiences at such entertainments, where the serious and thoughtful mien of each individual is deeply impressive of the intensely interested, discriminating, and even reverential attitude of his mind. So seemed, at least, the audience assembled on Friday evening in Sherry's concert hall to listen to the second Kneisel Quartet concert. The club played, with that exquisite precision and smoothness for which they are now so favorably known, Haydn's quartet in D and Schumann's quartet in A, finishing the programme with a new and attractive quintet for piano and strings by Sinding, a Norwegian composer of talent. The quintet, while it is most interesting to the listener, is one of those creations that are probably of still deeper and more important meaning to the performers of it. The second movement, "Andante," was written from first to last in the spirit and mood of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," but, in spite of its enforced reminiscences and consequent lack of true originality, it was lovely, and called forth sincere admiration. So also did the Finale. The piano part is exceedingly brilliant, and was played with excellent though somewhat stiff and pedantic technique by Mr. Ferrucio Busoni, a young Italian teacher at the New England Conservatory in Boston.

The third concert takes place on the evening of Jan. 15.

Providence Journal 12/13

THE particular thing of most interest and event of most importance this week, will be the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening.

A delightfully attractive feature of this concert will be the appearance of the favorite soprano, Mlle. Clementine De Vere, who will sing with orchestra the mad scene from "Hamlet," Thomas; and aria "Ludurilla," Dvorak. The opening number of the programme will be the great Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in the interpretation of which Mr. Nikisch is especially happy. Other orchestral numbers are the Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for string orchestra by Bach, and a novelty by Svendsen entitled "Carnival in Paris." The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning at 93 Westminster street.

A week from Tuesday evening, Pader-

to his own idea. Mr. Nickisch, on the contrary, indicates his conception of the composition to be performed, and, while exacting as to essentials, gives some latitude to the artistic sense of the players under his direction.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12/12

PADEREWSKI

Charmed the Orchestra as Well the Audience.

His Delightful Playing at the Philharmonic Rehearsal—A Programm of Exceptional Artistic Beauty Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Philharmonic rehearsal yesterday afternoon presented a programme of unusual beauty calculated to attract a much larger audience than that present. It was only a fair house but fortunately somewhat discriminating and enthusiastic. It is curious that in Brooklyn an audience of 5,000 will gather to hear a meritorious and interesting, but by no means highly finished, performance of the "Messiah," while a concert of such artistic excellence as that offered yesterday by Conductor Nikisch should go begging for listeners. Even so great an attraction as the Polish pianist Paderewski failed to fill the Academy. Obviously something is at fault here. Do Brooklyn people not know a good thing? Or is the trouble with the management?

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture was marked by his usual careful attention to details. These were in no way allowed, however, to belittle his general conception of it, which is broad and rich. Goldmark as a composer is a modern of moderns. Always melodious, he overwhelms us in the "Prometheus" with his prodigality in this respect. Melodies, picturesque and suggestive, crowd upon us, developed by a man skilled in orchestration, and keenly alive to the resources of the modern orchestra. Regarded from a popular point of view, Goldmark is more of a Frenchman than a German. His work suggests Saint-Saens and Berlioz.

Those who happened to have carried with them yesterday the programmes issued a week ago, must have been confused by the substitution of a concerto by Paderewski, for the one by Saint-Saens. The latter is ably described in the programme at some length by G. H. Wilson, but the description by no means fits the Paderewski concerto, and an attempt at reconciling the two produces discomfort. The Paderewski concerto demonstrates what we have already been told, that the composer is a musician as well as a pianist. The first movement, an allegro, is bright and spirited; it holds the interest perfectly, and is nowhere so elaborate as to be incomprehensible at a first hearing. The tempo is delightful—suave and flowing. The orchestration is rich and full, but never overpowering. The second movement, a "Romanza," is delicately sentimental; the last movement is a brilliant "allegro molto vivace."

About Paderewski himself, what can be said? His arrival in this country was preceded by announcements and quotations from English papers so superlative in character that they failed to carry weight with them. The result was to put the critics on their guard. This, as it turned out, was fortunate, and led to a most agreeable surprise. Doubtless a great artist like Paderewski often feels that he has failed to reach his ideal. But ordinary mortals should be glad that their perceptions are less keen, and that once in a great while they may for a few minutes enjoy something like a realization of human longings after perfection. Paderewski appeals to the populace with his wonderful technique, and his emotional genius. But he adds to these the balancing power of intellect. From the first, it was evident yesterday that a cordial understanding existed between Mr. Nikisch, the orchestra, and Paderewski. The pianist watched the leader closely, and solo and orchestra parts came together with spirited precision. The two men, both so youthful in appearance, so mature and vigorous in their attainments, formed a most interesting little group, worthy of the brush of an able painter. Mr. Nikisch has a characteristic way of standing with his left thumb in his trousers pocket, a pose he rarely varies except to turn a leaf. Both men are very free from affectations. At the close of the concerto, Mr. Nikisch warmly shook Paderewski's hand, and the orchestra joined in the enthusiastic applause. This sympathy between soloist and orchestra, was again apparent when Paderewski played his other selectons, the Chopin impromptu, in "D" sharp minor, opus 36, and the Liszt "Rhapsodie Hongroise." It seemed as though the musicians themselves furnished an audience of the most inspiring kind. They paid close attention, and those in the rear ranks stood up to watch the player as he gave the wonderful crescendo at the end of the rhapsody. If Paderewski had come to this country for spiritual encouragement only, it would not have been necessary yesterday to have an audience at all. The orchestra sufficed.

Paderewsk's playing has been called, perhaps justly, exaggerated. Certainly his rendering of the Liszt rhapsody was exaggerated in the extreme; but Liszt himself is often exaggerated, and nowhere more so than in the Hungarian rhapsodies. Judging by his performance of the impromptu, Paderewski, as a player of Chopin, is beyond criticism.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the Siegfried music contained no novelties, but it was finished. The Brahms symphony in D is more tuneful and less elaborate than some of the others. At the best, however, it is a work only to be thoroughly appreciated after frequent hearings. The most attractive movement is the third, a delightful "allegretto grazioso (quasi andantino.)"

The whole symphony was given in a broad spirit, and will doubtless make a deeper impression on the audience at the concert to-night.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The sensation of the eighth Symphony concert was the début of Paderewski. The hall was packed and the sale of admission tickets had been stopped some days before the concert. The young Polish composer and artist was received with warmth and recalled after his performance with an intense and sustained enthusiasm such as Boston rarely manifests, and was now nobly won by him in his double capacity. His own concerto in A-minor, which he had chosen for his entrée, is replete with beauty, proportionate in its elements, poetic and logical. It was not unknown to all the audience, because Mme. Rivé-King had played it on a Philharmonic evening in March last. The fact is interesting that Paderewski proposed to devote himself to composition long before he discovered such an eminent ability and love for the piano, and his concerto has therefore the characteristics of a general writer rather than those of a specialist. True it is that the solo part is so treated that any but a pianist of the first rank must come quickly to confusion in it; but the orchestra is no less strongly, brilliantly and feelingly displayed, and there are many bits of obbligato which must gratify by their grace, their vivacity, or their pointedness the bandsmen to whom they fall as the work proceeds. The piano part, as delivered by its author, was resplendent with all the resources of display in figure or in force; its audacious octaves, its scintillating double trills, its flying scales, its sweeping arpeggios, its thunderous chords and its wild leaps from peak to peak of phrase were magnificent exhibitions of the most sure and lucent technique of the time, while its cantabili, the subdued gracefulness of its lighter adornment and the perfect consideration of its passages of accompaniment, demonstrated that the player was not merely a virtuoso of unfaltering fingers, nerves of elastic steel and fatigueless wrists, but an artist with poetic fancies and pulsating sympathies. For this stupendous technique seemed to come without thought and without exertion, and to be the most natural and unaffected means to the end of making the music most true and telling. The orchestra seconded Paderewski admirably. Later in the evening he gave three solo numbers—two from Chopin, and one, a Hungarian rhapsody, from Liszt, and evoked no less ardent delight than before, being by turns captivating and dominant. The new number of the programme was Svendsen's gay, hurly-burly-ish "Paris Carnival," a clever picture of the eager, hurrying, mercurial moods which sway the most volatile of cities in the hour of its greatest freedom and abandon. Beethoven's fourth symphony, in an unexceptionable rendering, begun the evening, and a good reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture ended a programme which was a half-hour too long. Tonight the orchestra will be away, but on next Saturday evening the centenary of Mozart's death—December 5, 1791—will be honored by a programme drawn wholly from his writing. The band will play the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel will play the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola, and Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing two large airs.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 12/11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gruenfeld the Pianist's Appearance—Another Nikisch Success.

It is an encouraging sign when one finds an audience like that which attended the concert given last night by Mr. Nikisch's superb company of musicians—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Academy of Music Concert Hall was filled, and those who listened to the admirable programme presented showed by their discriminating applause that Baltimore is fast becoming an intelligent musical centre. And the fact must not be overlooked that much of the impetus in the direction of an advanced culture of this art is due to Mr. Nikisch's previous visits here.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld, count pianist to the Emperors of Germany and Austria, who has lately arrived in this country. Mr. Gruenfeld played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4. Opus 70—a work full of force. It gave the performer ample opportunity to display his brilliant technique, as it taxed his digital ability to no small degree. He played with much power and showed what a tremendous volume of tone may be evoked from the piano. He was so enthusiastically applauded that he was forced to respond, playing a morceau without orchestral accompanyment, showing that while his fortissimo is intense his pianissimo is both distinct and delicate. He will be heard again next week in concert with his brother, a noted violoncellist.

The orchestral numbers were all that could have been desired. The first was Schumann's magnificent Rhenish Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, Opus 97. It was played divinely. The next was a selection from Bach, for strings only, embracing a prelude, an adagio and a gavotte. The Bach music was in delightful contrast with Schumann and Rubinstein in its classic freshness and simplicity. The gavotte so charmed the audience that in spite of his reluctance Mr. Nikisch was compelled to repeat it. The overture to Weber's romantic opera "Euryanthe" closed the programme. The evening was a most enjoyable one, and the audience dispersed in a thoroughly satisfied frame of mind. The next concert will be given on Thursday, January 14.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

Taken altogether, yesterday was one of the brightest days for music that have been seen in this neighborhood of late. Leaving for to-morrow's consideration the Mozart memorial concert of the Philharmonic Society, which will be repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House to-night, the afternoon was signalized by the second public rehearsal in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, an entertainment whose memory will linger long in the mind of every true music lover like some sweet dream of Spring.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, and Paderewski—there is a combination on which all the muses might smile. Let us say at once that Paderewski, despite the fact that he was suffering from a badly-bruised thumb, was heard at his best yesterday afternoon; and better than his best no living pianist can give. Together with the gentlemen of Boston, he gave an ideal performance of his own lovely concerto, a work which grows upon the hearer with every repetition. It is lovely in its themes, lovely in its exquisite division of ideas between orchestra and solo instrument, lovely in its perfect adaptation to all the beauties of contemporaneous piano technique, lovely in the unfailing poetry of its musical treatment.

The orchestra gave the solo player absolutely perfect support. Mr. Nikisch, without once obtruding his own intensely magnetic personality, was in full command of his forces and in complete sympathy with the pianist. Paderewski had no need to think about his accompaniment; his mind was concentrated on his work. Therefore, all his wonderful powers were revealed, and the result was an indescribably beautiful performance. The name of Rubinstein is one to conjure with; but it is safe to say that never did Rubinstein show to an American audience such perfection of technique, such moving tenderness of touch, such deep and subtle poetry. There are left to the critic, after yesterday's performance, no words but those of Schumann on Chopin: "Hats off, gentlemen; a genius!"

The orchestra played Goldmark's fine "Prometheus" overture, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and Brahms's second symphony. Paderewski played as solo numbers a Chopin impromptu and Liszt's sixth Hungarian rhapsody, supplementing the latter on recall with the same composer's "Campanella." The concert as a whole was thoroughly enjoyable. It will be repeated to-night.

At Sherry's, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-seventh Street, last evening, the Kneisel String Quartet, composed of four members of the Boston orchestra, gave its second chamber music recital, having the assistance of Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist. The numbers performed were a Haydn quartet in D, Schumann's quartet in A, Opus 41, No. 3, and Sinding's quintet in E minor, for piano and strings, the last being heard for the first time here.

To speak of the playing of the Kneisel Quartet in such words of praise as it thoroughly deserves is to use language that has the appearance of extravagance. But it is, happily, not the whole duty of criticism to discover flaws. It is the dearest, as it is, unfortunately, the rarest, privilege of the commentator on musical doings to utter words of unqualified praise. After such performances as those of the clear and fluent Haydn quartet, given with a matchless finish of ensemble, and of the Schumann composition, played with a most admirable earnestness and a just appreciation of its emotional content, there is room only for enthusiastic and satisfied approval.

The Sinding quintet is an interesting work, full of Scandinavian color, even to the free use of forbidden fifths. The first movement and the last, however, are not equal to the second and third in fecundity of idea or felicity of treatment. These two movements are very musical in thought and are effectively constructed. The concluding measures of the andante, written for muted strings without the piano, are particularly taking. In the scherzo the piano part is especially well made, and the movement as a whole is brilliant and forceful. The work in its entirety is somewhat deficient in balance, owing to the extreme richness of the piano part.

Mr. Busoni is a gifted young Italian who a little over a year ago was awarded the Rubinstein prize for the performance of an original work at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He was at once secured by the New-England Conservatory, where he is now an instructor. Mr. Busoni is a genuine artist. His technical ability as shown last evening is large: his playing is characterized by crystalline clearness and by a fine vigor. His tone seemed to be somewhat hard last evening, but we are inclined to think that was due quite as much to the wretched acoustics of the room as to the apparent lack of flexibility in his wrists. He certainly possesses a musical temperament, and would probably be heard to better advantage in a larger hall with orchestra.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

PADEREWSKI DELIGHTS BROOKLYN.

Herr Paderewski played at the Philharmonic rehearsal in the Brooklyn Academy yesterday afternoon, and of course the building was thronged. He chose his own concerto, No. 1, and with the skilful assistance of Herr Nikisch and the Boston Orchestra the result was delightful. In the Chopin Impromptu in F sharp and in Liszt's Sixth Rhapsody Herr Paderewski was even more successful in winning applause than with the concerto. He played the Impromptu with exquisite taste, ending it with soft chords instead of with the loud crash indicated in all editions. The whole character of the Impromptu forbids a burst of sound at its close, and although Von Bülow, if I remember rightly, follows the printed directions, it is a custom much honored in the breach.

After the Liszt Rhapsody Herr Paderewski was recalled many times and at last sat down again and gave a beautifully finished performance of the Liszt "Campanella."

Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the "Siegfried," "Waldweben" and Brahms' Second Symphony made up the orchestral programme. The symphony, one of the best of modern days, was especially well played, and its performance ought to have had ten times the applause it received.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12-13

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra played to an immense audience at the Academy of Music last night, and Paderewski, the soloist, was lionized to the top of his bent, the listeners almost shaking the building with the force of their plaudits. The orchestra gave Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, the Waldweben from "Siegfried" and Brahms' symphony with its wonted power, finish and expression, and Paderewski beside his own concerto, in which he was beholden to Mr. Nikisch for the artistic accompaniment, played a Chopin impromptu with extreme sweetness and a Liszt rhapsody with wonderful fire. The tumultuous applause wrung a recall piece from him. He was in the best of form and never showed to better advantage the beauty of his tone or the marvel of his technicque.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

CONCERT OF THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet's second concert of the season, which was given last night in Sherry's new concert hall, brought forward a pianist new to New-York, Ferruccio B. Busoni, in a new quintet for piano and strings, by Christian Sinding. The latter is a young Swede at present resident in Leipzig, whose work has come to public notice only within the last year or two, but in a way to mark him as a man of promise. The quintette gave much pleasure to the numerous audience. It is a strong work in many respects, and bears in some of its parts obvious traces of a Scandinavian national feeling. The programme included besides this novelty, Haydn's quartet in D, and Schumann's in A; in which the work of the accomplished concert master and his associates was dominated by the same lovely, artistic feeling and sincerity that have become known to admirers of the best in quartet playing.

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/12

SECOND KNEISEL CONCERT.

Applause Follows the Excellent Work of the Quartet.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last night at Sherry's new concert hall, Fifth avenue and Thirty-seventh street, before an exceedingly appreciative audience, who made the pretty little hall ring with their encouraging applause.

The most interesting number was the Schuman quartet in a. The change from the andante expressivo to the allegro molto moderato was most skillfully managed, and was an excellent test of technique. In the second movement the tempo risoluto gave occasion for some very broad, firm bowing, and led admirably up to the dainty, graceful work in the allegro vivace which concluded the number.

In the quintet of Sinding Mr. Ferruccio Busoni at the piano did some brilliant work. His touch is clear and good, his phrasing excellent, while his shading is most artistic. Alwin Schroeder came nearer doing himself justice than he has so far this winter. A programme of even greater interest has been arranged for the third concert, which will be held January 15, 1892.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 12/13

The Kneisel Quartet.

A so-called "chamber concert" is a sort of musical Mecca toward which pious pilgrims and worshippers of art love to turn their steps. A sort of religious atmosphere pervades the audiences at such entertainments, where the serious and thoughtful mien of each individual is deeply impressive of the intensely interested, discriminating, and even reverential attitude of his mind. So seemed, at least, the audience assembled on Friday evening in Sherry's concert hall to listen to the second Kneisel Quartet concert. The club played, with that exquisite precision and smoothness for which they are now so favorably known, Haydn's quartet in D and Schumann's quartet in A, finishing the programme with a new and attractive quintet for piano and strings by Sinding, a Norwegian composer of talent. The quintet, while it is most interesting to the listener, is one of those creations that are probably of still deeper and more important meaning to the performers of it. The second movement, "Andante," was written from first to last in the spirit and mood of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," but, in spite of its enforced reminiscences and consequent lack of true originality, it was lovely, and called forth sincere admiration. So also did the Finale. The piano part is exceedingly brilliant, and was played with excellent though somewhat stiff and pedantic technique by Mr. Ferrucio Busoni, a young Italian teacher at the New England Conservatory in Boston.

The third concert takes place on the evening of Jan. 15.

Providence Journal 12/13

THE particular thing of most interest and event of most importance this week, will be the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening.

A delightfully attractive feature of this concert will be the appearance of the favorite soprano, Mlle. Clementine De Vere, who will sing with orchestra the mad scene from "Hamlet," Thomas; and aria "Ludurilla," Dvorak. The opening number of the programme will be the great Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in the interpretation of which Mr. Nikisch is especially happy. Other orchestral numbers are the Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for string orchestra by Bach, and a novelty by Svendsen entitled "Carnival in Paris." The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning at 93 Westminster street.

A week from Tuesday evening, Pader-

to his own idea. Mr. Nickisch, on the contrary, indicates his conception of the composition to be performed, and, while exacting as to essentials, gives some latitude to the artistic sense of the players under his direction.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12/12

PADEREWSKI

Charmed the Orchestra as Well as the Audience.

His Delightful Playing at the Philharmonic Rehearsal—A Programme of Exceptional Artistic Beauty Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Philharmonic rehearsal yesterday afternoon presented a programme of unusual beauty, calculated to attract a much larger audience than that present. It was only a fair house, but fortunately somewhat discriminating and enthusiastic. It is curious that in Brooklyn an audience of 5,000 will gather to hear a meritorious and interesting, but by no means highly finished, performance of the "Messiah," while a concert of such artistic excellence as that offered yesterday by Conductor Nikisch should go begging for listeners. Even so great an attraction as the Polish pianist Paderewski failed to fill the Academy. Obviously something is at fault here. Do Brooklyn people not know a good thing? Or is the trouble with the management?

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture was marked by his usual careful attention to details. These were in no way allowed, however, to belittle his general conception of it, which is broad and rich. Goldmark as a composer is a modern of moderns. Always melodious, he overwhelms us in the "Prometheus" with his prodigality in this respect. Melodies, picturesque and suggestive, crowd upon us, developed by a man skilled in orchestration, and keenly alive to the resources of the modern orchestra. Regarded from a popular point of view, Goldmark is more of a Frenchman than a German. His work suggests Saint-Saens and Berlioz.

Those who happened to have carried with them yesterday the programmes issued a week ago, must have been confused by the substitution of a concerto by Paderewski, for the one by Saint-Saens. The latter is ably described in the programme at some length by G. H. Wilson, but the description by no means fits the Paderewski concerto, and an attempt at reconciling the two produces discomfort. The Paderewski concerto demonstrates what we have already been told, that the composer is a musician as well as a pianist. The first movement, an allegro, is bright and spirited; it holds the interest perfectly, and is nowhere so elaborate as to be incomprehensible at a first hearing. The tempo is delightful—suave and flowing. The orchestration is rich and full, but never overpowering. The second movement, a "Romanza," is delicately sentimental; the last movement is a brilliant "allegro molto vivace."

About Paderewski himself, what can be said? His arrival in this country was preceded by announcements and quotations from English papers so superlative in character that they failed to carry weight with them. The result was to put the critics on their guard. This, as it turned out, was fortunate, and led to a most agreeable surprise. Doubtless a great artist like Paderewski often feels that he has failed to reach his ideal. But ordinary mortals should be glad that their perceptions are less keen, and that once in a great while they may for a few minutes enjoy something like a realization of human longings after perfection. Paderewski appeals to the populace with his wonderful technique, and his emotional genius. But he adds to these the balancing power of intellect. From the first, it was evident yesterday that a cordial understanding existed between Mr. Nikisch, the orchestra, and Paderewski. The pianist watched the leader closely, and solo and orchestra came together with spirited precision. The two men, both so youthful in appearance, so mature and vigorous in their attainments, formed a most interesting little group, worthy of the brush of an able painter. Mr. Nikisch has a characteristic way of standing with his left thumb in his trousers pocket, a pose he rarely varies except to turn a leaf. Both men are very free from affectations. At the close of the concerto, Mr. Nikisch warmly shook Paderewski's hand, and the orchestra joined in the enthusiastic applause. This sympathy between soloist and orchestra, was again apparent when Paderewski played his other selections, the Chopin impromptu, in "D" sharp minor, opus 36, and the Liszt "Rhapsodie Hongroise." It seemed as though the musicians themselves furnished an audience of the most inspiring kind. They paid close attention, and those in the rear ranks stood up to watch the player as he gave the wonderful crescendo at the end of the rhapsody. If Paderewski had come to this country for spiritual encouragement only, it would not have been necessary yesterday to have an audience at all. The orchestra sufficed.

Paderewski's playing has been called, perhaps justly, exaggerated. Certainly his rendering of the Liszt rhapsody was exaggerated in the extreme; but Liszt himself is often exaggerated, and nowhere more so than in the Hungarian rhapsodies. Judging by his performance of the impromptu, Paderewski, as a player of Chopin, is beyond criticism.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the Siegfried music contained no novelties, but it was finished. The Brahms symphony in D is more tuneful and less elaborate than some of the others. As the best, however, it is a work only to be thoroughly appreciated after frequent hearings. The most attractive movement is the third, a delightful "allegretto grazioso (quasi andantino)."

The whole symphony was given in a broad spirit, and will doubtless make a deeper impression on the audience at the concert to-night.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12/9

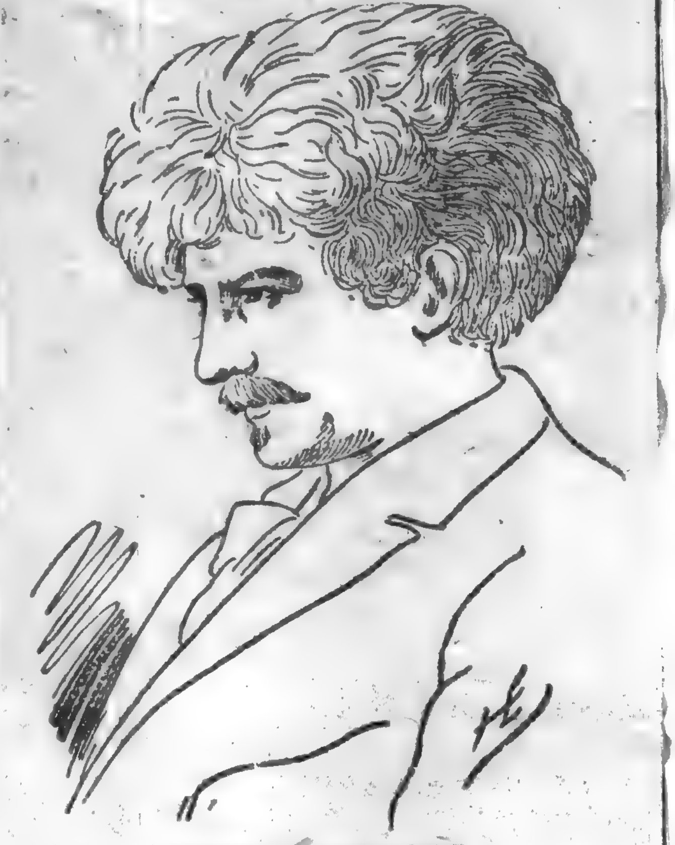
PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The second appearance of the Boston Symphony [illegible] series of concerts that [illegible] of the Brooklyn Philharmonic was made yesterday, and it recalled the palmy days of the old Philharmonic, both in the excellence of the music and the largeness and enthusiasm of the audience. It is apparent that Mr. Nikisch and his matchless band are appreciated at last, and it is to be hoped that from this time there will be no doubt as to the permanency of these concerts in Brooklyn. Perhaps a good many of the people went to hear Paderewski instead of the orchestra, and, if so, they heard a mighty good piano player, but the treatment of the orchestra showed that its work was enjoyed and appreciated, and it is sure to increase in popularity as the season progresses. Such string playing has never been heard before, and so perfect a drill has never been exceeded. The opening number was the "Prometheus Bound" overture of Goldmark, a strong and dramatic work, betraying something of Meyerbeer's quality of consciousness in invention, but having more of passion and fervor than is to be found in the "Huguenots." The gloom of the fire bearer's fate, the struggles against his punishment, the airy tripping of the waves, personified into the Oceanides, the bursts of wrath, can be read or fancied by those who are curious for meanings. In orchestration the overture is rich; in melody it is usually grateful and ingenious, though as forced as Meyerbeer or Berlioz once in a while, and if the author does not repeat one of his best themes in the "Sakuntala" overture in a song for the oboe he writes in something that is uncommonly like it. In this, as in the other numbers, the tonal beauty of the band was discovered —the fine, pure quality strings, the rich, strong brasses, the vocal and feeling wood wind; the deep, humming resonance of the basses in one passage being of noticeable beauty. By his presentation of the scene in "Siegfried" that is called the waldweben, albeit the waving of the tree tops is but an incident of it, Mr. Nikisch again proved that he could play Wagner's music, though he is attracted by the idyllic rather than the dramatic elements in the selection. Nothing can exceed the charm of this episode, that seems to send a fresher air and a ray of summer sunshine through the building whenever it is played. It is radiant music, and the use of suggestion, instead of imitation, lends to the movement of the leaves and the carol of the birds their greatest potency over the imagination. Mr. Nikisch also proved another thing, namely: that he could make Brahms not only interesting, but delightful. This musician, who is classed by Von Bulow as one of the trinity of geniuses in music, Bach and Beethoven being the others, is commonly regarded as one of the most scholarly and abstruse writers now living. Mr. Nikisch demonstrates that he has the enduring qualities that have made the other symphonists admired and loved. He puts stress on the melody that is in the work and brings it out with remarkable clearness. The flute passage in the first allegro is one of the most lovely things in the world as the artist gives it. The engaging simplicity that is shown in passages of this kind is not a constant quality, it is true, yet it affords a key to the composition, and the passages are themes as well, the working out presenting but a variant on them. There is rustic joviality, there is noble choiring, there is tenderness, there is power; there is, in fact, an assembling of merits that make the works of Brahms listened to with more of willingness and welcomed with more of eagerness as years go by. These were the only purely orchestral numbers, for the pianist took the rest of the time and the programme, though, as to time, there was little waste of it, the whole bill, including a recall piece, occupying but a few minutes over two hours.

The piano player, Ignaz Paderewski, is a genius. He occupies a position in the musical world that has not been filled since the day of Liszt and Rubinstein, and he is, with the possible exception of the last named musician, who was a different kind of player and a different kind of man, the greatest artist in his line that has ever been heard in America. The lack of the sensational in his playing may make this statement seem a trifle large, but the truth of it is apparent before one has heard him play many minutes. It is not in exceptional and unusual things that he excels, but in the perfect balance of all those qualities that make for greatness. Rosenthal is possibly a more nimble manipulator. Mrs. Zeisler possibly plays with more fire. Von Bulow possibly plays Beethoven sonatas a little better. Rubinstein certainly plays with more power, for he was the thunderer of the piano, but Paderewski seems to unite all the excellences that have been named to the others' credit, with only a shade less of their excess of endowment. Here in this man are technical ability of first order, intellect, feeling, dignity, creative force and judgment. His work is epic, yet he never loses his self control. There are few people who play with so little an output of obvious enthusiasm as he. Yet he is not cold; he is only serene and self assured. There is not a man who is more modest and well behaved at the piano. There is almost a diffidence in his manner when he comes out, as if he would not have his hearers expect too much of him, or as if he depreciated the talk that is always excited by his hair. It is apparently an offense in these days of smug uniformity that a person should be a little bit different from his neighbor in his dress or his appearance, yet it is hard to see wherein he does a harm. Better a little affectation than a big one, and, if the man takes comfort in his ginger colored locks, for goodness sake let him wear them. He looks better with them, anyway, than he would with a prison crop. His age is variously given as thirty and forty, but he looks to be the younger of these figures. His colorless complexion, his whitish brows and lashes and his yellowish hair give him something the aspect of an albino, though the likeness to those empty and unhappy looking people is made distinct by the force and thought in his countenance. He sits upright at his instrument and indulges in no freaks or self display, the lifting of his left hand once in a while, during the seconds that a chord which he has struck with it is ringing, is about as far as he goes in this direction. His playing is strong, clear, almost massive. Perhaps if he tried to make it mountainous he would succeed, for it has reserve and you do not believe that he has done all he can when he leaves the key board. One of the remarkable things about him is that he seems to get only pure music from the piano and to rid it of that acid quality of tone that it has under the fingers of almost every player, amateur or expert. He is master of the singing tone; his chords in the middle register feel like those of an organ; his touch is [illegible] execution is warmed with spirit and expression; his pedaling is a study; his [illegible] is exquisite, though he has more sentiment than passion, and a crescendo, though it work up to a frenzy, is less effective than its reverse, where the notes die in whispers like the passing of the wind. He never goes beyond the legitimate in emotional expression; his meanings are always manly; they are alike without the weaknesses of overstatement and of languorous pining. His presentation of his subject is calmly true and richly beautiful. So far as he imposes his own quality on a work he does it by an optimistic process of selection, rather than by any forced variation on the composer's intent. His own concerto, in which he first appeared is nervously forcible, something less aggressive than the other examples of eastern music that have been offered here, yet characteristically Sclavic. It is full of spirit, the melodies are original, the instrumentation skillful, the modulations offer a series of delightful harmonic surprises, and the soloist's perfect mastery of the piano was asserted through the accompaniment, whether in the caressive touch and plaintive measures of the romanza or the brisk and resonant allegri. The solos that Mr. Paderewski afterward presented were a Chopin impromptu—deliciously played and a revealment of beauty—and one of Liszt's fiery Hungarian rhapsodies, that evoked an amount of enthusiasm unwonted in audiences that attend concerts in Brooklyn. To-night the same programme will be repeated.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y. 12/12

Symphony Orchestra.



IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

Ignace Paderewski was the notable figure at the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy yesterday. Brooklyn is generally cordial to musical geniuses, and its reception of Paderewski was not at variance with the tradition. The brilliant performer was warmly welcomed. He presented his own concerto (No. 1, op. 17), a Chopin impromptu and Liszt's familiar, but always popular, Rhapsodie Hongroise. The full programme for the rehearsal, to be repeated at to-night's concert, was as follows:

Goldmark....... Overture, "Prometheus Bound"
Paderewski..Concerto for Pianoforte. No. 1, Op. 17
Allegro; Romanza; Allegro molto vivace.
Ignace Paderewski.
Wagner.......... "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"
a) Chopin.................................Impromptu
b) Liszt......................Rhapsodie Hongroise
Ignace Paderewski.
Brahms...............Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 23

The Goldmark overture was an entirely welcome event, interpreted as it was with the liveliest sagacity and animation. The "Waldweben," with its delicate scene painting, one of the most deliciously pictorial of Wagner's creations, has an ineffaceable charm. Mr. Thomas has frequently played it for Brooklyn audiences, but it is invariably welcomed. The orchestra gives a vigorous interpretation of Brahms.

The Evening Bulletin.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A concert has rarely drawn so large an audience at the Academy of Music as that assembled last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Every part of the great theatre was filled, and in the lower parts there were many persons who had to stand. The programme looked short in print, but it included Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, a Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte by Bach, and the overture to Euryanthe. Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist in the Concerto.

Mr. Nikisch's band was in full force and in its usual excellent form. The noble Symphony was a refreshment, as Beethoven's works always are, after a course in which his name does not appear. The leader, who had no score before him, was alert as usual, directing all the instruments so that no shade of the meaning of the work should escape. He has ideas of tempi that are not always in accordance with preconceived ideas, and the vivace of the first movement was so slow as almost to seem draggy. Every trained leader, however, has a right to his own interpretation, and coming from such a musical centre as Leipsig, Nikisch was probably following the traditions of his school. As a whole, the Symphony gave great satisfaction and won the heartiest applause.

Rubinstein's concerto has passages of real inspiration, some of them suggesting even Beethoven. It was extremely well played, and Mr. Grünfeld, who appeared for the first time before a large audience in Philadelphia, established himself in favor by his accurate and elegant execution. There are no difficulties that he does not master; in force as well as in delicacy of touch he is equal to most of the great pianists. There is a lack of poetic sentiment in his playing, but the audience in general did not feel this, and there was such long-continued and hearty applause that he yielded at last, and, sitting down again, gave a very beautiful performance of Schumann's Träuemerei, the dreamy sweetness of which is, however, better expressed by a string orchestra than by a piano.

The Bach number was very delicious to the audience, and the gavotte, for strings, was the occasion for another hearty encore, to which Mr. Nikisch submitted. The concert closed with Weber's magnificent Euryanthe overture, which sent the multitude home in a state of rapture over the whole concert.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

There was the large and fashionable audience which has come to be the regular thing on these occasions at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its second concert for the season. The programme announced was one to arouse the pleasant anticipations of musical people. It was not long, including no more than four numbers, but it was comprehensive, and it gave to the classics of music a prominence which there has of late been too much disposition to deny them. Concert-goers desire and expect that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes one of its too infrequent visits to the city, it shall play for their delectation some acknowledged and more or less familiar masterpiece. They want to hear novelties, too. They are not unappreciative of the merits of Tschaikowsky and his congeners, and are glad to have the modern and ultra-romantic school of composition represented from time to time upon the monthly programme. But when it comes to Tschaikowsky instead of Beethoven, they are not satisfied to make the substitution.

Last night's programme was just about right. It contained a good example of modern methods and the modern spirit in Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, No. 4, op. 70; it presented a masterpiece of romantic writing in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; it gave the ancient but not antiquated classics a hearing in the arrangement for string orchestra of one of Bach's suites; and it included a glorious master-work of musical genius in the seventh or A major symphony of Beethoven. This great masterpiece is well known to the musical public, but it can never be heard too often. It is one of its great author's most inspired and radiant compositions. There is in it a grace, a brightness, a tunefulness and a gayety which call to mind all that was best in Mozart, and to these are added a breadth of conception, a vigor of expression and a fertility of development which belong only to Beethoven. Although it contains a funeral march in its second or allegretto movement, set to a combination of melodies of great pathetic suggestiveness, its tone is far from being sad, and as a whole the impression which it makes is one of exhilaration.

It was superbly played. Mr. Nikisch seemed to be more in sympathy with its sentiment than he was with that of the C minor, and he rendered it with the utmost delicacy of expression and subtle poetry of feeling. It is the peculiar merit of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor that he brings out with a special and singular clearness all the movements of a complex score, and this merit was never more marked than it was last night. No one instrument or set of instruments was allowed an undue prominence, and the manner in which, particularly in the symphony, the part of each was projected and made distinct was no less striking than enjoyable. Mr. Nikisch never so impressively approved himself a conductor of true imaginative insight and poetic feeling as he did last evening. His treatment of the allegrette was lovely in the extreme, and his rendering of the following presto could not have been more luminously brilliant. He rose to a level of excellence no less high in his direction of the Rubinstein concerto and the Weber overture, while the splendid quality of the strings of his orchestra was so tellingly exhibited in the Bach gavotte, as arranged by Bachreich, that it had to be repeated.

The soloist was Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, whose playing of the Rubinstein D minor concerto was so masterly, so assured, so intelligent, so mentally and technically adequate at every point, so sympathetic and so expressive, that the enthusiasm to which it stirred the audience was no cause for wonder. Mr. Grunfeld lately gave two concerts, which no one except the professional critics attended, at the Chestnut-street Opera House, at which he showed himself to be a fine artist, but even those who heard him then could hardly have been prepared for the performance of last night. As the audience evidently wished for more, Mr. Grunfeld good-naturedly sat down at the piano again and played Schumann's "Traumerie," apparently for the sake of its pianissimo effects. It was applauded, but some other selection would have been more welcome.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 9, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

There was a fair attendance last evening at the Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared for the second concert of the season. Beethoven's seventh symphony was beautifully rendered, the string orchestra played a poetic arrangement of a prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Von Weber. Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld played Rubinstein's D minor concerto with satisfying breadth of style and refined artistic expression, and confirmed the high opinion formed of his abilities in his earlier efforts here.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica, who sang in Cleveland last night, has been summoned to take the place of Albani in the Abbey and Grau Opera Company at New York. She will sing in "The Huguenots" tomorrow night. Albani's illness still detains her in Chicago.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Second Concert for the Season.

The second of its concerts for the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, with ~~the usual~~ large and fashionable audience in attendance. Only four numbers were included in the programme, but they represented as many distinct phases or periods of musical development, and the concert was all the more enjoyable because the extreme modern school was not, as too often it has been of late, the controlling or predominant element. Tschaikowsky is a gifted composer, no doubt, and so is Anton Dvorak, Saint-Saens, Goldmark, Lalo and others who might be named, but no composer has yet arisen of force enough to overshadow the Mozarts, Mendelssohns, Schuberts and Beethovens of the past, and concert goers are always best pleased when at least one of the old familiar masterpieces is put before them when a first-class orchestra, like the Boston organization, comes this way.

The symphony last evening was that brilliant, melodious and, in spite of the funeral march, which forms its second movement, that exhilcrating composition, Beethoven's Seventh in A. It was a great favorite with Theodore Thomas, and has often been heard here before, but it may be doubted whether it ever had a more sympathetic, poetical, responsive and luminous interpretation than it received last night.

Mr. Nikisch played it con amore, and alike the gentle pathos of the allegretto and the buoyant sparkling gayety of the presto and finale were expressed with appreciative feeling and all sufficient skill. The other exclusively orchestral numbers were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and an arrangement by Bachreich of a suite by Bach. The latter, written for strings alone, was superbly played, and the last of its three movements, a well-known and exceedingly spirited gavotte often heard on the piano, had to be repeated.

The soloist was Mr. Alfred Grunfeld. This gentleman was recognized as a remarkably fine pianist when he and his brother gave two concerts at the Chestnut Street Opera House a short time ago and those who heard him then were not surprised at his magnificent performance of the Rubinstein D Minor Concerto. It stirred the audience to great enthusiasm and the applause was so hearty and long continued that in response to it Mr. Grunfeld played Schumann's "Traumerei" with a beautiful legato touch and a wonderful pianissimo. A splendid performance of Weber's "Enryanthe" overture brought the concert to a close.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Alfred Gruenfeld's Fine Performance of the Rubinstein Concerto.

The feature of last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was the superb performance of Rubinstein's D minor concerto, with Alfred Gruenfeld at the piano—the same concerto that Paderewski played last week. Mr. Gruenfeld is an artist for whom the piano has no longer any difficulties and who, therefore, has no need to make an exhibition of technique or to parade his individual peculiarities. What impresses one first is his calm and complete intellectual apprehension of the work before him and then his firm, direct and masterly interpretation of it. The splendor and beauty, the deep ideality and masculine power of this noble composition have not been so presented since Rubinstein himself played it here. Mr. Gruenfeld's touch is absolutely sure and his sense of tone-values exquisite, and the combination of imaginative refinement with frank and manly power marks him as a very unusual artist.

His clear apprehension of the music and the life and accent which he gave it, carried the orchestra with him and the orchestral portion of the music was most beautifully played. Mr. Gruenfeld was enthusiastically recalled and displayed the singular delicacy of his touch in the dreamy rendering of Schumann's "Traumerei," which he gave at one of his recitals.

The concert was preceded by what purported to be Beethoven's seventh symphony —a revised version of Mr. Nikisch's own, which those who thought themselves familiar with that glorious work found some difficulty in recognizing. Mr. Nikisch's analytical treatment is certainly ingenious, but one need not be a stickler for tradition to feel that in sacrificing all the symmetry and proportion of a Beethoven symphony to mere tricks of instrumental effect there is much more lost than gained. The first two movements seemed to have been taken to pieces and not put together again. The scherzo and finale were better and the execution of the orchestra in the last movement was really a marvel of instrumental dexterity. No finer playing could be imagined; what was lacking was the intellectual apprehension of the music.

The concert concluded with some bits of Bach, exquisitely played on the strings, and the "Euryanthe" overture, in which Mr. Nikisch is at his best. The poetry of Weber he feels entirely and expresses completely, with a dainty delicacy and sentiment that could not be excelled, and all the beauties of his orchestral virtuosity are here delighfully displayed. The next concert of this fine orchestra will be on January 11.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

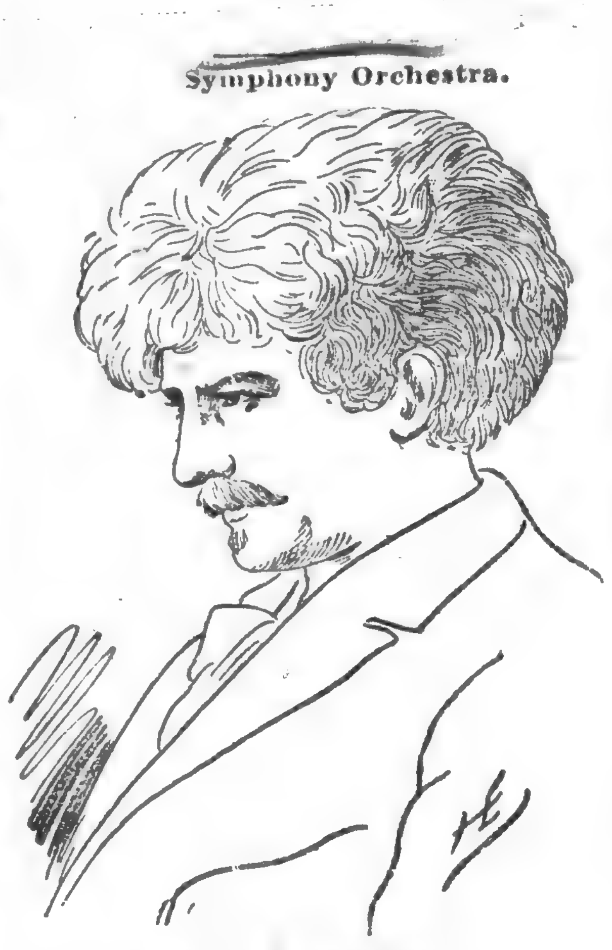
Date 12/2

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the series of concerts that retain the name of the Brooklyn Philharmonic was made yesterday, and it recalled the palmy days of the old Philharmonic, both in the excellence of the music and the largeness and enthusiasm of the audience. It is apparent that Mr. Nikisch and his matchless band are appreciated at last, and it is to be hoped that from this time there will be no doubt as to the permanency of these concerts in Brooklyn. Perhaps a good many of the people went to hear Paderewski instead of the orchestra, and, if so, they heard a mighty good piano player, but the treatment of the orchestra showed that its work was enjoyed and appreciated, and it is sure to increase in popularity as the season progresses. Such string playing has never been heard before, and so perfect a drill has never been exceeded. The opening number was the "Prometheus Bound" overture of Goldmark, a strong and dramatic work, betraying something of Meyerbeer's quality of consciousness in invention, but having more of passion and fervor than is to be found in the "Huguenots." The gloom of the fire bearer's fate, the struggles against his punishment, the airy tripping of the waves, personified into the Oceanides, the bursts of wrath, can be read or fancied by those who are curious for meanings. In orchestration the overture is rich; in melody it is usually grateful and ingenious, though as forced as Meyerbeer or Berlioz once in a while, and if the author does not repeat one of his best themes in the "Sakuntala" overture in a song for the oboe he writes in something that is uncommonly like it. In this, as in the other numbers, the tonal beauty of the band was discovered—the fine, pure quality strings, the rich, strong brasses, the vocal and feeling wood wind; the deep, humming resonance of the basses in one passage being of noticeable beauty. By his presentation of the scene in "Siegfried" that is called the waldweben, albeit the waving of the tree tops is but an incident of it, Mr. Nikisch again proved that he could play Wagner's music, though he is attracted by the idyllic rather than the dramatic elements in the selection. Nothing can exceed the charm of this episode, that seems to send a fresher air and a ray of summer sunshine through the building whenever it is played. It is radiant music, and the use of suggestion, instead of imitation, lends to the movement of the leaves and the carol of the birds their greatest potency over the imagination. Mr. Nikisch also proved another thing, namely: that he could make Brahms not only interesting, but delightful. This musician, who is classed by Von Bulow as one of the trinity of geniuses in music, Bach and Beethoven being the others, is commonly regarded as one of the most scholarly and abstruse writers now living. Mr. Nikisch demonstrates that he has the enduring qualities that have made the other symphonists admired and loved. He puts stress on the melody that is in the work and brings it out with remarkable clearness. The flute passage in the first allegro is one of the most lovely things in the world as the artist gives it. The engaging simplicity that is shown in passages of this kind is not a constant quality, it is true, yet it affords a key to the composition, and the passages are themes as well, the working out presenting but a variant on them. There is rustic joviality, there is noble choiring, there is tenderness, there is power; there is, in fact, an assembling of merits that make the works of Brahms listened to with more of willingness and welcomed with more of eagerness as years go by. These were the only purely orchestral numbers, for the pianist took the rest of the time and the programme, though, as to time, there was little waste of it, the whole bill, including a recall piece, occupying but a few minutes over two hours. The piano player, Ignaz Paderewski, is a genius. He occupies a position in the musical world that has not been filled since the day of Liszt and Rubinstein, and he is, with the possible exception of the last named musician, who was a different kind of player and a different kind of man, the greatest artist in his line that has ever been heard in America. The lack of the sensational in his playing may make this statement seem a trifle large, but the truth of it is apparent before one has heard him play many minutes. It is not in exceptional and unusual things that he excels, but in the perfect balance of all those qualities that make for greatness. Rosenthal is possibly a more nimble manipulator. Mrs. Zeisler possibly plays with more fire. Von Bulow possibly plays Beethoven sonatas a little better. Rubinstein certainly plays with more power,* for he was the thunderer of the piano, but Paderewski seems to unite all the excellences that have been named to the others' credit, with only a shade less of their excess of endowment. Here in this man are technical ability of first order, intellect, feeling, dignity, creative force and judgment. His work is epic, yet he never loses his self control. There are few people who play with so little an output of obvious enthusiasm as he. Yet he is not cold; he is only serene and self assured. There is not a man who is more modest and well behaved at the piano. There is almost a diffidence in his manner when he comes out, as if he would not have his hearers expect too much of him, or as if he depreciated the talk that is always excited by his hair. It is apparently an offense in these days of smug uniformity that a person should be a little bit different from his neighbor in his dress or his appearance, yet it is hard to see wherein he does a harm. Better a little affectation than a big one, and, if the man takes comfort in his ginger colored looks, for goodness sake let him wear them. He looks better with them, anyway, than he would with a prison crop. His age is variously given as thirty and forty, but he looks to be the younger of these figures. His colorless complexion, his whitish brows and lashes and his yellowish hair give him something the aspect of an albino, though the likeness to those empty and unhappy looking people is made distinct by the force and thought in his countenance. He sits upright at his instrument and indulges in no freaks or self display, the lifting of his left hand once in a while, during the seconds that a chord which he has struck with it is ringing, is about as far as he goes in this direction. His playing is strong, clear, almost massive. Perhaps if he tried to make it mountainous he would succeed, for it has reserve and you do not believe that he has done all he can when he leaves the key board. One of the remarkable things about him is that he seems to get only pure music from the piano and to rid it of that acid quality of tone that it has under the fingers of almost every player, amateur or expert. He is master of the singing tone; his chords in the middle register roll like those of an organ; his touch is [illegible] and exact, but his execution is warmed with spirit and expression; his pedaling is a study; his modulating is exquisite, though he has more sentiment than passion, and a crescendo, though it work up to a frenzy, is less effective than its reverse, where the notes die in whispers like the passing of the wind. He never goes beyond the legitimate in emotional expression; his meanings are always manly; they are alike without the weaknesses of overstatement and of languorous pining. His presentation of his subject is calmly true and richly beautiful. So far as he imposes his own quality on a work he does it by an optimistic process of selection, rather than by any forced variation on the composer's intent. His own concerto, in which he first appeared is nervously forcible, something less aggressive than the other examples of eastern music that have been offered here, yet characteristically Sclavic. It is full of spirit, the melodies are original, the instrumentation skillful, the modulations offer a series of delightful harmonic surprises, and the soloist's perfect mastery of the piano was asserted through the accompaniment, whether in the caressive touch and plaintive measures of the romanza or the brisk and resonant allegri. The solos that Mr. Paderewski afterward presented were a Chopin impromptu—deliciously played and a revealment of beauty—and one of Liszt's fiery Hungarian rhapsodies, that evoked an amount of enthusiasm unwonted in audiences that attend concerts in Brooklyn. To-night the same programme will be repeated.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y. 12/2

Symphony Orchestra.



IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

Ignace Paderewski was the notable figure at the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy yesterday. Brooklyn is generally cordial to musical geniuses, and its reception of Paderewski was not at variance with the tradition. The brilliant performer was warmly welcomed. He presented his own concerto (No. 1, op. 17), a Chopin impromptu and Liszt's familiar, but always popular, Rhapsodie Hongroise. The full programme for the rehearsal, to be repeated at to-night's concert, was as follows:

Goldmark....... Overture, "Prometheus Bound"
Paderewski..Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, Op. 17
Allegro; Romanza; Allegro molta vivace.
Ignace Paderewski.
Vagner.........."Waldweben," from "Siegfried"
a) Chopin..............................Impromptu
b) Liszt......................Rhapsodie Hongroise
Ignace Paderewski.
Brahms..............Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 23

The Goldmark overture was an entirely velcome event, interpreted as it was with the iveliest sagacity and animation. The "Waldweben," with its delicate scene painting, one of the most deliciously pictorial of Vagner's creations, has an ineffaceable narm. Mr. Thomas has frequently played for Brooklyn audiences, but it is invariably elcomed. The orchestra gives a vigorous nterpretation of Brahms.

The Evening Bulletin.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A concert has rarely drawn so large an audience at the Academy of Music as that assembled last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Every part of the great theatre was filled, and in the lower parts there were many persons who had to stand. The programme looked short in print, but it included Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, a Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte by Bach, and the overture to Euryanthe. Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist in the Concerto.

Mr. Nikisch's band was in full force and in its usual excellent form. The noble Symphony was a refreshment, as Beethoven's works always are, after a course in which his name does not appear. The leader, who had no score before him, was alert as usual, directing all the instruments so that no shade of the meaning of the work should escape. He has ideas of tempi that are not always in accordance with preconceived ideas, and the vivace of the first movement was so slow as almost to seem draggy. Every trained leader, however, has a right to his own interpretation, and coming from such a musical centre as Leipsig, Nikisch was probably following the traditions of his school. As a whole, the Symphony gave great satisfaction and won the heartiest applause.

Rubinstein's concerto has passages of real inspiration, some of them suggesting even Beethoven. It was extremely well played, and Mr. Grünfeld, who appeared for the first time before a large audience in Philadelphia, established himself in favor by his accurate and elegant execution. There are no difficulties that he does not master; in force as well as in delicacy of touch he is equal to most of the great pianists. There is a lack of poetic sentiment in his playing, but the audience in general did not feel this, and there was such long-continued and hearty applause that he yielded at last, and, sitting down again, gave a very beautiful performance of Schumann's Träumerei, the dreamy sweetness of which is, however, better expressed by a string orchestra than by a piano.

The Bach number was very delicious to the audience, and the gavotte, for strings, was the occasion for another hearty encore, to which Mr. Nikisch submitted. The concert closed with Weber's magnificent Euryanthe overture, which sent the multitude home in a state of rapture over the whole concert.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

There was the large and fashionable audience which has come to be the regular thing on these occasions at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its second concert for the season. The programme announced was one to arouse the pleasant anticipations of musical people. It was not long, including no more than four numbers, but it was comprehensive, and it gave to the classics of music a prominence which there has of late been too much disposition to deny them. Concert-goers desire and expect that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes one of its too infrequent visits to the city, it shall play for their delectation some acknowledged and more or less familiar masterpiece. They want to hear novelties, too. They are not unappreciative of the merits of Tschaikowsky and his congeners, and are glad to have the modern and ultra-romantic school of composition represented from time to time upon the monthly programme. But when it comes to Tschaikowsky instead of Beethoven, they are not satisfied to make the substitution.

Last night's programme was just about right. It contained a good example of modern methods and the modern spirit in Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, No. 4, op. 70; it presented a masterpiece of romantic writing in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture; it gave the ancient but not antiquated classics a hearing in the arrangement for string orchestra of one of Bach's suites; and it included a glorious master-work of musical genius in the seventh or A major symphony of Beethoven. This great masterpiece is well known to the musical public, but it can never be heard too often. It is one of its great author's most inspired and radiant compositions. There is in it a grace, a brightness, a tunefulness and a gayety which call to mind all that was best in Mozart, and to these are added a breadth of conception, a vigor of expression and a fertility of development which belong only to Beethoven. Although it contains a funeral march in its second or allegretto movement, set to a combination of melodies of great pathetic suggestiveness, its tone is far from being sad, and as a whole the impression which it makes is one of exhilaration.

It was superbly played. Mr. Nikisch seemed to be more in sympathy with its sentiment than he was with that of the C minor, and he rendered it with the utmost delicacy of expression and subtle poetry of feeling. It is the peculiar merit of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor that he brings out with a special and singular clearness all the movements of a complex score, and this merit was never more marked than it was last night. No one instrument or set of instruments was allowed an undue prominence, and the manner in which, particularly in the symphony, the part of each was projected and made distinct was no less striking than enjoyable. Mr. Nikisch never so impressively approved himself a conductor of true imaginative insight and poetic feeling as he did last evening. His treatment of the allegrette was lovely in the extreme, and his rendering of the following presto could not have been more luminously brilliant. He rose to a level of excellence no less high in his direction of the Rubinstein concerto and the Weber overture, while the splendid quality of the strings of his orchestra was so tellingly exhibited in the Bach gavotte, as arranged by Bachreich, that it had to be repeated.

The soloist was Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, whose playing of the Rubinstein D minor concerto was so masterly, so assured, so intelligent, so mentally and technically adequate at every point, so sympathetic and so expressive, that the enthusiasm to which it stirred the audience was no cause for wonder. Mr. Grunfeld lately gave two concerts, which no one except the professional critics attended, at the Chestnut-street Opera House, at which he showed himself to be a fine artist, but even those who heard him then could hardly have been prepared for the performance of last night. As the audience evidently wished for more, Mr. Grunfeld good-naturedly sat down at the piano again and played Schumann's "Traumerie," apparently for the sake of its pianissimo effects. It was applauded, but some other selection would have been more welcome.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 8, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

There was a fair attendance last evening at the Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared for the second concert of the season. Beethoven's seventh symphony was beautifully rendered, the string orchestra played a poetic arrangement of a prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach, and the "Euryanthe" overture of Von Weber. Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld played Rubinstein's D minor concerto with satisfying breadth of style and refined artistic expression, and confirmed the high opinion formed of his abilities in his earlier efforts here.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica, who sang in Cleveland last night, has been summoned to take the place of Albani in the Abbey and Grau Opera Company at New York. She will sing in "The Huguenots" tomorrow night. Albani's illness still detains her in Chicago.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Second Concert for the Season.

The second of its concerts for the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, with ehe usual large and fashionable audience in attendance. Only four numbers were included in the programme, but they represented as many distinct phases or periods of musical development, and the concert was all the more enjoyable because the extreme modern school was not, as too often it has been of late, the controlling or predominant element. Tschaikowsky is a gifted composer, no doubt, and so is Anton Dvorak, Saint-Saens, Goldmark, Lalo and others who might be named, but no composer has yet arisen of force enough to overshadow the Mozarts, Mendelssohns, Schuberts and Beethovens of the past, and concert goers are always best pleased when at least one of the old familiar masterpieces is put before them when a first-class orchestra, like the Boston organization, comes this way.

The symphony last evening was that brilliant, melodious and, in spite of the funeral march, which forms its second movement, that exhilcrating composition, Beethoven's Seventh in A. It was a great favorite with Theodore Thomas, and has often been heard here before, but it may be doubted whether it ever had a more sympathetic, poetical, responsive and luminous interpretation than it received last night.

Mr. Nikisch played it con amore, and alike the gentle pathos of the allegretto and the buoyant sparkling gayety of the presto and finale were expressed with appreciative feeling and all sufficient skill. The other exclusively orchestral numbers were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and an arrangement by Bachreich of a suite by Bach. The latter, written for strings alone, was superbly played, and the last of its three movements, a well-known and exceedingly spirited gavotte often heard on the piano, had to be repeated.

The soloist was Mr. Alfred Grunfeld. This gentleman was recognized as a remarkably fine pianist when he and his brother gave two concerts at the Chestnut Street Opera House a short time ago and those who heard him then were not surprised at his magnificent performance of the Rubinstein D Minor Concerto. It stirred the audience to great enthusiasm and the applause was so hearty and long continued that in response to it Mr. Grunfeld played Schumann's "Traumerei" with a beautiful legato touch and a wonderful pianissimo. A splendid performance of Weber's "Enryanthe" overture brought the concert to a close.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Alfred Gruenfeld's Fine Performance of the Rubinstein Concerto.

The feature of last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was the superb performance of Rubinstein's D minor concerto, with Alfred Gruenfeld at the piano—the same concerto that Paderewski played last week. Mr. Gruenfeld is an artist for whom the piano has no longer any difficulties and who, therefore, has no need to make an exhibition of technique or to parade his individual peculiarities. What impresses one first is his calm and complete intellectual apprehension of the work before him and then his firm, direct and masterly interpretation of it. The splendor and beauty, the deep ideality and masculine power of this noble composition have not been so presented since Rubinstein himself played it here. Mr. Gruenfeld's touch is absolutely sure and his sense of tone-values exquisite, and the combination of imaginative refinement with frank and manly power marks him as a very unusual artist.

His clear apprehension of the music and the life and accent which he gave it, carried the orchestra with him and the orchestral portion of the music was most beautifully played. Mr. Gruenfeld was enthusiastically recalled and displayed the singular delicacy of his touch in the dreamy rendering of Schumann's "Traumerei," which he gave at one of his recitals.

The concert was preceded by what purported to be Beethoven's seventh symphony—a revised version of Mr. Nikisch's own, which those who thought themselves familiar with that glorious work found some difficulty in recognizing. Mr. Nikisch's analytical treatment is certainly ingenious, but one need not be a stickler for tradition to feel that in sacrificing all the symmetry and proportion of a Beethoven symphony to mere tricks of instrumental effect there is much more lost than gained. The first two movements seemed to have been taken to pieces and not put together again. The scherzo and finale were better and the execution of the orchestra in the last movement was really a marvel of instrumental dexterity. No finer playing could be imagined; what was lacking was the intellectual apprehension of the music.

The concert concluded with some bits of Bach, exquisitely played on the strings, and the "Euryanthe" overture, in which Mr. Nikisch is at his best. The poetry of Weber he feels entirely and expresses completely, with a dainty delicacy and sentiment that could not be excelled, and all the beauties of his orchestral virtuosity are here delightfully displayed. The next concert of this fine orchestra will be on January 11.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Dec. 8, 1891.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Academy of Music was found none too spacious to accommodate the fine assemblage that attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series last night. And the concert was worthy of such an audience. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (in A) was given in a style not surpassed here in its general handling. There are scenes in the work that have always been treated by the interpreter who made it familiar to Philadelphia audiences in a spirit of gaiety and humor that made them very effective. Mr. Nikisch lets his musical guests grow frolicsome, too, but he enjoins caution upon them, and insists that there shall be no overstepping of a nice discretion. But he reveals every beauty of the great romantic masterpiece which even Beethoven himself called his "grand" symphony, and spoke of it as one of his finest works. Mr. Nikisch, who evidently knows it by heart, conducted it without notes and with a watchfulness that covered almost every instrument, the resultant perfection of the performance being little short of marvellous. The audience made its appreciation emphatically plain.

Alfred Gruenfeld was the soloist in Rubinstein's D minor (No. 4) concerto for pianoforte. The qualifications of this artist have been set forth so fully and recently in these columns that it need be but added that his playing was technically splendid, especially in the closing movement, and worthy of the fine work of the band, though he seemed, in two respects, to fall short of a recent memorable performance of the same concerto, namely, the brightness and variety of tone and that indescribable quality that has poetic passion for its source, which gave unmistakable distinction to the other performance. Mr. Grünfeld, however, made a fine impression and deserved the enthusiastic recalls he received, and which were repeated until he again seated himself at the piano and played Schumann's "Traumerei." This he did with much beauty and delicate fancy.

The only other numbers on the programme were the "Euryantha" overture of Von Weber and a prelude, adagio and gavotte arranged for strings from Bach by Bachreich. The gavotte, quaint and lively, was so interesting in itself and so effectively played that the audience insisted upon having it over again. The next concert is to be on January 11.

The [illegible] Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Herr Gruenfeld at the Academy.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the interest of a very large audience, completely filling the Academy of Music last night, centered in the performance of Herr Alfred Gruenfeld, the pianist, who is not unknown to Philadelphians, but who had not before addressed (the term may be allowed, for a piano fairly speaks in masterly hands) an audience so considerable.

After the Beethoven symphony in A, No. 7, which was rendered in the familiar and approved Nikisch manner, Mr. Gruenfeld played Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, Op. 70. It was a thoroughly conscientious performance, appealing to the taste and eliciting the approval of trained musical auditors, although not in the strict sense popular. It seemed that Mr. Gruenfeld never forgot himself or his audience in his effort to interpret Rubinstein, and those who know Rubinstein's own manner would be tempted to ask Mr. Gruenfeld to be just a little less careful.

However, the master of technique showed his full powers in "The Traeumerei," acceptably offered as an encore in response to hearty applause. Delicate and discreet emphasis made every note of this delicious composition effective, and so the success of the evening was scored without effort.

Bachreich's arrangement of Bach's Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, for strings, followed, and the overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber terminated an exceedingly enjoyable evening.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 12/14

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy on Saturday night demonstrated the success of the musical organization which, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, is taking the place of Theodore Thomas' players. Mr. Nikisch may not yet have won the loyal interest that went out toward Thomas, but he is recognized as a leader of the highest abilities, and the players he has gathered about him are of the efficiency such a leader might be expected to select. The audience was delighted with Saturday night's programme, and Paderewski was greeted with the liveliest enthusiasm, being repeatedly recalled.

Paderewski gave his first recital at Historical Hall this afternoon.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second concert of our Boston guests on Tuesday evening of last week showed Chickering Hall crowded to the very doors and the large, fashionable audience was just as appreciative as it was enthusiastic. The applause, moreover, was thoroughly deserved, the New York "Herald" to the contrary notwithstanding, for a finer, all around orchestral performance of a most interesting and well balanced program New York has rarely witnessed.

The evening's proceedings opened with Richard Strauss' latest symphonic poem, "Don Juan." The novelty shows even more than any other of the young composer-conductor's works the influence of the ultra modern school, and in fact, in point of the exterior garb of the work, the orchestration. Strauss at the same time that he utilizes to the fullest the advances made by Wagner and Berlioz, innovates and at times even improves upon them. This he succeeds in doing by a novel way of transposing the entire orchestra into the very highest positions. The string orchestra, notably the double basses, which at one time climb up to high B natural, the clarinets, the horns, all are employed in the very top limits of their compass, and this new device, continually and consistently carried through, gives to Strauss' orchestration a brilliancy, nay enchanting splendor, which has the charm of fresh and most vivid colors seen in the very brightest light.

The general facture is also most skillful in the use of most unexpected enharmonic changes; but not all of the discords introduced are of pleasing effect; some of them are indeed more startling than beautiful. If "Don Juan" is thus especially interesting to the listener who has an ear and understanding for the technical part of composition, it cannot be asserted that the imagination is in like proportion satisfied by the thematic material invented, or rather not invented, by Strauss. They have all learned, these young German composers, how to drape their ideas with the silk and satin of Wagner's gorgeous garb of orchestration, but his fecund ideas they lack. Strauss at least refrains from bodily stealing Wagner's themes, but those which he substitutes are neither very original nor are they important or dramatic enough to portray what they intend to illustrate. The opening section in E major has indeed the flavor of freshness and directness of purpose, but this rush soon subsides and the entire middle episodes in G minor-major, although interestingly worked out, are devoid of inspiration and musical ideas.

The performance of this most difficult work was a marvel of finish and rhythmic precision, and gave Mr. Nikisch a chance for the advantageous display of his fine musical temperament, of which he was not slow to avail himself to the fullest extent.

That loveliest of all musical torsos, the Schubert unfinished symphony, also received at his hands the most loving and careful treatment, for which in turn he had to bow his acknowledgments to sincere applause after each of the two movements.

As for the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, the writer has never before, with the sole exception of a performance under Richard Wagner's own baton, heard this polyphonic masterpiece more plastically played. It was a marvel of clear and thoroughly musical interpretation, and the temp was one of stateliness without the slightest dragging. The woodwind did some admirable work in this number.

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, late first violoncellist of the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. He fully justified and sustained the great reputation which preceded him by playing the Volkmann A minor 'cello concerto in a most artistic and musicianly manner. Although commending the technic of his instrument to a degree of virtuosity, he never displays it as such, but, like the true artist he is, uses it as a means to an end. Mr. Schroeder was warmly applauded, not the least so by his own colleagues of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, among whom a praiseworthy esprit de corps seems to prevail.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

THE novelty of the second Kneisel Quartet Concert last Friday night at Sherry's was a piano quintet in E minor by Christian Sinding, a young Norwegian composer. The work can hardly be said to be an impressive one, nor is it very original, but it nevertheless contains some very interesting experiments in harmony and a remarkably clever scherzo.

The opening allegro consists of a figured theme which sounds marvelously like a figure in the G minor symphony of Mozart. This is entwined around a decidedly Norwegian motive, as Grieg-like as it possibly can be, and the movement throughout, while manifesting considerable ability in workmanship, is musically dry and uninteresting. The continual repetition of the sharp chord figure and the reiteration of the above mentioned figure soon grew monotonous.

The second movement, an andante, is better, though commonplace as to theme. Its opening and coda for the strings alone are very effective, however.

The scherzo is the most piquant and original of the four movements of the quintet and was played with the most vim and vigor. The last movement betrays a poverty on the part of the composer, for the first figure of the allegro turns up once more and sticks grimly to the end. The ending of this movement is impressive, almost startling, on account of the abrupt harmonic transitions.

As a whole the work lacks variety of coloring, the andante, dark and sombre, being the most characteristically national. The piano part was taken by a newcomer, Ferruccio Busoni, a young Italian pianist and composer who was a winner of the Rubinstein prize in St. Petersburg. He has a light crisp touch, fingers most agile, great rhythmic abilities, but betrays a dryness and hardness of tone in his chord playing. Undoubtedly this was due to the smallness of Sherry's rooms and the lowness of the ceiling. Mr. Busoni is at present an instructor of piano at the New England Conservatory, of Boston, an institution which always endeavors to secure [illegible] Busoni is a very talented musical young man, whose compositions are pronounced by judges to be extremely meritorious, and who should be heard as a solo pianist, for his abilities are very great. The rest of the program consisted of a Haydn quartet in D and Schumann's quartet in A, both beautifully played by the Kneisel Quartet, whose finish, tonal balance and sincerity make them an ideal group of chamber music performers.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert.

THE public rehearsal of the second Brooklyn Philharmonic Society concert took place last Friday afternoon at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch, played Goldmark's characteristic overture, "Prometheus Bound," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" of Wagner and Brahms' most enjoyable symphony, the second one in D.

While differences of opinion may exist as to Mr. Nikisch's Wagner readings, one is nevertheless forced to admire their absolute lucidity and beauty of tone, though the absolute climax never comes, and detail effect is aimed at instead of broad surface painting.

The Brahms symphony was wonderfully played, and Mr. Nikisch's undoubted intellectual grasp of the subject was demonstrated.

The solo performer of the afternoon was Ignace Jan Paderewski, who played his lovely A minor concerto with an accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch that was simply fit for the gods.

At last the great Polish pianist gave a full view of his genius; for, unhampered, he put forth all his power, and for grace, delicacy, force, fire and poetical musical passion his playing was something extraordinary. The superlative is forgiven when one writes of Paderewski. Brooklyn audiences are proverbially cold, but after the second Chopin impromptu and the sixth Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt Paderewski's audience of Friday unbent a bit and applauded, and their applause was sincere enough to cause the pianist to respond with Liszt's "Campanella." The regular concert took place last Saturday evening, and Mr. Paderewski never played better. For encore he was forced to respond with an overwhelming performance of Rubinstein's staccato etude in C.

Musical Courier

PADEREWSKI.

Musical Courier

EDOUARD DE RESZKE

MARION S. WEED.

Musical Courier

THEODORE HABELMAN (STAGE MANAGER)

Musical Courier

JEAN DE RESZKE

Musical Courier

LILLI LEHMANN

Musical Courier

CLARA POOLE.

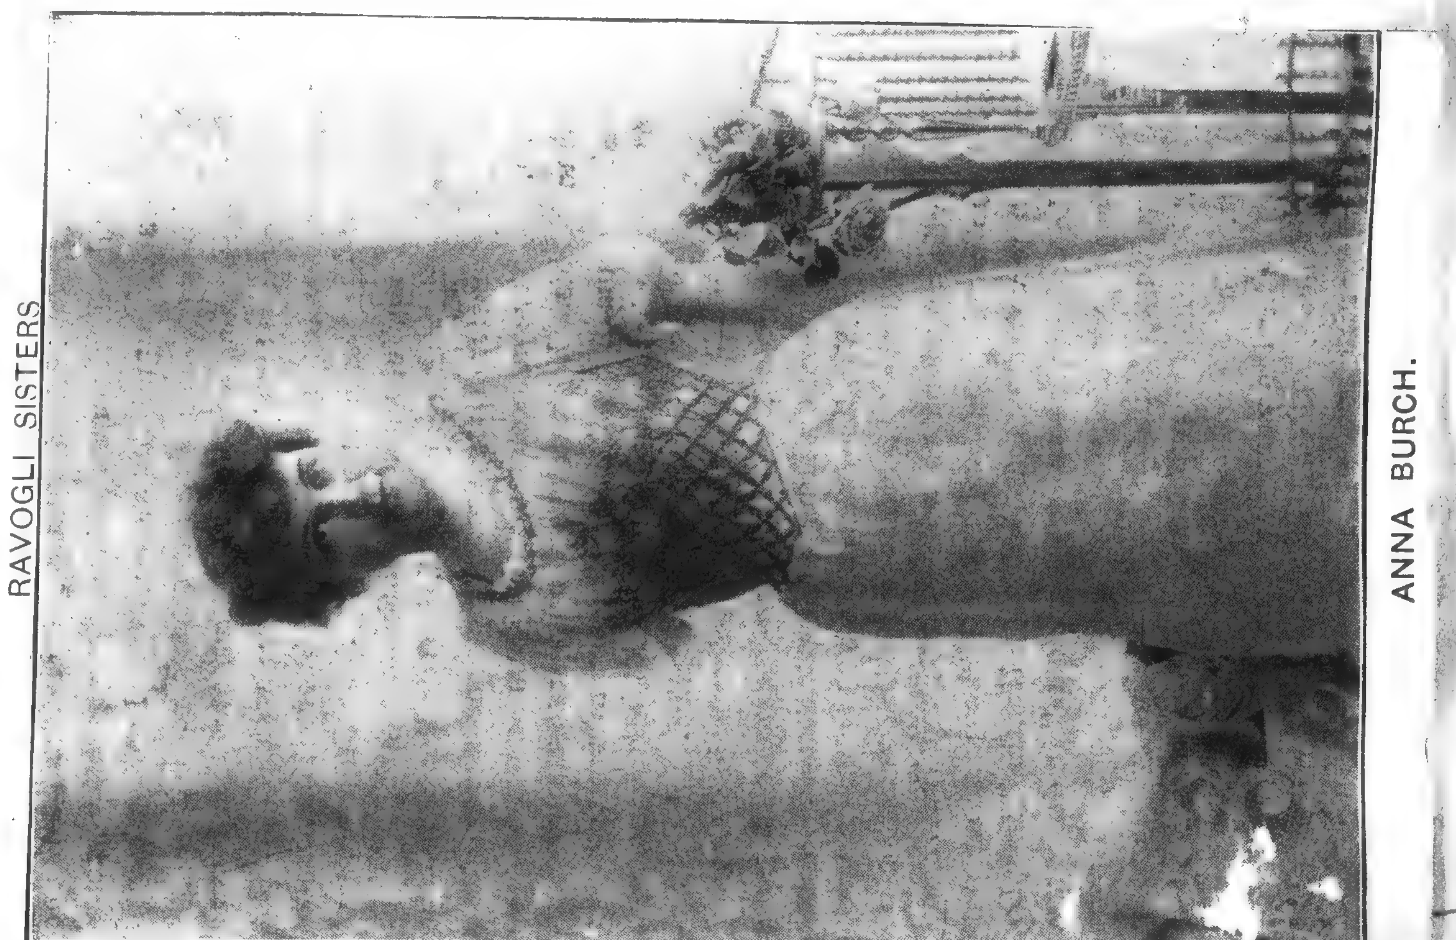
ROSA LINDE.

Musical Courier

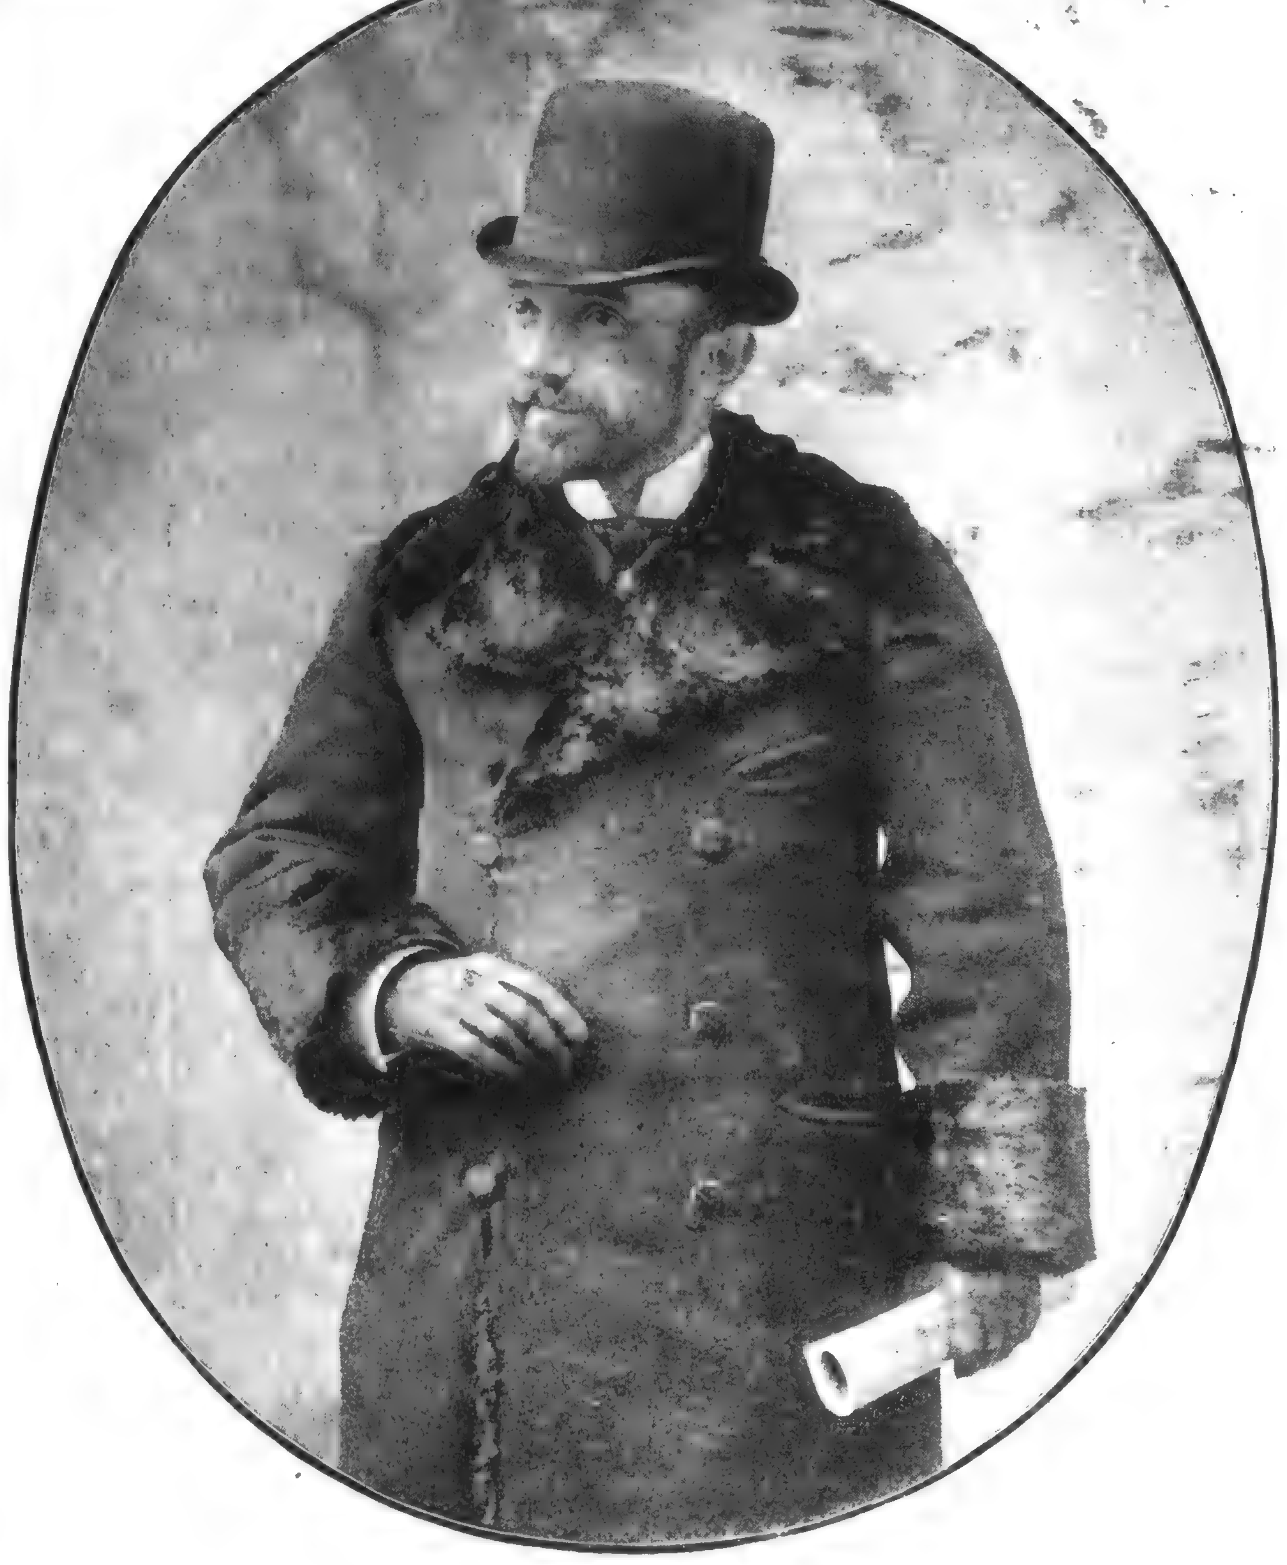
SCALCHI

Musical Courier

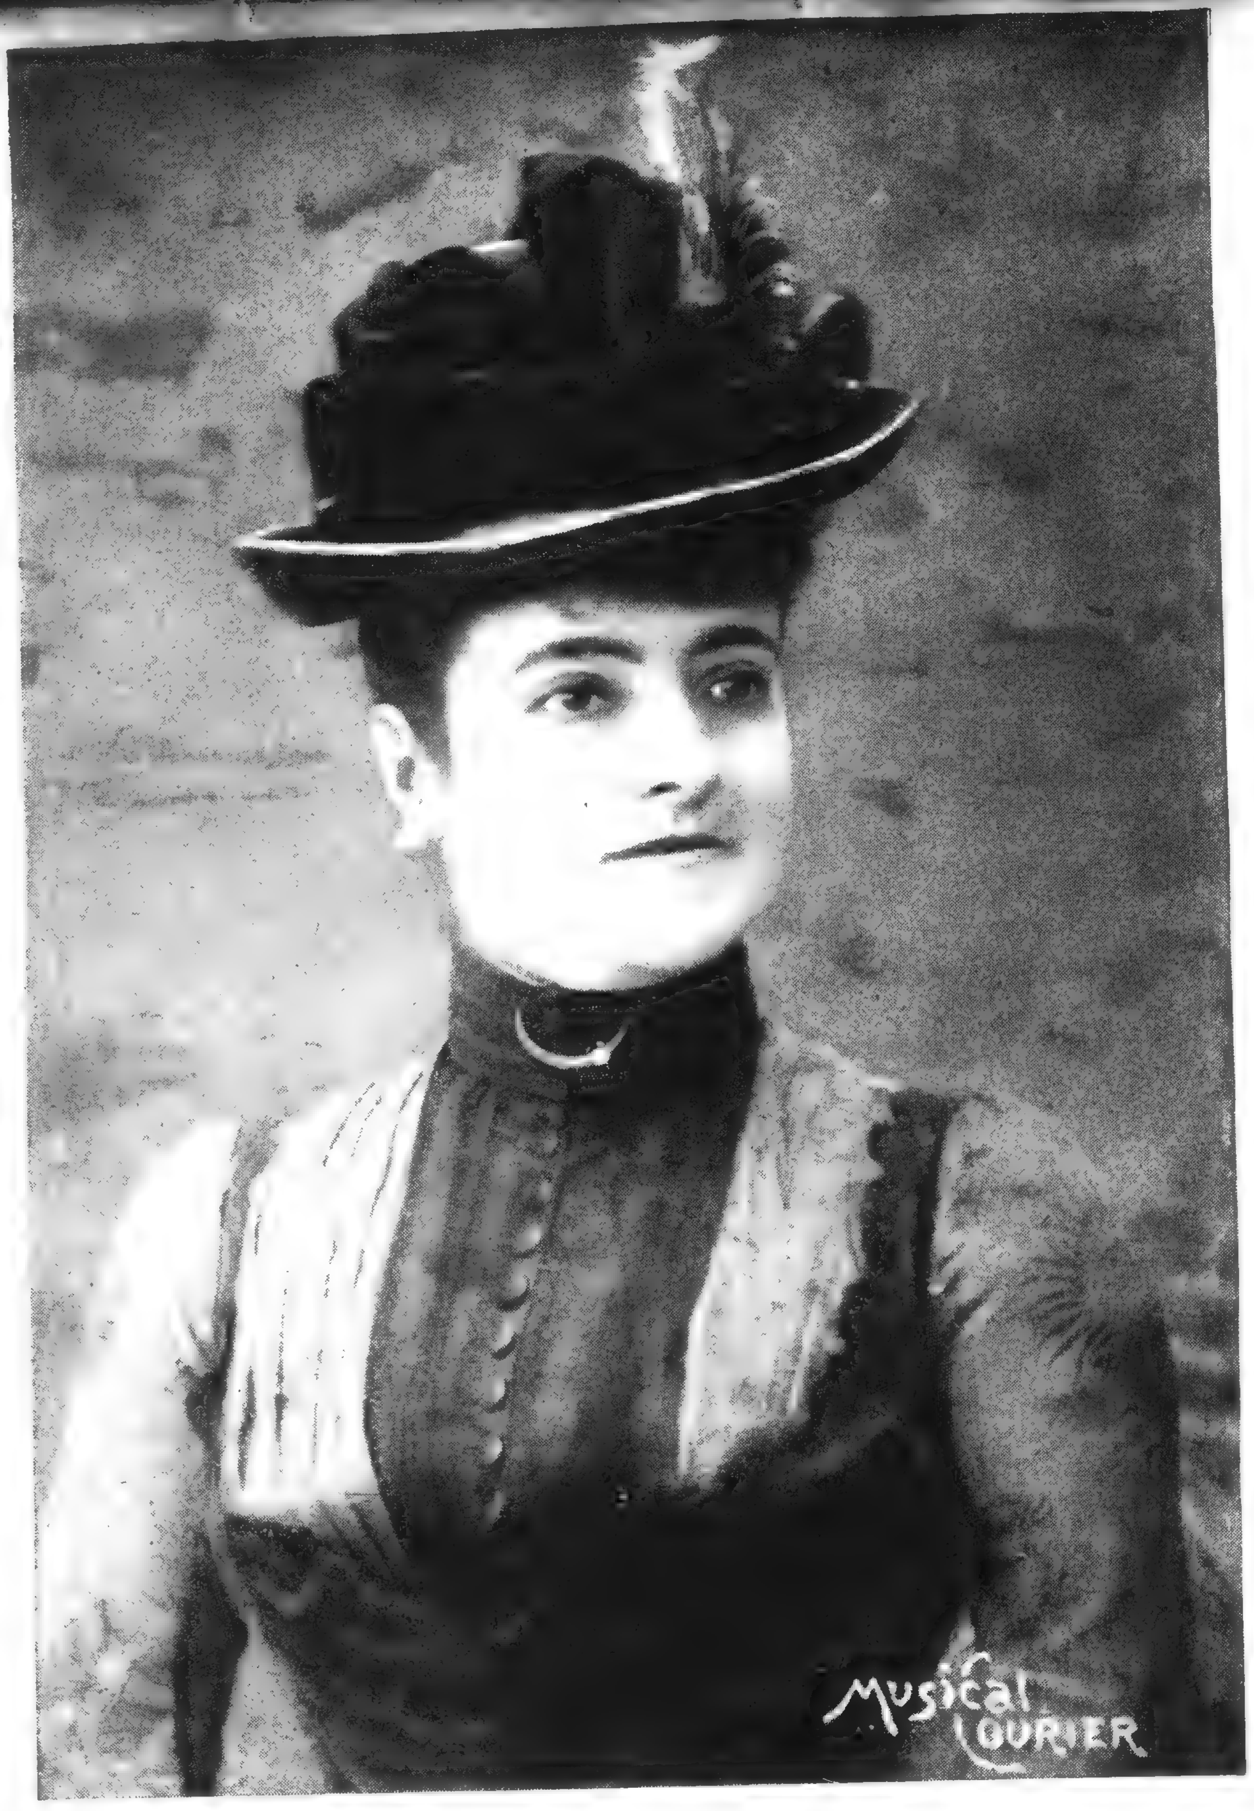
RAVOGLI SISTERS



ANNA BURCH.

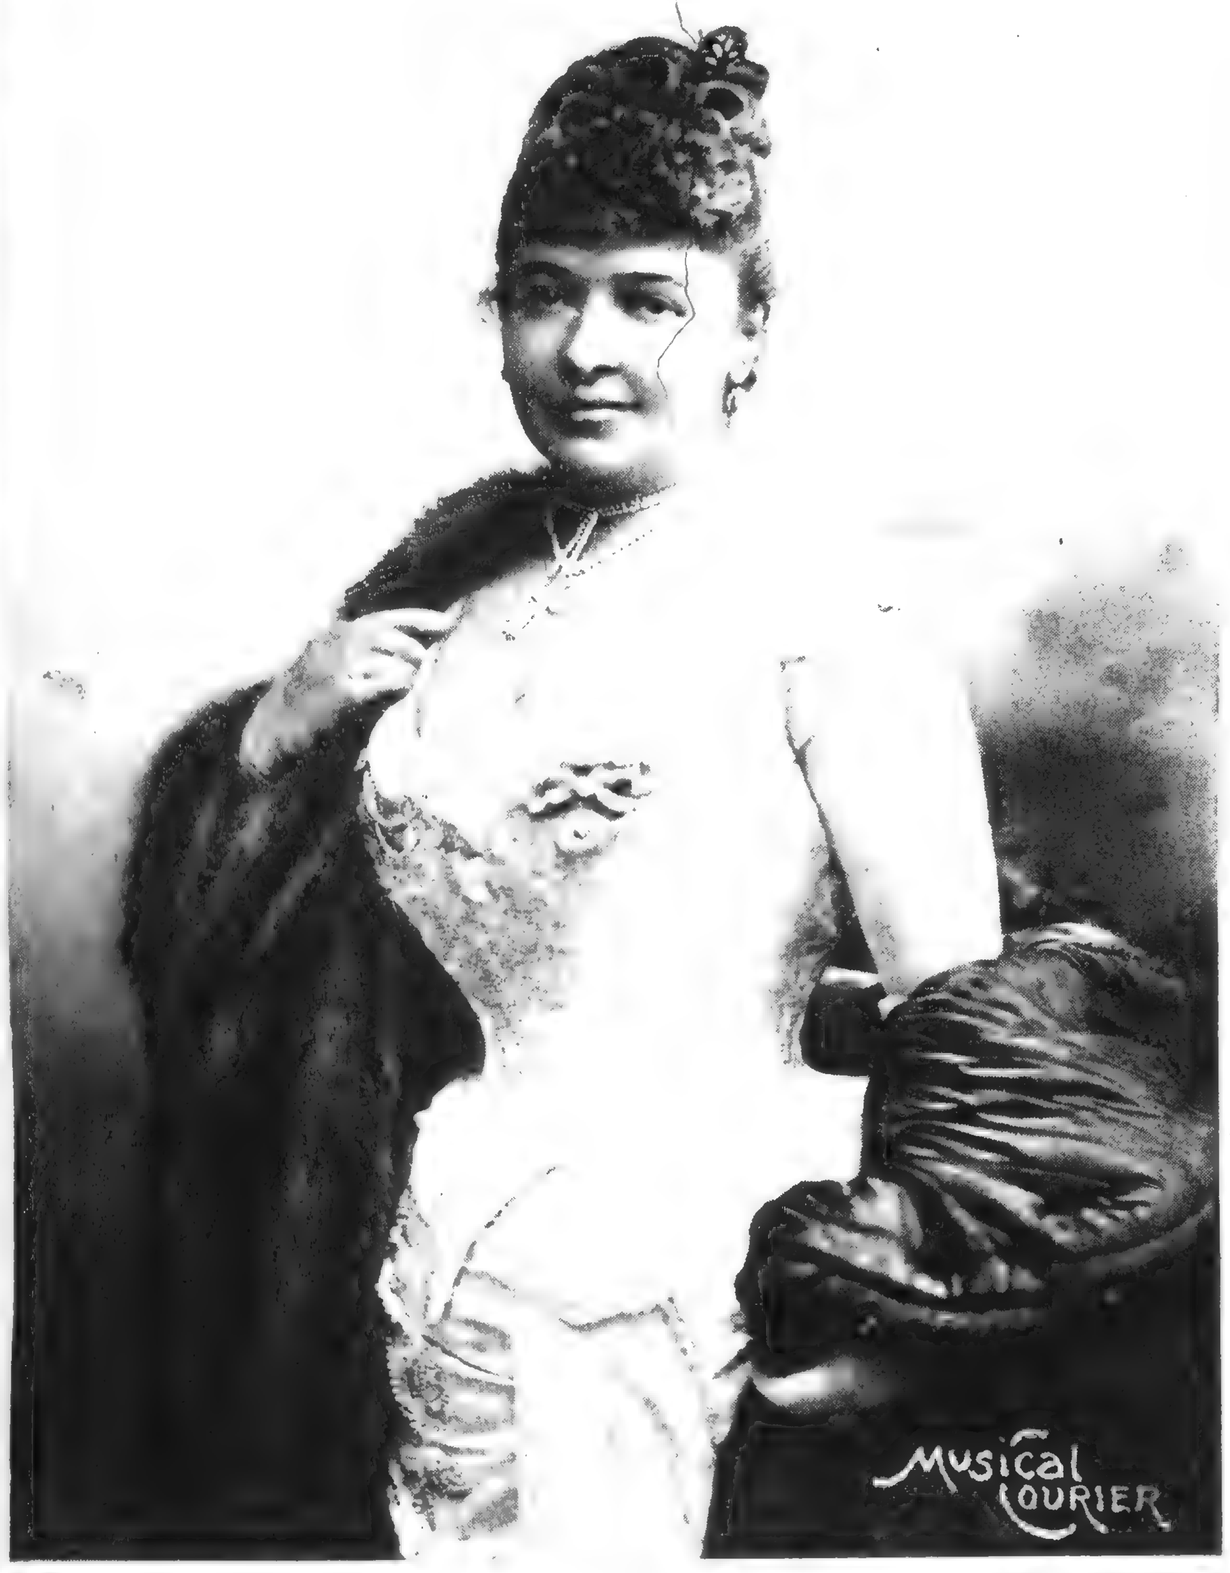


W. R. CHAPMAN.



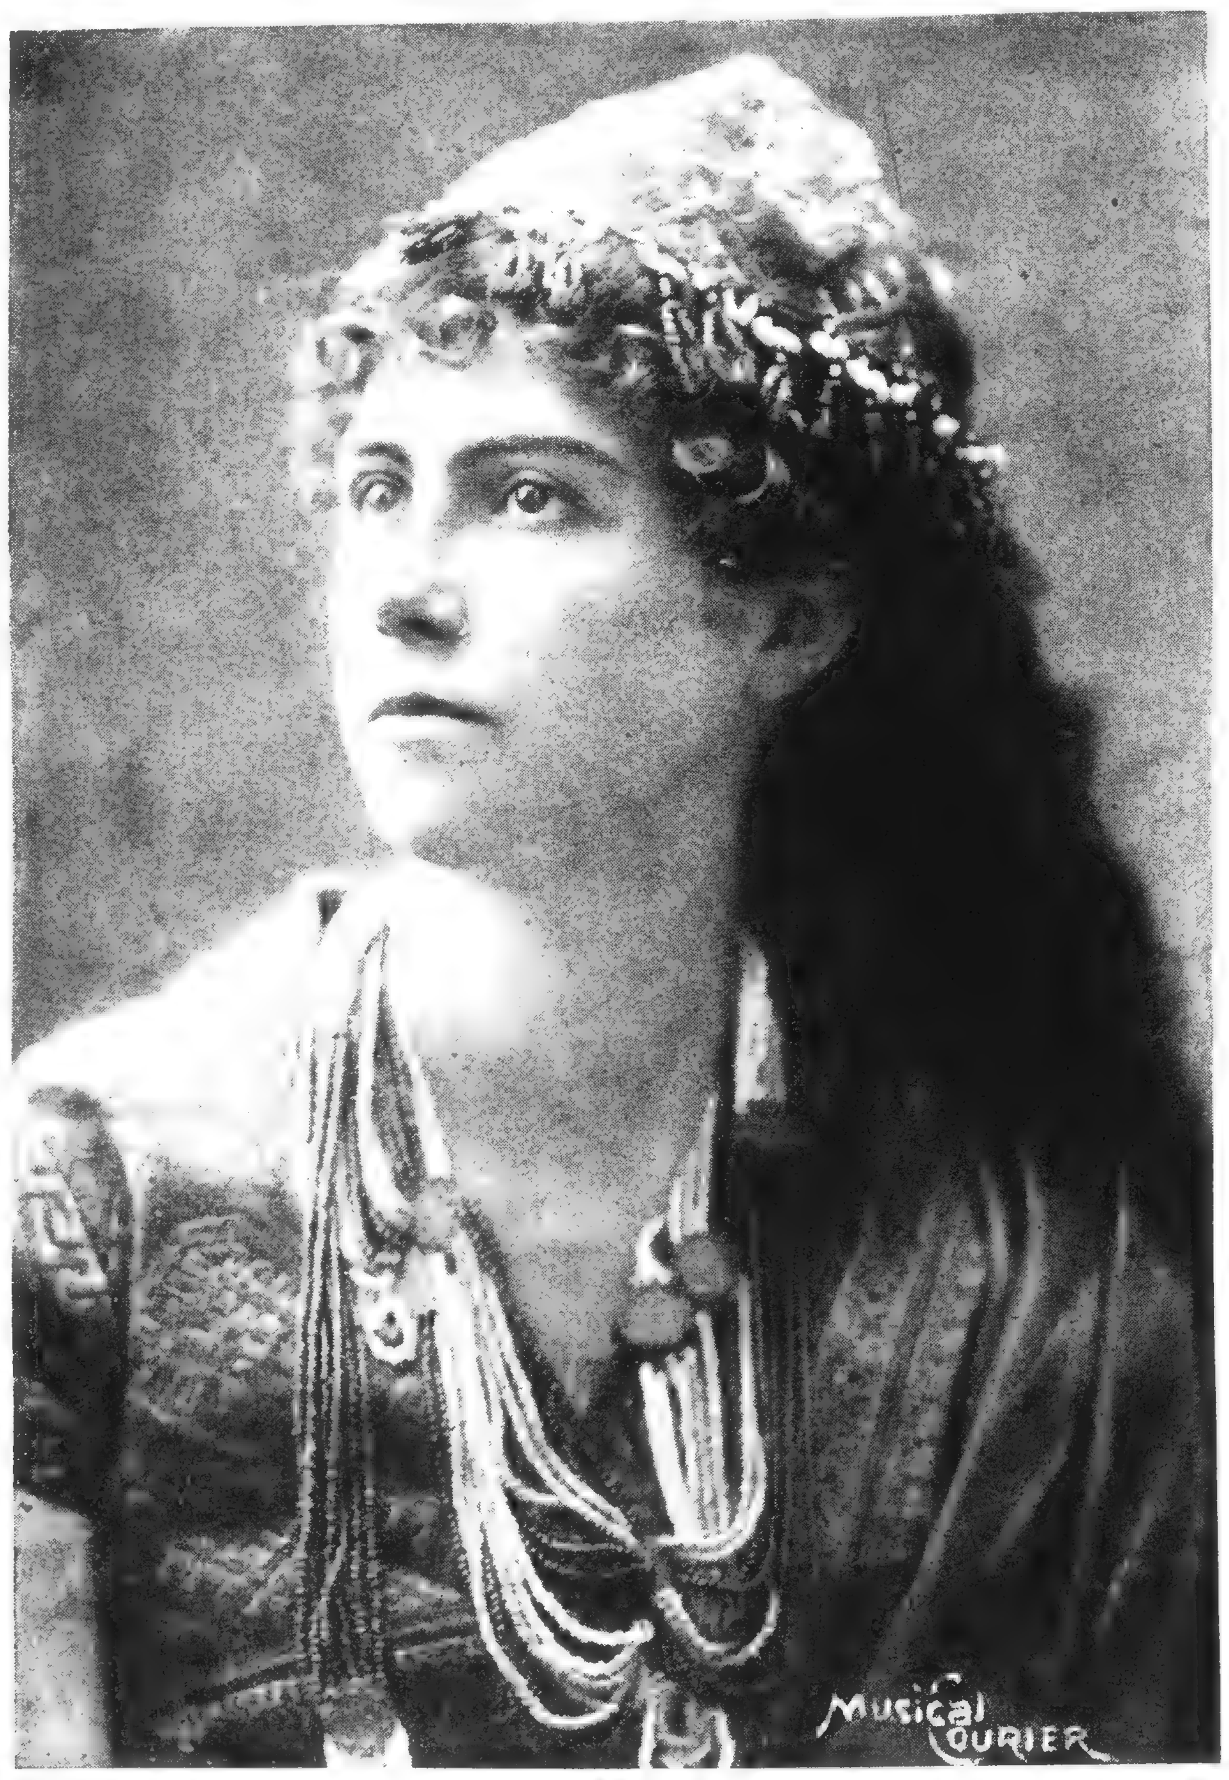
Musical Courier

ADELINA PATTI (FROM LATEST PHOTOGRAPH)



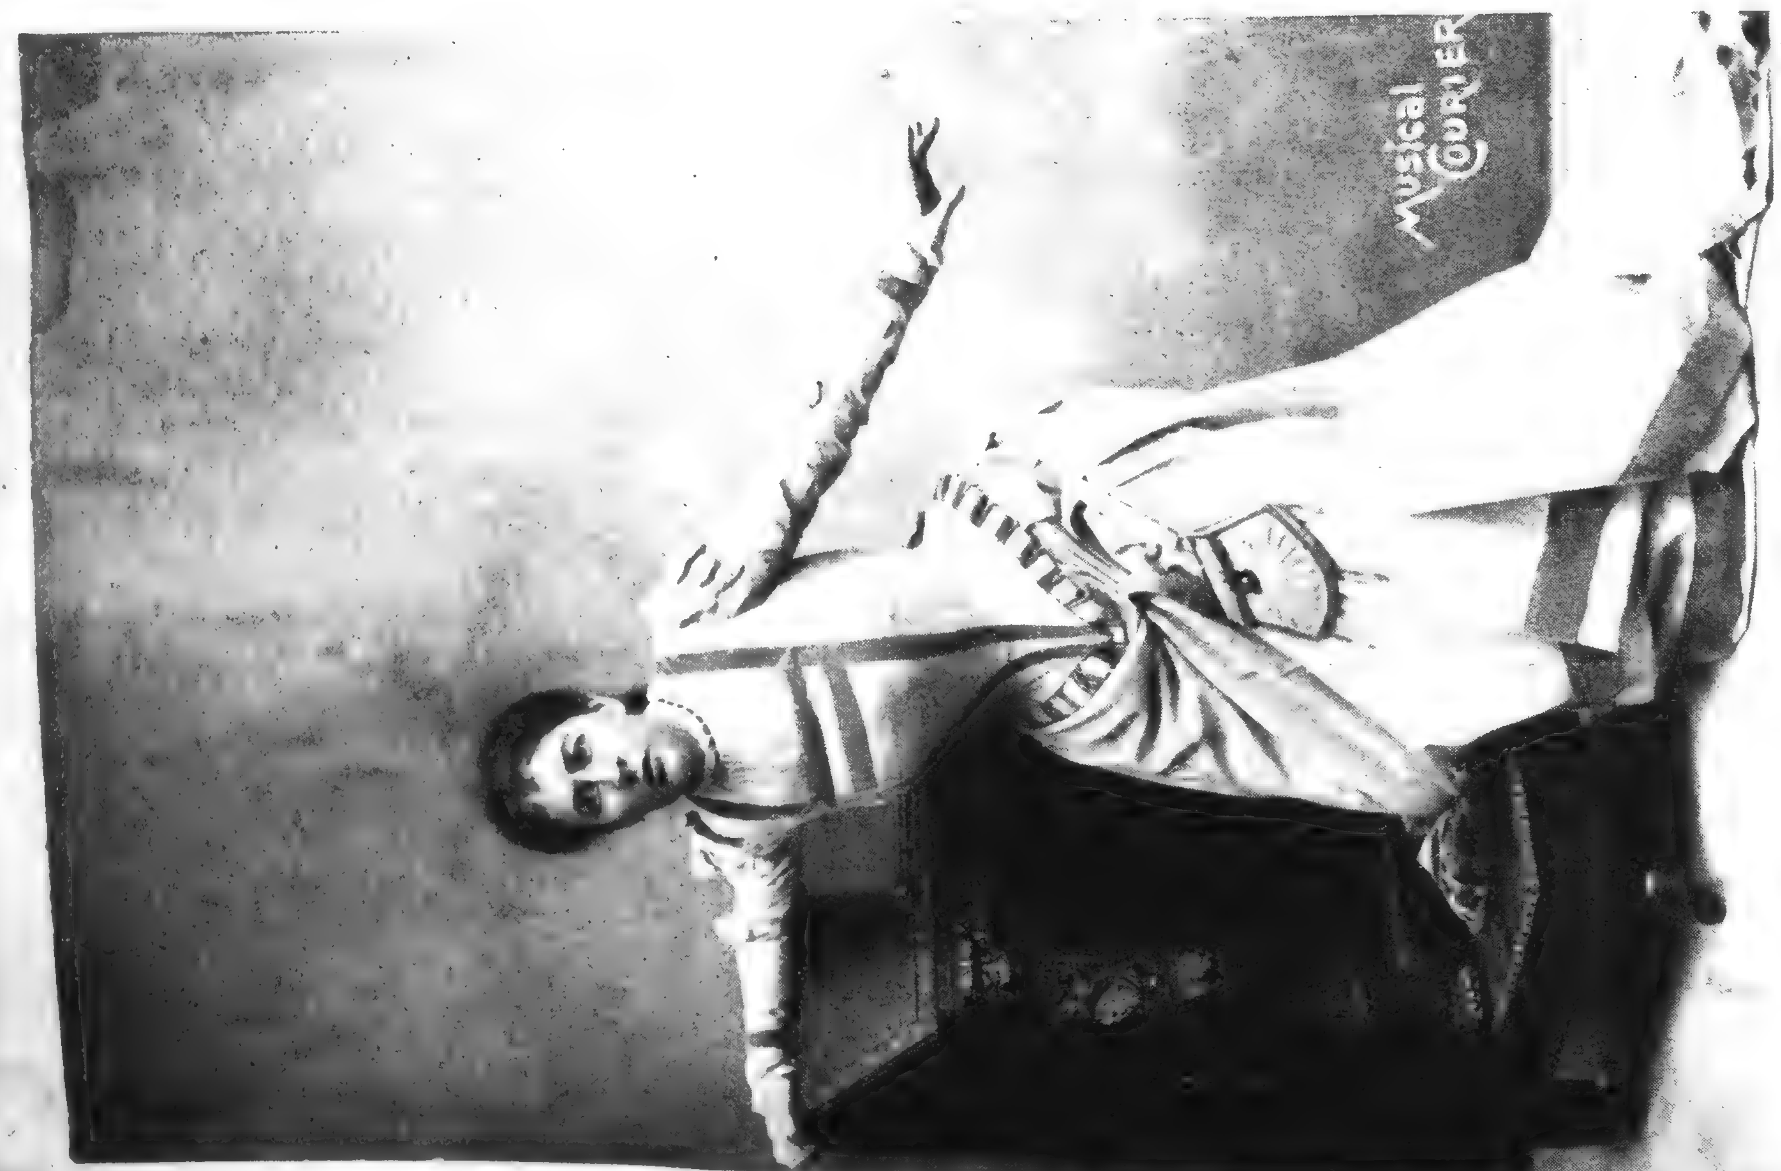
Musical Courier

EMMA ALBANI



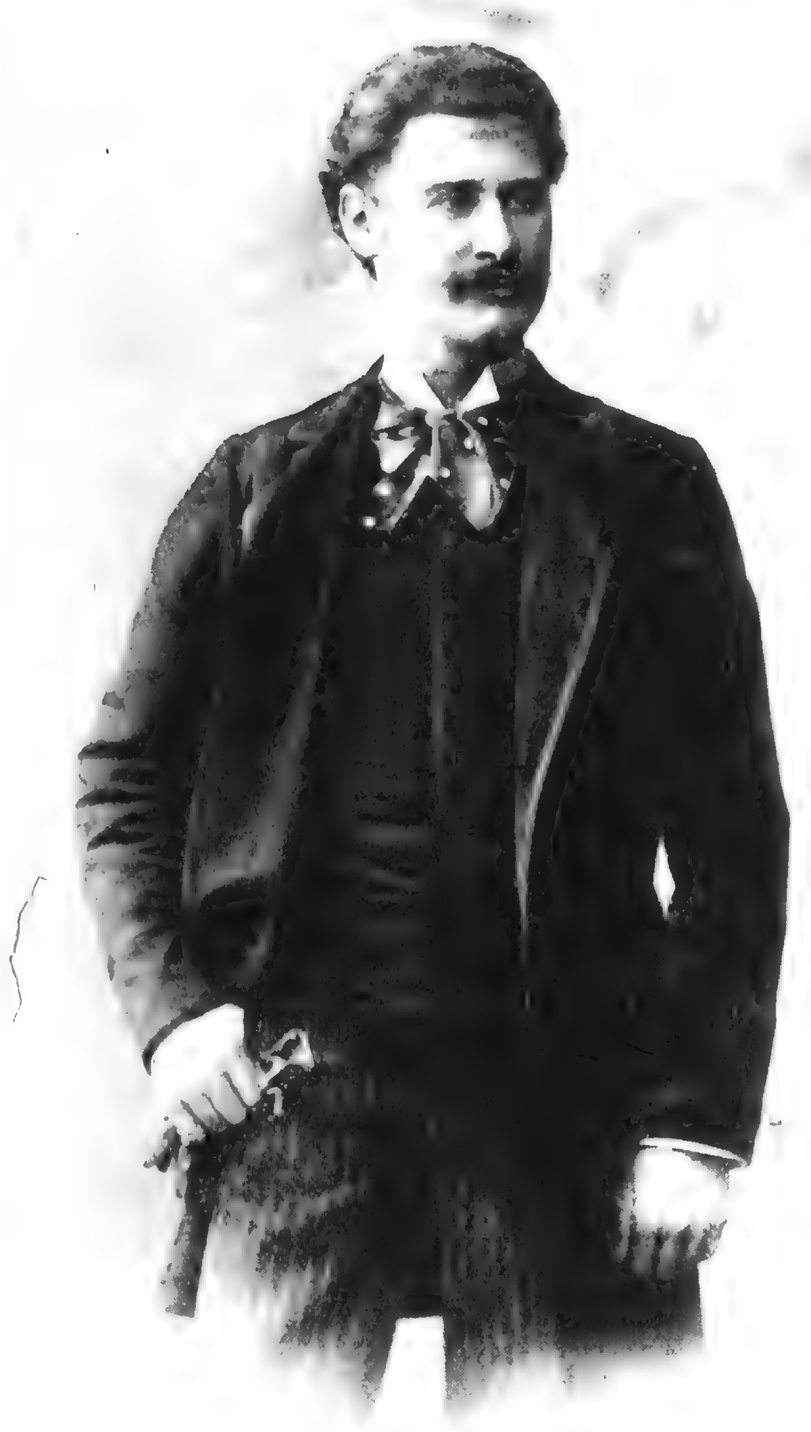
Musical Courier

MARIE VAN ZANDT

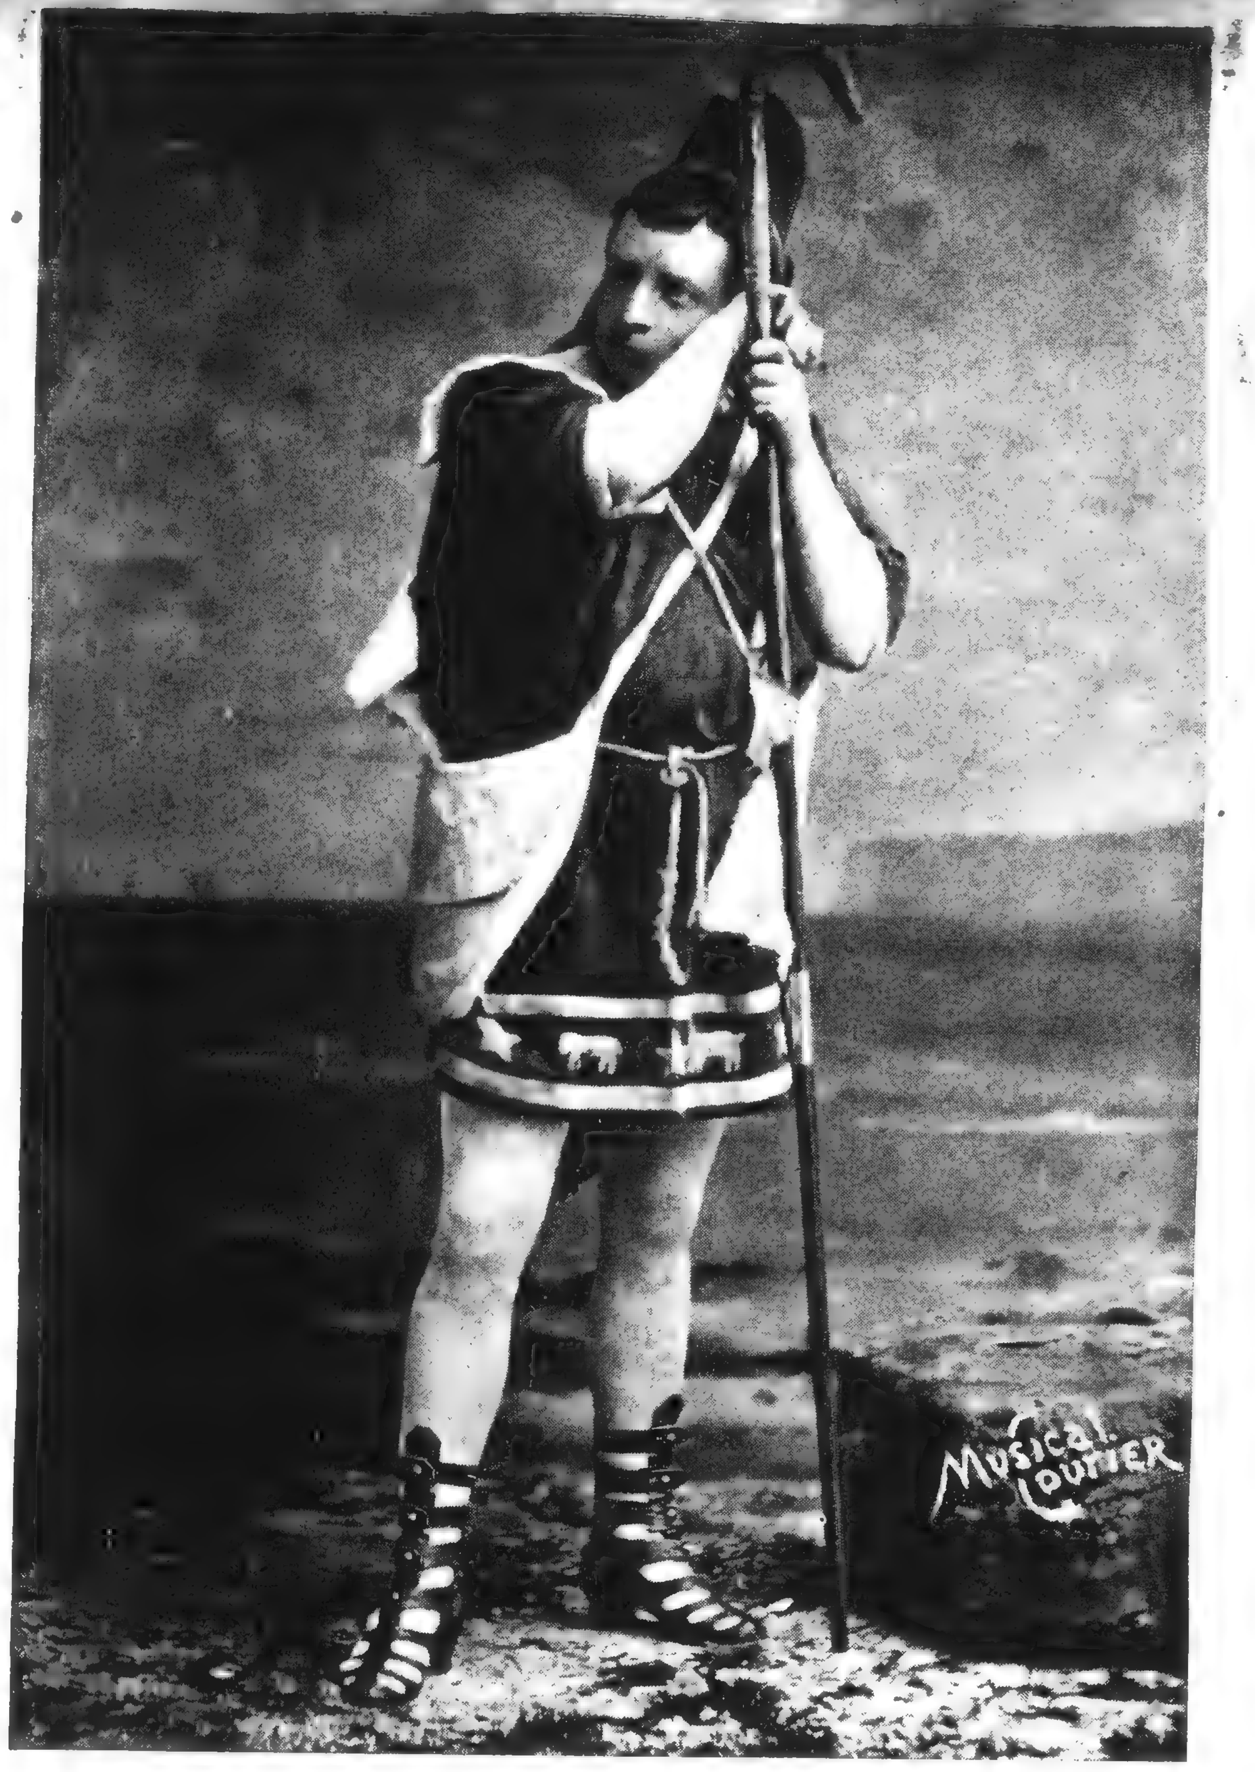


Musical Courier

EMMA EAMES

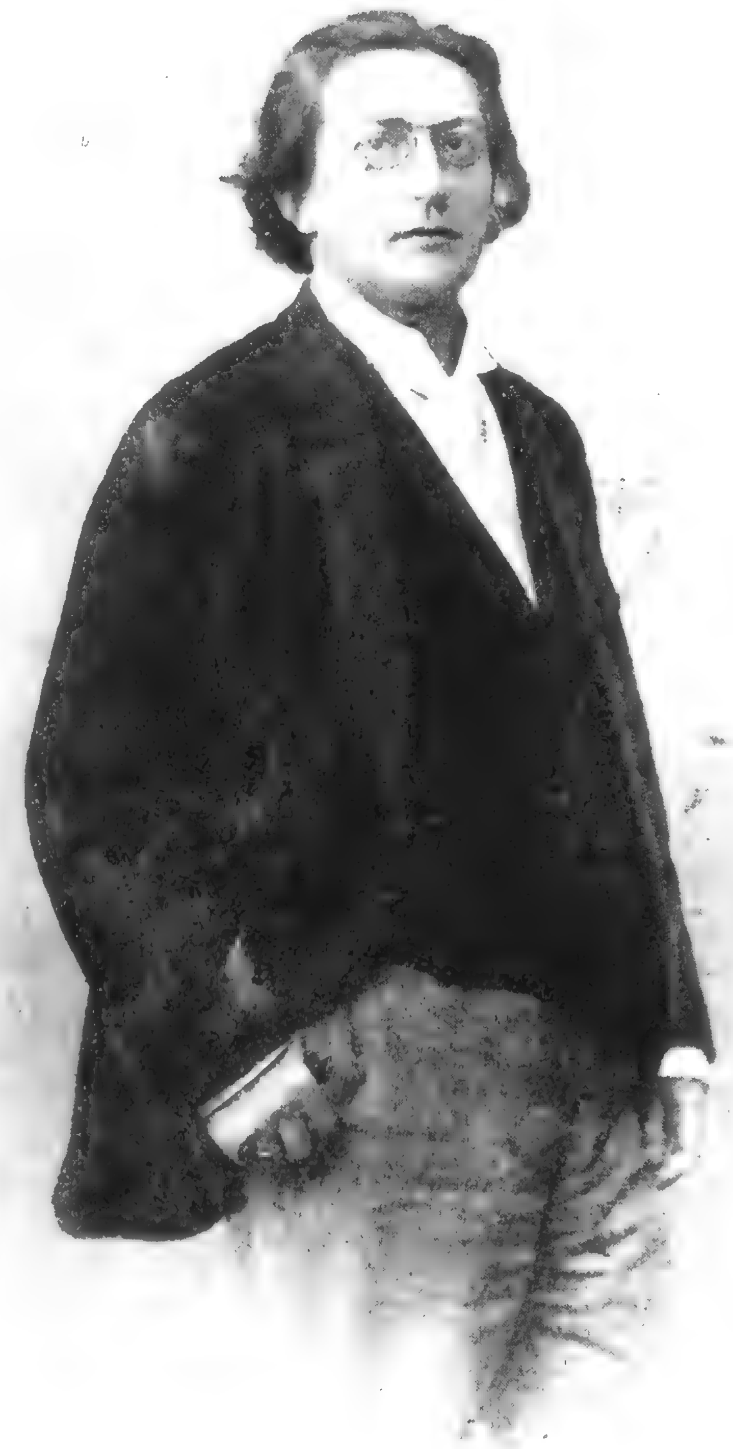


PAUL KALISCH

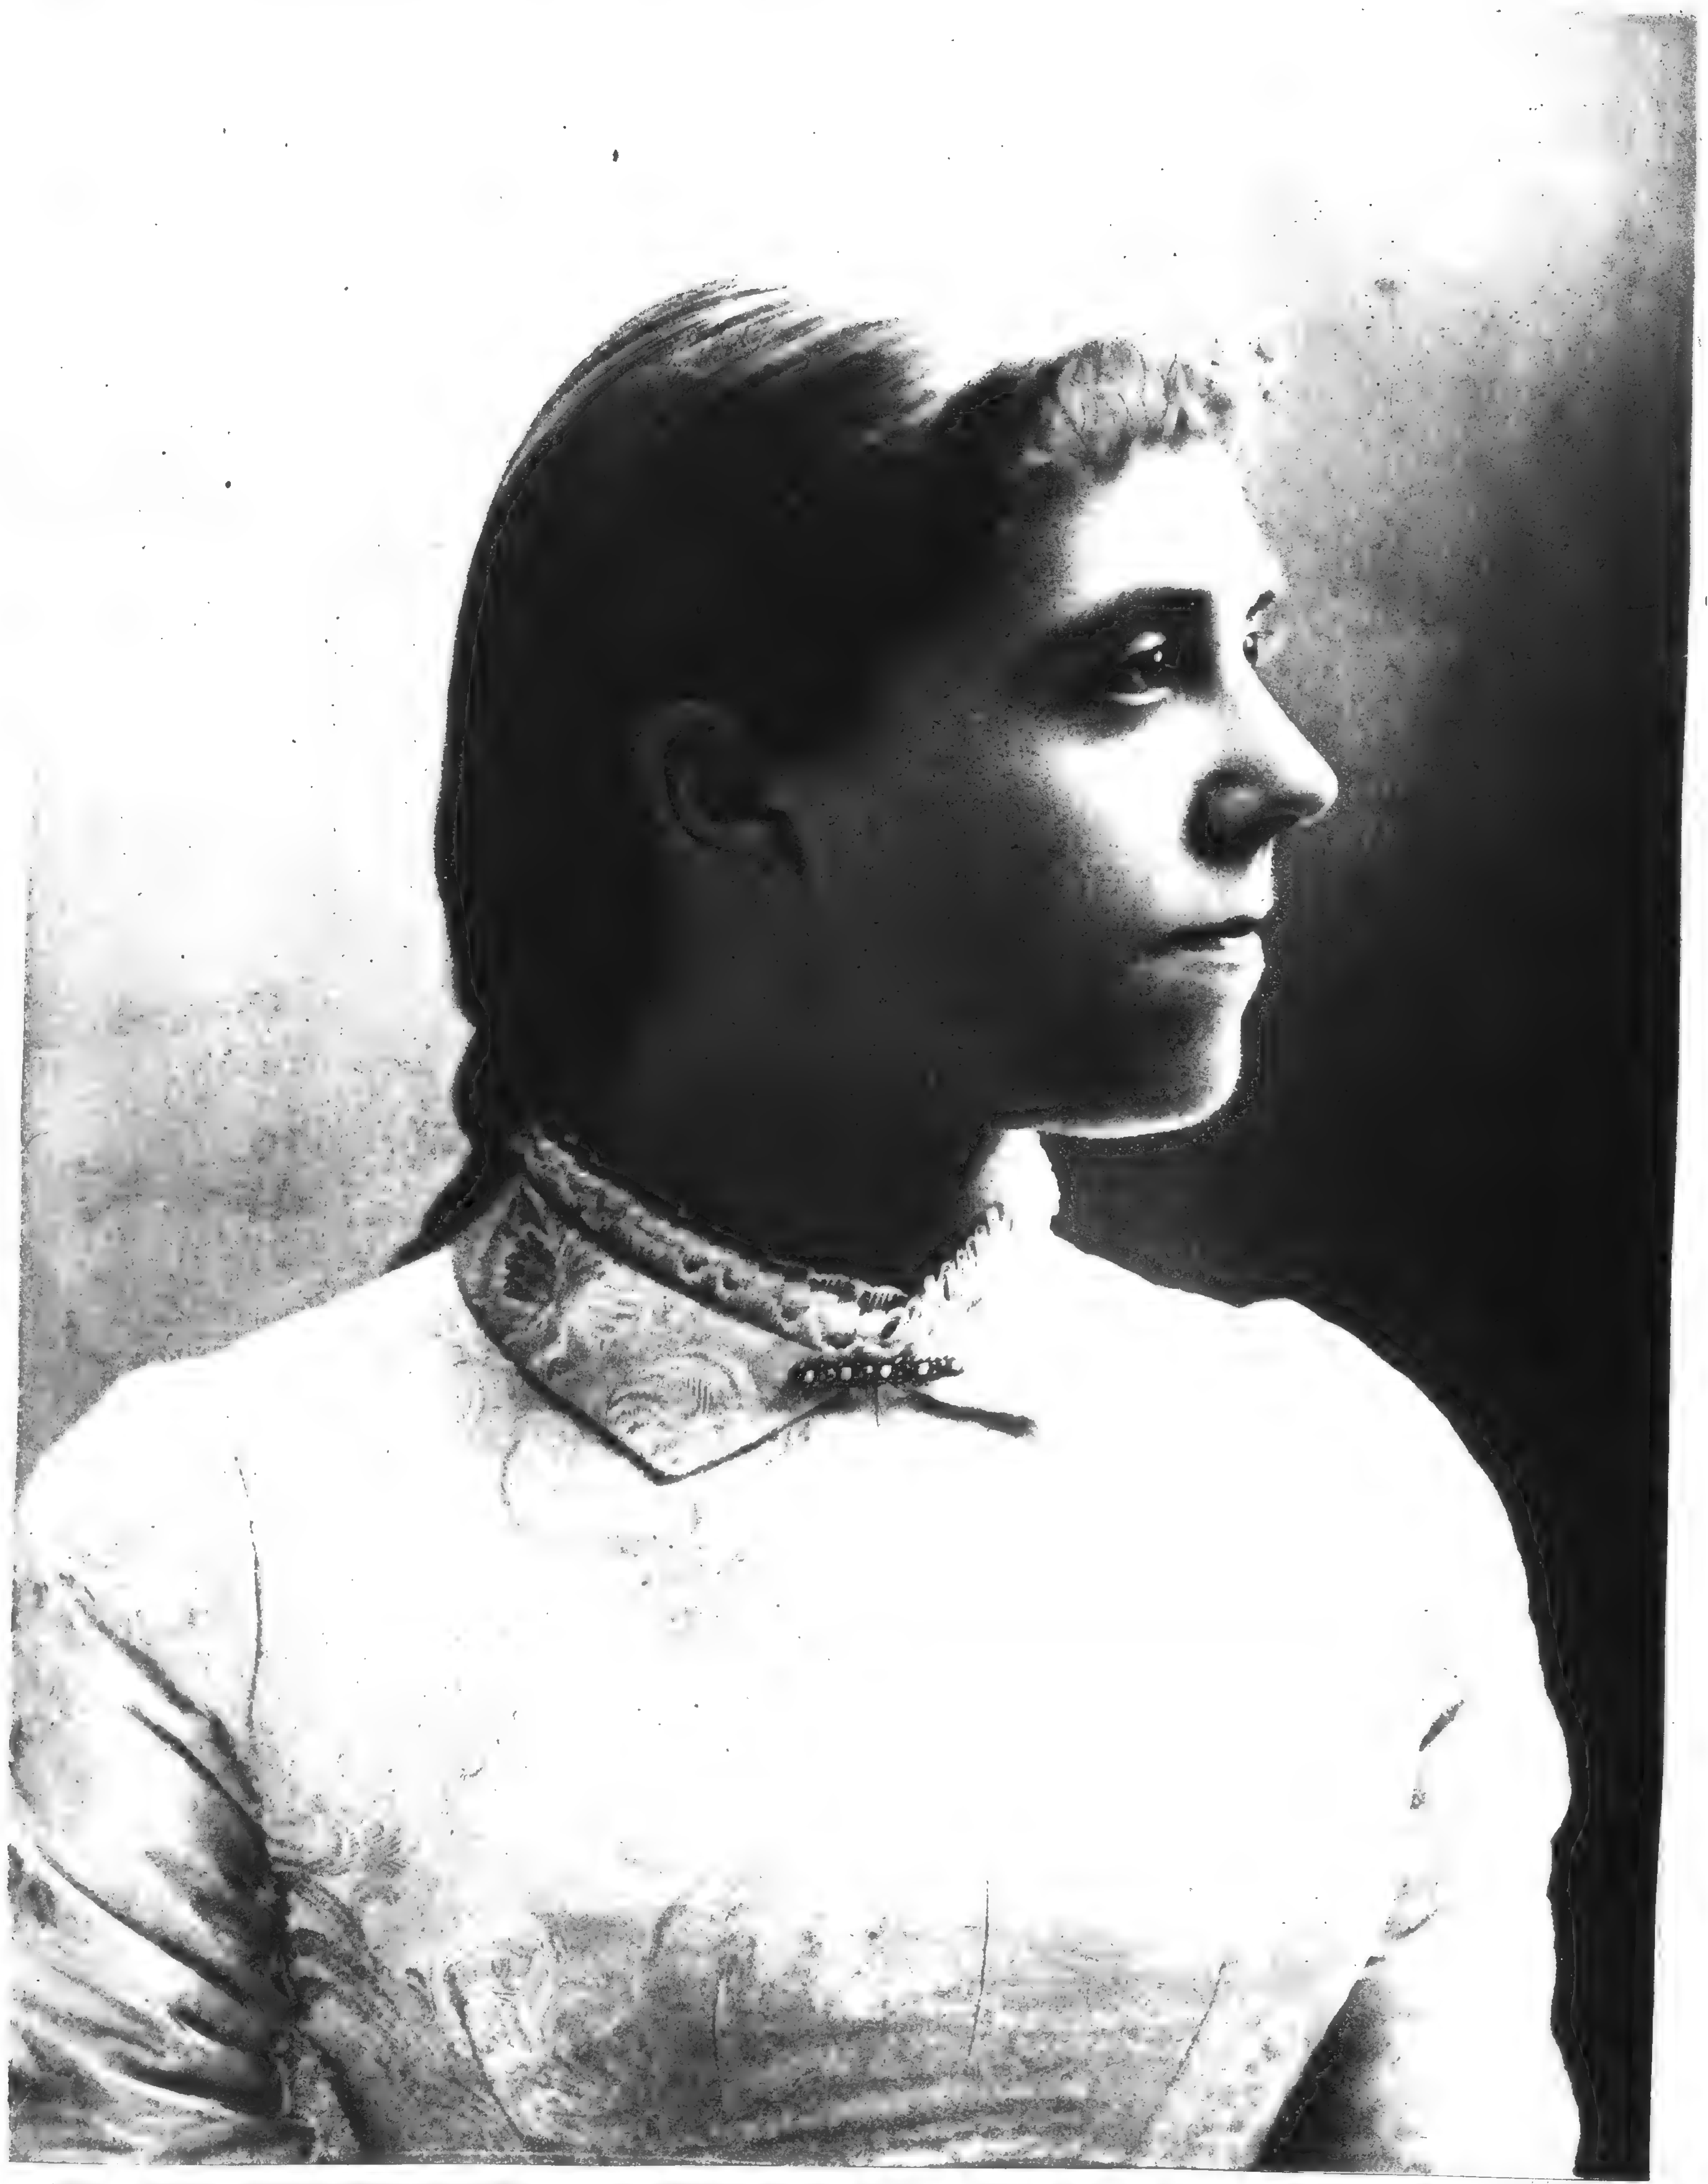


Musical Courier

VICTOR CAPOUL



ANTON SEIDL.



ADELE AUS DER OHE

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XC., NO. 172.
SATURDAY, DEC. 19, 1891.

MME. NORDICA IN GRAND OPERA.

She Scores a Great Success in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 18, 1891. The third week of the opera season at the Metropolitan Opera House was devoted to a production of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

For this performance Messrs. Abbey & Grau had assembled a noble company of artists, headed by Mme. Nordica, and including Mmes. Scalchi, Pettigiani and the De Reszke brothers. Mme. Scalchi was unable to appear, and her part was taken by a substitute.

Mme. Nordica especially distinguished herself by her fine singing and acting in the rôle of Valentine. In her solo numbers as well as in the great duet with Jean de Reszke, she aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and was repeatedly called before the curtain at the end of the second and third acts.

In superb Worth costumes she looked the part to perfection, and presented a charming stage picture. The audience was the largest of the season and represented the wealth and fashion of the metropolis.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, DEC. 19.

NORDICA WAS QUEEN.

Scored a Great Hit in Italian Opera at New York Last Night.

NEW YORK, Dec. 18.—Mme. Nordica's success in Italian opera in the production of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" by Abbey & Grau's company attracted the largest audience of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House tonight.

The cast was a notable one, including Nordica, Scalchi, Pettigiani and the brothers De Reszke.

In the role of Valentine, Mme. Nordica had fine opportunity for the display of her vocal and dramatic gifts, and scored an emphatic success. She sang and acted the part magnificently, and in her superb Worth costumes made a charming stage picture.

She was especially successful in her solo in the third act and in the great duet with Jean de Reszke. Both artists were repeatedly recalled.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

"In Memoriam. W. A. Mozart. Died December 5, 1791."

This was the inscription with which the programme of the ninth symphony rehearsal and concert was prefaced. In front of the conductor's stand, on a low pedestal, somewhat scantily decorated with laurel leaves, was placed a life size bust of the genius who has been well called the Raphael of Music. It is possible that this object of art was visible from the center balcony, and it is probable that the bust was the largest one that was available. The contrast, however, which if presented to the colossal statue of Beethoven that mentor like overlooks the orchestra from the rear of the stage, was decidedly startling, and must have aroused feelings antagonistic to those of reverence in the breasts of more than one of the audience. It must be confessed, too, that the construction of the programme was, considering the occasion. in a measure disappointing. It is true that nothing could have been chosen for the opening number which was better calculated to throw the vast audience into a thoroughly receptive mood than was the overture to the "Magic Flute"—beautiful and inspiriting as it always is. But the short, though impressive adagio, written for the Masonic funeral service, and the E flat symphony, typical as it is of the most delightful side of its composer's nature, failed to impart to this commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death the air of greatness one would have liked to associate with it. No doubt the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler deprived the audience of a performance which would have been wholly delightful. This unfortunate incident necessitated at the last moment the substitution of the funeral music for the Symphonic Concert for violin and viola, in which Mr. Kneisel, who has in times past shown what noble tones he could draw from the viola, was once more to be heard as a player of that instrument. This work, together with the greatest of all his symphonies, the "Jupiter," and the singing of a Lehmann, might have completed a programme which would indeed have been a worthy tribute to the memory of him whose music makes us forget care, whose life makes us heart sick.

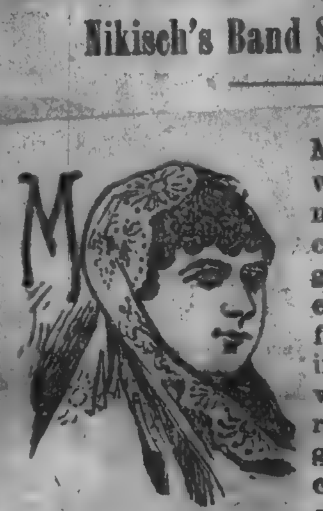
But, putting what might have been out of mind, the programme as it stood was productive of much enjoyment. The overture was played with an airiness, a delicacy and finish that were hardly surpassed by the orchestra, even when it was under the lead of its former master of detail. The funeral music was broadly and feelingly rendered, and in the symphony was heard some of the best playing of the season, notwithstanding a certain lack of virility in the tone produced by the strings, due to the absence of the two leading violin players. The work of the wood wind was especially good, and Messrs. Mole and Sautet were once more their old selves in purity of tone and beauty of phrasing.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the soloist, singing for her first number an aria from "Don Giovanni," and afterwards with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, the aria, "Dove Sono," from the "Marriage of Figaro." The first, Donna Anna's passionate entreaty to Don Ottavio to avenge her wrongs, Mme. Fursch-Madi sang with fire and true dramatic expressiveness, and the second was also artistically rendered. Her voice, however, was not wholly agreeable in quality, and it also at times was not under full control. This no doubt was partly owing to her recent illness. She was well received, and was heartily recalled after both numbers.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1891.

Mozart Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Fursch-Madi's Voice and Mr. Nikisch's Band Share Honors.



MME. FURSCH-MADI.

MME. FURSCH-MADI was the soloist at last night's symphony concert, and the programme consisted entirely of selections from Mozart's writings. The numbers were thoroughly representative of the genius of the great composer, as it included the overture to the "Magic Flute" and the "Masonic Funeral March," both compositions which the author himself esteemed almost as the best results of his greatest efforts.

The "Overture" does not lend itself to any particular display of great originality in interpretation or any striking skill in its execution, but Mr. Nikisch managed to enhance it with a vivacity in tempo and delicacy of tone which, in effect, almost reached the dignity of grandeur.

The concerto for the viola and flute which was to be played was abandoned, owing to the illness of Kneisel and Loefler; instead the funeral march was given. It was played with all the charm and exquisite harmony to which it is susceptible, and Mr. Nikish, in his interpretation of it, displayed the exquisite symmetry in conception of the whole which make the carefulness of technique indispensable to the beautiful effect.

As the solemn chord rose and fell, occasionally swelling to sonorous diapason and gradually dropping off into the pathos of the minor, the effect was beautiful in its grand, almost majestic sombreness. The impression on the audience was most effective. Several seconds passed before anybody stirred, and even when the applause came the effect was as if they were given by people who were still thoughtfully watching the painful sounds of the abrupt finale, as if they were still listening to the harsh sound of the lowering of the coffin.

But it was the andante in Mozart's symphony in E flat in which the orchestra showed itself at its best, and which produced the most pleasing effect on the audience.

It was played with exquisite grace in movement, and the spontaneity of sound, the shadowy blending of notes, made the impression of the whole appear as that of a streaming, alluring harmony, pregnant with feeling and sentiment. Mr. Nikisch's leading was bold, striking and original, and in this instance he appeared more intent, more watchful, as is usually the case when he is conscious of a particular effort.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, the soloist, was in excellent condition last night. She sang an aria from "Don Giovanni" with splendid effect. Her voice, which is capable of beautiful modulation, was clear, soft and expressive. She almost rose to the dignity of passion when, in the last lines of her song, she urges the revenge of her father's murder. The theme of her song lends itself to great dramatic interpretation, to which she did more than justice. She displayed the greatness of her talent when a few minutes afterwards she sang "Dove Sono," an aria from "Marriage of Figaro."

The contrast from passionate declamation to mournful misgiving, from urgent appeal to wavering regret and disgust at having to adopt a subterfuge in order to win back her love—the theme of her second song—gave her an excellent opportunity for displaying the charming modulations to which her voice is susceptible to an attentive and appreciative audience.

PROVIDENCE JOU
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

THE THIRD CONCERT.

Artistic Triumph of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

When conductor Nikisch lifted his graceful wand over his remarkably accomplished company of musicians last evening Infantry Hall held an audience bix in size and large in musical intelligence. The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and its equally distinguished leader are entitled to and receive profound consideration from the most cultivated and enlightenen citizens wherever they appear, and last evening's illustration of the esteem in which the grand organization is held in this city must have been gratfying to everyone. Certain it is that the orchestra has not given a more satisfying and enjoyable presentation of some of the best things in music this season. The large body of players moved with almost the precision and accuracy of one man, making music rarely equalled in this city. The eminent soloist, Miss Clementine de Vere, shared largely in the artistic success of the evening. The programme of this third concert in the series was as follows:

Beethoven..............Symphony in A, No. 7
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.
Ambroise Thomas..Mad Scene from "Hamlet"
Bach..
..Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for Strings
Arranged by Bachrich.
Dvorak..........................Aria, "Ludmilla"
Svendsen........Episode, "Carnival in Paris"

The orchestra seemed to thoroughly enter into the spirit of the different selections, and effectively conveyed the ideas and thoughts of the music. The symphony, which led the programme, gave great scope for the exhibition of Mr. Nikisch's powers as an interpreter, and his orchestra as an exponent of his thoughts. There were times in the first movement when the enunciation of the different instruments was sacrificed to the musical idea, which Mr. Nikisch wished to expound, but these slight deteriorations from the regular path can be allowed in view of the musical whole. This first movement is probably the most difficult of interpretation of any of Beethoven's symphony, and certainly the most interesting. The second movement was listened to with probably double the interest which it otherwise would have excited, because of the fact that it was given by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last Friday evening. It was taken by Mr. Nikisch a trifle quicker in tempo, and played with that subtle combining and melting of one part into another that the infant orchestra has not yet attained, and on that account the effect was probably rather more telling. The great confidence with which this orchestra inspires its audience was more than ever noticeable last evening. The third movement was perfectly rendered, and as an exhibition of finished ensemble work it could not be excelled. The selection from Bach for string orchestra was given in a noble and refined style, indeed. Bach can be presented in no other way to be in any degree appreciated. It abounds in beautiful combinations of dark and light shadings, such as only that great master of church music understands. This was one of the particularly enjoyable numbers. The "Carnival in Paris" made a brilliant ending to a brilliant programme. It is capricious in the extreme, and gave every man his full share of work. It is full of syncopation, which renders it hard rhythmically, and was performed almost flawlessly. Miss de Vere's voice is not a surprise to Providence musical patrons, as it has been heard here before in concert, but it certainly rendered one almost breathless at times, because of the heights which she attained with it. Her vocal efforts were marvelous and such as one hears but infrequently. Her voice has been excellently schooled, and that enables her to make more of an effect with her lower notes than she otherwise could. Were one tempted to wish for a little more "soul" in Duorak's "Aria," the wish was lost sight of in view of the thoroughly artistic manner of its rendering. The "Mad Scene from Hamlet" is composed largely of difficult colleraturave passages, which Miss de Vere overcame with remarakble ease. Mr. Nikisch's complete repose and confidence was particularly noticeable last evening. Although he had the notes to the Symphony before him, he never turned a page until he came to the end of a movement. He was conducting from memory, thereby showing how completely at home he is with the most difficult task ever given an orchestra to perform. One must bear in mind that knowing a symphony or concert by heart does not mean simply that the notes must be committed to memory, but every instrument, and its place for entering or leaving the general ensemble, must be known as well. Such a tax in its apparently easy accomplishment on this occasion was one of the features of this great concert.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

BRILLIANT CONCERT

By the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

Miss De Vere Sang as Never Before in This City.

The Boston Symphony orchestra left town last night, taking with it the warmly expressed regard of one of the largest and finest audiences it has appeared before in Providence this year. The concert it gave at Infantry hall was not only surpassingly brilliant in point of program selections but exceedingly enjoyable from first to last—more so, perhaps, than any previous exhibition this body of accomplished musicians has locally made. The orchestra played with dash and vigor that are not always characteristic of its work. An endeavor to give a finished effect to each number was evident, especially in Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

The symphony was the work par excellence. Whatever it is intended to portray, whether a battle or a carousal, this melodious production is most gorgeously inlaid with instrumental gems. The third movement, where the violins lead off in delicious strains and gradually the other instruments join till the whole orchestra is employed in one bewildering crash, and the last movement unquestionably suggests revelry as much as they do anything else, though the interpretation may be somewhat distasteful to the classically inclined.

The orchestra put a regular Griecke glass and smoothness on its tone, and in the light, fantastic measures of the dance reached what certainly was as near the acme of excellence as could be expected.

Bach's movement for string instruments was just moderate enough to tone down the exhilaration awakened by the gay Symphony. The last orchestral number was the "Carnival in Paris," of Svendsen. The success with which ingenious effects were incorporated proved that Svendsen was no stranger to the art of utilizing the utmost resources of a band equipped from every possible musical variation.

Miss De Vere was the soloist, and it was the general opinion that she never sang so well here. Her rendering of the mad scene from "Hamlet" was admirable. Such modulations, runs, trills and crescendos it seemed as if none but a Patti could so gracefully and brilliantly execute. An authority of the highest standing declared after the concert that a "grander song" Providence will not hear, unless Miss De Vere is able to outdo herself. She was three times recalled. Her second selection was the aria "Ludmilla" by Dvorak.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death, was devoted wholly to music by the master, and was delightful from beginning to end. Notwithstanding the many great musicians who have written since that sad December night, when all that was mortal of the still young composer was thrust into a pauper's grave, without a mourner by to pay it the last honors, Mozart remains indisputably the greatest genius that the art of music has known among its followers. A century after his death his music is as fresh, as beautiful and as fascinating in the hearing as ever. How many of the so called great ones of our time, in which there is a tendency to pronounce him, passé, will be heard one hundred years hence? The overture to "The Magic Flute" with which the concert opened still stands foremost among the greatest of all works in its kind, and in its way it has never been approached. So with the great E-flat symphony, with which the concert ended. There has been more majestic and more pretentious music, more elaborately wrought music, more romantic, and even more philosophic music, but there never has been purer music, never music in which exquisite grace and profound learning have been so wonderfully mingled, or which appeals more directly to the gentler emotions with such irresistible power. The pleasure in hearing it was intensified by the admirable readings that were given to the programme throughout, and by the smoothness, precision and sympathetic sentiment that characterized the work of the orchestra. It was, on the whole, the best concert of the current symphony season thus far, and was honorable to all concerned in it. It is to be regretted that the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler made it necessary to omit the promised concerto for violin and viola. The Masonic Funeral Music that was substituted for it was the only weak point in the concert. It is not a good example of the master, and its monotonous tonality makes it somewhat tiresome in the hearing, despite the richness of the orchestral color. Madame Fursch-Madi sang the recitative and air, "Or sai chi l'Onore," from "Don Giovanni," with fine dramatic force, declaiming the recitative with masterly impressiveness, and singing the impassioned air with dignity and brilliancy in effect. Later in the evening she gave "Dove Sono," from "Figaro," and in the recitative again illustrated her mastery of the purely dramatic style. She was less felicitous in the aria which was sung somewhat coldly and stiffly. The artist was cordially received and was recalled heartily after each effort. The selections for the next concert are: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel, (first time); Prelude "Parsifal," Wagner; and Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein. There will be no soloist.

[79]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XC., NO. 172.
SATURDAY. DEC. 19. 1891.

MME. NORDICA IN GRAND OPERA.

She Scores a Great Success in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 18, 1891. The third night of the opera season at the Metropolitan Opera House was devoted to a production of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

For this performance Messrs. Abbey & Grau had assembled a noble company of artists, headed by Mme. Nordica, and including Mmes. Scalchi, Pettigiani and the Deveszk brothers. Mme. Scalchi was unable to appear, and her part was taken by a substitute.

Mme. Nordica especially distinguished herself by her fine singing and acting in the role of Valentine. In her solo numbers, as well as in the great duet with Jean Deveszk, she aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and was repeatedly called before the curtain at the end of the second and third acts.

In superb Worth costumes she looked the part to perfection, and presented a charming stage picture. The audience was the largest of the season and represented the wealth and fashion of the metropolis.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

"In Memoriam. W. A. Mozart. Died December 5, 1791."

This was the inscription with which the programme of the ninth symphony rehearsal and concert was prefaced. In front of the conductor's stand, on a low pedestal, somewhat scantily decorated with laurel leaves, was placed a life size bust of the genius who has been well called the Raphael of Music. It is possible that this object of art was visible from the center balcony, and it is probable that the bust was the largest one that was available. The contrast, however, which if presented to the colossal statue of Beethoven that mentor like overlooks the orchestra from the rear of the stage, was decidedly startling, and must have aroused feelings antagonistic to those of reverence in the breasts of more than one of the audience. It must be confessed, too, that the construction of the programme was, considering the occasion, in a measure disappointing. It is true that nothing could have been chosen for the opening number which was better calculated to throw the vast audience into a thoroughly receptive mood than was the overture to the "Magic Flute"—beautiful and inspiriting as it always is. But the short, though impressive adagio, written for the Masonic funeral service, and the E flat symphony, typical as it is of the most delightful side of its composer's nature, failed to impart to this commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death the air of greatness one would have liked to associate with it. No doubt the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler deprived the audience of a performance which would have been wholly delightful. This unfortunate incident necessitated at the last moment the substitution of the funeral music for the Symphonic Concert for violin and viola, in which Mr. Kneisel, who has in times past shown what noble tones he could draw from the viola, was once more to be heard as a player of that instrument. This work, together with the greatest of all his symphonies, the "Jupiter," and the singing of a Lehmann, might have completed a programme which would indeed have been a worthy tribute to the memory of him whose music makes us forget care, whose life makes us heart sick.

But, putting what might have been out of mind, the programme as it stood was productive of much enjoyment. The overture was played with an airiness, a delicacy and finish that were hardly surpassed by the orchestra, even when it was under the lead of its former master of detail. The funeral music was broadly and feelingly rendered, and in the symphony was heard some of the best playing of the season, notwithstanding a certain lack of virility in the tone produced by the strings, due to the absence of the two leading violin players. The work of the wood wind was especially good, and Messrs. Mole and Sautet were once more their old selves in purity of tone and beauty of phrasing.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the soloist, singing for her first number an aria from "Don Giovanni," and afterwards with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, the aria, "Dove Sono," from the "Marriage of Figaro." The first, Donna Anna's passionate entreaty to Don Ottavio to avenge her wrongs, Mme. Fursch-Madi sang with fire and true dramatic expressiveness, and the second was also artistically rendered. Her voice, however, was not wholly agreeable in quality, and it also at times was not under full control. This no doubt was partly owing to her recent illness. She was well received, and was heartily recalled after both numbers.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, DEC. 19.

NORDICA WAS QUEEN.

Scored a Great Hit in Italian Opera at New York Last Night.

NEW YORK, Dec. 18.—Mme. Nordica's success in Italian opera in the production of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" by Abbey & Grau's company attracted the largest audience of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House tonight.

The cast was a notable one, including Nordica, Scalchi, Pettigiani and the brothers De Reszke.

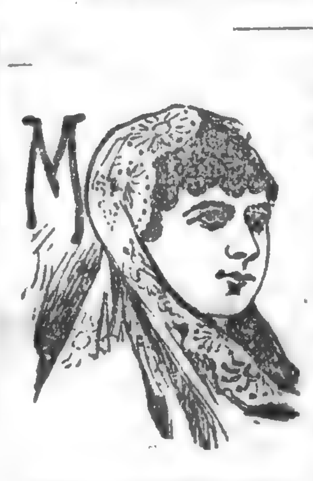
In the role of Valentine, Mme. Nordica had fine opportunity for the display of her vocal and dramatic gifts, and scored an emphatic success. She sang and acted the part magnificently, and in her superb Worth costumes made a charming stage picture.

She was especially successful in her solo in the third act and in the great duet with Jean de Reszke. Both artists were repeatedly recalled.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1891.

Mozart Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Fursch-Madi's Voice and Mr. Nikisch's Band Share Honors.



MME. FURSCHMADI.

MME. FURSCH-MADI was the soloist at last night's symphony concert, and the programme consisted entirely of selections from Mozart's writings. The numbers were thoroughly representative of the genius of the great composer, as it included the overture to the "Magic Flute" and the "Masonic Funeral March," both compositions which the author himself esteemed almost as the best results of his greatest efforts.

The "Overture" does not lend itself to any particular display of great originality in interpretation or any striking skill in its execution, but Mr. Nikisch managed to enhance it with a vivacity in tempo and delicacy of tone which, in effect, almost reached the dignity of grandeur.

The concerto for the viola and flute which was to be played was abandoned, owing to the illness of Kneisel and Loefler; instead the funeral march was given. It was played with all the charm and exquisite harmony to which it is susceptible, and Mr. Nikish, in his interpretation of it, displayed the exquisite symmetry in conception of the whole which make the carefulness of technique indispensable to the beautiful effect.

As the solemn chord rose and fell, occasionally swelling to sonorous diapason and gradually dropping off into the pathos of the minor, the effect was beautiful in its grand, almost majestic sombreness. The impression on the audience was most effective. Several seconds passed before anybody stirred, and even when the applause came the effect was as if they were given by people who were still thoughtfully watching the painful sounds of the abrupt finale, as if they were still listening to the harsh sound of the lowering of the coffin.

But it was the andante in Mozart's symphony in E flat in which the orchestra showed itself at its best, and which produced the most pleasing effect on the audience.

It was played with exquisite grace in movement, and the spontaneity of sound, the shadowy blending of notes, made the impression of the whole appear as that of a streaming, alluring harmony, pregnant with feeling and sentiment. Mr. Nikisch's leading was bold, striking and original, and in this instance he appeared more intent, more watchful, as is usually the case when he is conscious of a particular effort.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, the soloist, was in excellent condition last night. She sang an aria from "Don Giovanni" with splendid effect. Her voice, which is capable of beautiful modulation, was clear, soft and expressive. She almost rose to the dignity of passion when, in the last lines of her song, she urges the revenge of her father's murder. The theme of her song lends itself to great dramatic interpretation, to which she did more than justice. She displayed the greatness of her talent when a few minutes afterwards she sang "Dovo Sono," an aria from "Marriage of Figaro."

The contrast from passionate declamation to mournful misgiving, from urgent appeal to wavering regret and disgust at having to adopt a subterfuge in order to win back her love—the theme of her second song—gave her an excellent opportunity for displaying the charming modulations to which her voice is susceptible to an attentive and appreciative audience.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

THE THIRD CONCERT.

Artistic Triumph of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall.

When conductor Nikisch lifted his graceful wand over his remarkably accomplished company of musicians last evening Infantry Hall held an audience bix in size and large in musical intelligence. The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and its equally distinguished leader are entitled to and receive profound consideration from the most cultivated and enlightenen citizens wherever they appear, and last evening's illustration of the esteem in which the grand organization is held in this city must have been gratfying to everyone. Certain it is that the orchestra has not given a more satisfying and enjoyable presentation of some of the best things in music this season. The large body of players moved with almost the precision and accuracy of one man, making music rarely equalled in this city. The eminent soloist, Miss Clementine de Vere, shared largely in the artistic success of the evening. The programme of this third concert in the series was as follows:

Beethoven..............Symphony in A, No. 7
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.
Ambroise Thomas..Mad Scene from "Hamlet"
Bach......................................
..Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for Strings
Arranged by Bachrich.
Dvorak........................Aria, "Ludmilla"
Svendsen........Episode, "Carnival in Paris"

The orchestra seemed to thoroughly enter into the spirit of the different selections, and effectively conveyed the ideas and thoughts of the music. The symphony, which led the programme, gave great scope for the exhibition of Mr. Nikisch's powers as an interpreter, and his orchestra as an exponent of his thoughts. There were times in the first movement when the enunciation of the different instruments was sacrificed to the musical idea, which Mr. Nikisch wished to expound, but these slight deteriorations from the regular path can be allowed in view of the musical whole. This first movement is probably the most difficult of interpretation of any of Beethoven's symphony, and certainly the most interesting. The second movement was listened to with probably double the interest which it otherwise would have excited, because of the fact that it was given by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last Friday evening. It was taken by Mr. Nikisch a trifle quicker in tempo, and played with that subtle combining and melting of one part into another that the infant orchestra has not yet attained, and on that account the effect was probably rather more telling. The great confidence with which this orchestra inspires its audience was more than ever noticeable last evening. The third movement was perfectly rendered, and as an exhibition of finished ensemble work it could not be excelled. The selection from Bach for string orchestra was given in a noble and refined style, indeed. Bach can be presented in no other way to be in any degree appreciated. It abounds in beautiful combinations of dark and light shadings, such as only that great master of church music understands. This was one of the particularly enjoyable numbers. The "Carnival in Paris" made a brilliant ending to a brilliant programme. It is capricious in the extreme, and gave every man his full share of work. It is full of syncopation, which renders it hard rhythmically, and was performed almost flawlessly. Miss de Vere's voice is not a surprise to Providence musical patrons, as it has been heard here before in concert, but it certainly rendered one almost breathless at times, because of the heights which she attained with it. Her vocal efforts were marvelous and such as one hears but infrequently. Her voice has been excellently schooled, and that enables her to make more of an effect with her lower notes than she otherwise could. Were one tempted to wish for a little more "soul" in Duorak's "Aria," the wish was lost sight of in view of the thoroughly artistic manner of its rendering. The "Mad Scene from Hamlet" is composed largely of difficult colleraturave passages, which Miss de Vere overcame with remarakble ease. Mr. Nikisch's complete repose and confidence was particularly noticeable last evening. Although he had the notes to the Symphony before him, he never turned a page until he came to the end of a movement. He was conducting from memory, thereby showing how completely at home he is with the most difficult task ever given an orchestra to perform. One must bear in mind that knowing a symphony or concert by heart, does not mean simply that the notes must be committed to memory, but every instrument, and its place for entering or leaving the general ensemble, must be known as well. Such a tax in its apparently easy accomplishment on this occasion was one of the features of this great concert.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1891.

BRILLIANT CONCERT

By the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

Miss De Vere Sang as Never Before in This City.

The Boston Symphony orchestra left town last night, taking with it the warmly expressed regard of one of the largest and finest audiences it has appeared before in Providence this year. The concert it gave at Infantry hall was not only surpassingly brilliant in point of program selections but exceedingly enjoyable from first to last—more so, perhaps, than any previous exhibition this body of accomplished musicians has locally made. The orchestra played with dash and vigor that are not always characteristic of its work. An endeavor to give a finished effect to each number was evident, especially in Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

The symphony was the work par excellence. Whatever it is intended to portray, whether a battle or a carousal, this melodious production is most gorgeously inlaid with instrumental gems. The third movement, where the violins lead off in delicious strains and gradually the other instruments join till the whole orchestra is employed in one bewildering crash, and the last movement unquestionably suggests revelry as much as they do anything else, though the interpretation may be somewhat distasteful to the classically inclined.

The orchestra put a regular Griecke glass and smoothness on its tone, and in the light, fantastic measures of the dance reached what certainly was as near the acme of excellence as could be expected.

Bach's movement for string instruments was just moderate enough to tone down the exhilaration awakened by the gay Symphony. The last orchestral number was the "Carnival in Paris," of Svendsen. The success with which ingenious effects were incorporated proved that Svendsen was no stranger to the art of utilizing the utmost resources of a band equipped from every possible musical variation.

Miss De Vere was the soloist, and it was the general opinion that she never sang so well here. Her rendering of the mad scene from "Hamlet" was admirable. Such modulations, runs, trills and crescendos it seemed as if none but a Patti could so gracefully and brilliantly execute. An authority of the highest standing declared after the concert that a "grander song" Providence will not hear, unless Miss De Vere is able to outdo herself. She was three times recalled. Her second selection was the aria "Ludmilla" by Dvorak.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death, was devoted wholly to music by the master, and was delightful from beginning to end. Notwithstanding the many great musicians who have written since that sad December night, when all that was mortal of the still young composer was thrust into a pauper's grave, without a mourner by to pay it the last honors, Mozart remains indisputably the greatest genius that the art of music has known among its followers. A century after his death his music is as fresh, as beautiful and as fascinating in the hearing as ever. How many of the so called great ones of our time, in which there is a tendency to pronounce him, passé, will be heard one hundred years hence? The overture to "The Magic Flute" with which the concert opened still stands foremost among the greatest of all works in its kind, and in its way it has never been approached. So with the great E-flat symphony, with which the concert ended. There has been more majestic and more pretentious music, more elaborately wrought music, more romantic, and even more philosophic music, but there never has been purer music, never music in which exquisite grace and profound learning have been so wonderfully mingled, or which appeals more directly to the gentler emotions with such irresistible power. The pleasure in hearing it was intensified by the admirable readings that were given to the programme throughout, and by the smoothness, precision and sympathetic sentiment that characterized the work of the orchestra. It was, on the whole, the best concert of the current symphony season thus far, and was honorable to all concerned in it. It is to be regretted that the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler made it necessary to omit the promised concerto for violin and viola. The Masonic Funeral Music that was substituted for it was the only weak point in the concert. It is not a good example of the master, and its monotonous tonality makes it somewhat tiresome in the hearing, despite the richness of the orchestral color. Madame Fursch-Madi sang the recitative and air, "Or sai chi l'Onore," from "Don Giovanni," with fine dramatic force, declaiming the recitative with masterly impressiveness, and singing the impassioned air with dignity and brilliancy in effect. Later in the evening she gave "Dove Sono," from "Figaro," and in the recitative again illustrated her mastery of the purely dramatic style. She was less felicitous in the aria which was sung somewhat coldly and stiffly. The artist was cordially received and was recalled heartily after each effort. The selections for the next concert are: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel, (first time); Prelude "Parsifal," Wagner; and Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein. There will be no soloist.

[79]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Our young Lochinvars have come out of the Southwest, and brought plenty of laurels with them, for in every city the praises have been of the most extravagant sort. Our orchestra is still acknowledged to be the best cisatlantic one, by the reviewers of the outlying districts. Saturday's programme was devoted to the memory of Mozart's death; one would have expected this commemoration at the concert of Dec. 5, which was exactly the centennial of that sad event, and the ceremonies of Saturday seemed just a trifle post festum, while the bust and wreath of laurel at the front of the stage were somewhat too theatrical for our Boston tastes. Nevertheless the music was its own most fitting excuse, and was well played in almost every detail. The "Magic Flute" overture was taken in just the right tempo, and not in the prestissimo which marred it in the former performances by this orchestra. As a consequence, every voice in the fugato, which forms the chief theme, was clear and intelligible (it is the most popular piece of fugal writing in the entire repertoire), and the development was also easily followed, although the introductory chords of this portion of the work were rather square cut.

What a model of the true dramatic school Mme. Fursch-Madi is! Her two numbers (Donna Anna's aria and "Dove Sono," the latter, of course, misprinted "Dove Song") were as different from each other as possible, yet the same success was achieved in both. "Dove Sono" was a lesson to every vocal student present, in its pure enunciation, its artistic phrasing, its unexaggerated portamenti; only in the high notes was there evidence of caution, which told of weakness—just a suspicion of vocal decadence. Mozart's Masonic funeral music was written for a lodge of sorrow held for Prince Esterhazy in July 1785. It does not magnify into a full orchestral score very well; it was written originally for two violins, two violas, contrabass, one clarinet, three basset-horns, two oboes, two horns and a contrabassoon. It will be seen that in such a combination the wind instruments were given a preponderance which had much to do with the tone-color, and this preponderance was not present in the full orchestral version. The contrabassoon was very effective (one very seldom hears this instrument in anything like an obligato), and gave something of the mournful gravity intended by the composer, but, of course, the basset-horns were not obtainable, the instrument being quite obsolete, and one could only guess at what the original music must have sounded like. The bass clarinet can by no means replace the basset-horn, for the latter had a far more gloomy effect, and whenever Mozart desired to picture death, as in his requiem for example, he had recourse to this instrument.

The "Clarinet Symphony" ended the programme. Mozart was the father of the clarinet, for his predecessors Bach and Handel never used it, and in this work for the first time, the instrument enters into symphony, but so wedded were the composers of a century ago to having the woodwind in three parts, that Mozart turned out the oboe to make room for the new comer. Because of the innovation, the woodwind have most important work to do in this symphony, and it must be said that they did it very well. The tempi were reasonable, the balance good and the finale entirely crisp and brilliant. The trio of the minuet was also especially excellent. Only in the second movement could the dainty staccato chords have had more piquancy and lightness; but this is a minor fault, and the entire concert was a pleasing one, and so well given that the most confirmed fault-finder can put aside his vitriol bottle for the nonce.

Louis C. Elson.

Handel and Haydn Society Concert, "The Messiah."

That the critic finds little to say of the performance of the "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society, is but a natural result of a performance which takes place annually, but this by no means argues that there is little to be said, for to the person hearing the work thus given, for the first time, the occasion is one of indescribable glory, and the auditor who has listened to the masterpiece year after year finds that familiarity breeds neither contempt nor satiety. But, as regards the chorus work (and spite of "Thou shalt break them." "He was despised" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" the oratorio is immortal chiefly because of its choruses) a description written one year will often answer for the next in many of its details, and the reviewer is not permitted to imitate history in the repetition of himself. One can, however, repeat the annual protest against the spelling of the composer's middle name as "Frideric." The society would rather spare a whole Handelian chorus than that eccentric "I," which no English programme bears. It is pleasant to note, however, that our distinguished litterateur, Mr. Nathan Haskell Dole, in his recent work, "A Score of Composers," does not follow the absurd orthography.

Of course the usual cuts were made, and in general one can commend them, for even Homer sometimes nods, and it is unnecessary to prolong the performance to extreme length; the audiences of the 19th century are not so patient as those of the 18th were; but the loss of the chorus, "And he shall purify," and the Turba, "He trusted in him," with its graphic spirit of mockery and reviling, is ever to be regretted. No one can overestimate the debt we owe to Dr. Robert Franz when listening to the "Messiah"; his great work in the matter of additional accompaniments (as necessary as the retouching of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" on the walls of the chapel in Milan) is recognized by all who are not wedded to the spirit of archaic or orchestration, but in the matter of shortening the repeats he has done no less a service.

The old "Da Capo" aria was a stumbling-block in the performance of many a Handelian work in its original state; to give two divisions of a song in fine contrast, and then to go entirely through the first part again for the sake of symmetry and arirving at the tonic key, was too much to expect of the music lovers of this age, the entire tendency of which is against repetition. Often the entire second part (as for example, "He gave his back" in "He was despised") was omitted, for the sake of avoiding these repetitions; but the partial return of the first part as a sort of coda, after the second part, preserves the composer's intention and contrast, without wearying the auditor, and this judicious compromise we owe to Dr. Robert Franz. Brahms applied the same [illegible] to instrumental music when he formed a scherzo (calling it "intermezzo") in which the scherzo did not reappear entire after the trio, but only a reminiscence of it as coda.

The chorus work of last night was good, and generally even excellent, although an occasional thinness of tone could be heard among the sopranos, and a few male singers anticipated the attack a few times, and came in before the body of the voices. But in the orchestra all was insecurity, roughness and bad intonation; one cannot inveigh too strongly against such accompaniments as were furnished throughout last night's performance; some of the solo numbers were almost ruined by the careless work, which was worse than anything we have had in oratorio for a long time. It was by no means the fault of Mr. Zerrahn, whose beat was steady and whose gesture always comprehensible, and Mr. Lang did all that mortal could do with the little, but erratic, organ.

Of the chorus work, as always, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was the best, although the chorus has given it with more breadth, and (equally of course) we all arose, and stood through its measures like good Anglomaniacs and imitators of King George the Second. Some of the solo work was excellent. Madame Nordica was not in her best voice, and attacked some high notes with great circumspection, and once, in "I know that my Redeemer lives," introduced a very unwarranted portamento; but her rendering of "Rejoice greatly" was very brilliant, and "Thou didst not leave his soul in hell" was remarkably pure and effective. Miss Lena Little was rather rigid in execution, but at least she did not exaggerate the expression of "He was despised," and some of the emphatic accenting and cut phrasing which she introduced, may have been to lead the orchestra home from its wanderings. She sang "He shall feed his flock" with commendable expression.

Mr. Auty of Philadelphia is too light a tenor for oratorio work of this kind. It may at once be stated that his voice was pure, his intonation true, and his phrasing careful, but he had so little of power that "Thou shalt break them" was very nearly a parody. He did much better in the less forcible "Behold and see."

Mr. Barrington Foote was a lesson to those who believe that English need not be understood when it is sung; every word he uttered was clear as a bell, and this in the country of vocal mispronunciation was something to be grateful for; but he did more—he phrased Handel in a manner that was inspiringly clean and intelligible, and at "Why do the nations" the entire audience became aware of the beauty of his work and enthusiastically recognized it. He did all this without having a very phenomenal voice, by sheer force of true method and musicianship. In "The people that walked in darkness" he could not efface the memory of Myron W. Whitney's sombre tones which fit this number better than any others on earth I believe, at times, in this and in "The trumpet shall sound," the phrases ran a trifle deep for his best tones, but his work as a whole may be classed as the best of the concert. In the trumpet aria, Mr. Mueller redeemed himself for the poor performance of last season, for there was not a single "break" in his work from beginning to end, and the difficult phrases rang out gloriously. It is a great improvement to have this given on trumpet rather than cornet, but it may be remembered that Handel had a still narrower tube in mind when he wrote; the discant-trompeten of this composer have gone entirely out of use.

If the performance of "The Messiah" had its faults, it must be remembered that they were only sporadic (except the orchestra—that was chronic), and that the majesty of the choruses kept a very large audience from suffering any sense of disappointment.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given last Saturday night in Music Hall, was made up entirely of Mozart's compositions in memoriam of the great composer. The selections were the overture, "Magic Flute," aria from "Don Giovanni," Masonic Funeral music, "Dove Sono," from "Marriage of Figaro," and the E flat symphony.

The concert was not as enjoyable as would have been one of greater contrast in style and form, and the absence of the concerto for violin and viola, which was necessary on account of the illness of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, detracted considerably from the enjoyment of the audience. The orchestra, however, made all that was possible of the overture, funeral music and symphony.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, the soloist of the evening, has not been heard here for several seasons, but her rendering of Donna Anna's aria from "Don Giovanni" was proof that she had not lost ground, in a musical sense, since Boston last heard her. Her delivery was excellent and her rendering artistic. Her last solo, "Dove Sono," brought out all the feeling which she so well knows how to express.

The audience was particularly cold and unresponsive during the entire evening, and the beautiful notes of the "Magic Flute," even the solemn impressive measures of the funeral music, failed to awaken any enthusiasm. The symphony, however, notably the andante movement and the minuetto, brought forth some show of interest.

The public rehearsal of next week's concert will be on Thursday afternoon, with a strictly classical programme, and two novelties, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments and a Rubinstein symphony.

"MESSIAH."

Music Hall was literally packed last evening at the performance of Handel's "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Association. The stage presented a fine appearance with the chorus, the orchestra—familiar players from the Symphony orchestra—Mme. Lillian Nordica, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Leonard E. Auty, Mr. Barrington Foote, and, last but not least, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the conductor.

The organ, presided over by Mr. B. J. Lang, added a great deal in effect to the chorus numbers, which were all well sung. Mme. Nordica, who won her reputation in this oratorio, sang expressively throughout, while two of her numbers were unusually fine.—"He shall feed his flock," with Miss Little and "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Her notes were clear and bell-like, and she gave them with delicate shading.

Miss Little has a voice of peculiar quality, her lower register is rich, and her high register is pretty good, but the notes between are weak, but she uses skill in managing her voice. "He Was Despised" brought out all her best tones and her dramatic power.

Mr. Auty's voice, a sweet tenor, was hardly equal to the part, but he sings artistically, although somewhat careless in enunciation. In that one thing—enunciation—lies Mr. Foote's power. The English baritone can give some of our singers points in this particular direction. He has a rich voice, of wide range, and his execution is well nigh perfect. His solo, "The Trumpet Shall Sound," was the best of his numbers, and the trumpet solo by Mr. Pierre Muller enhanced the effect. The "Hallelujah chorus," a hard number to sing, was the gem of the evening.

Vivian.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1891.

MOZART.

The Commemoration of the Centenary of His Death.

The "Messiah" Given by the Handel and Haydn.

Notes Concerning Its First Performance.

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert was devoted to certain works of Mozart, in commemoration of the centenary of his death, Dec. 5, 1791. The numbers chosen were the "Magic Flute" overture; the symphony in E flat, "Or sai chi l'onore" from "Don Giovanni," and "Dove sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" (sung by Mrs. Fursch-Madi), and the Masonic Funeral Music, which was substituted for the concertante for violin, viola and orchestra, on account of the sickness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.

It is well in these nervous days, when the listeners to music, like unto the Athenians of old, demand eagerly all that is new; when the tendency is to welcome the strange and unintelligible, and to despise, because, forsooth, they are lucid and beautiful, even long accepted works that have withstood the tooth of Time; when music is no longer regarded as a separate art, but as a means of expressing all things in nature and in the brain and the heart of man, an art interchangeable with prose, poetry, sculpture and painting—it is well to take a breathing spell and to contemplate the serenity of the supreme Mozart.

We are too apt to lose sight of historical perspective in our judgments upon composers. We judge rashly the men of former centuries with the men of our own generation, and it is not uncommon to find comparisons drawn between Mozart and Wagner, or Mozart and Schumann; as though Tabarin and Artemus Ward, Apuleius and Balzac could be weighed one against the other. The smug critic that belongs to the hyper-modern school pats Mozart's head, chucks Haydn under the chin, and speaks kindly of Beethoven, echoing the line in Congreve's play, "Hannibal was a very pretty fellow in those days." And he adds: "Mozart now is intolerable, a mere maker of music that portrays nothing, that is without meaning. He had facility, it is true, and his tunes have an agreeable jingle. His music, however, is a thing of the past, unsuited to our wants. We have outgrown it." But the composer must be judged in the light of his time; his music must be compared with that of his contemporaries. The line of composer is not made up of independent, uninfluenced men. Upon Mozart leans Beethoven; upon Beethoven, Schumann and the members of the Romantic School, and then Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner. The last would have been impossible without the first.

On the other hand there is, perhaps, then, no greatest composer. He that excels in one branch of his art may be easily outstripped in another by a less highly gifted man. If, however, among the many glorious names, one may be put above the rest as a supremely endowed genius whose flow of inspiration was directed and not choked by complete mastery of art, that name is Mozart. As a spontaneous singer of pure melody he was approached only by Schubert and Rossini. As an inventor of harmonies and as a juggler with the strictest laws of counterpoint he is a marvel for all time. He knew the secrets of orchestral instruments that had baffled musical seekers before him. He wrote "Don Giovanni" and breathed the breath of dramatic life into the cold body of Italian formalism. He met Beaumarchais upon his own ground and conquered him. With "The Magic Flute" he laid the sure foundations of national German opera. His symphonies and chamber music paved the way for Beethoven. His writings for the pianoforte of his day and for combinations of instruments then relished are crowded with passages of rare beauty: and everywhere is seen the complete and easy triumph of astounding skill over the greatest theoretical difficulties. And when he turned from the concert room and the stage to the church, the noble fragments of the Requiem and the matchless Ave Verum show that music may be the full expression of religious awe and ecstatic worship. Let it also be remembered that he composed when he was of tender age; that his life was full of disappointment; that he was constantly harassed by poverty; that his compositions are nearly eight hundred in number; and that he died before he was thirty-six.

Victor Wilder has well said that the crowning glory of Mozart's work is its ideal perfection. This perfection is in great measure due to its apparent simplicity, which in music as in literature is, as Walt Whitman declared in his famous preface to the first edition of "Leaves of Grass," "the art of art, the glory of expression and the sunlight. To speak with the perfect rectitude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of the trees in the woods and grass by the roadside is the flawless triumph of art." It is this that makes the just performance of a Mozart composition so rare. The French claim, and many will admit that they are not exorbitant, that a Mozart symphony or overture is only heard in perfection when it is played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory. It is true that in Germany the players seem to lay their hands upon his music with a heavy touch, and there is too often an absence of the delicacy, the elegance, the restrained passion, the serene spirit so characteristic of Mozart. It is a pleasure then to state that the performance of Saturday evening, if it were not an absolutely ideal one, was, upon the whole, very satisfactory. The readings of Mr. Nikisch were sympathetic and free from exaggeration; the work of the orchestra was excellent. It is true that the first violins in the andante of the symphony were once or twice not above reproach; it is true that in the overture and symphony there was occasional cloudiness in the rapid [illegible] passages; but there was but little to [illegible] with, and the concert gave legitimate enjoyment. The Masonic Funeral Music, written in memory of Meklenburg and Esterhazy naturally lost in effect in consequence of the necessary absence of the basset horns with which Mozart gave a peculiarly sombre coloring to his score; and however appropriate it may have been to the occasion for which it was written, it loses in value when heard in the concert hall. The other orchestral numbers were happily chosen. Age has not staled their infinite beauty.

Mrs. Fursch-Madi declaimed with intelligence and force the trying recitative to the great air from "Don Giovanni," and sang the air itself with breadth and dignity. She is a dramatic soprano, a chanteuse Falcon, and she was heard to less advantage in the air from "The Marriage of Figaro," although she gave constant proofs in the latter number of the training and understanding of the accomplished artist. Such singers serve to show that the noble art of song really existed, that it is not merely a matter of tradition. They also give the lie to the pernicious theory that vocal skill and dramatic truth cannot dwell together.

The programme of the next concert includes Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's Dramatic Symphony (No. 4).

Handel's "Messiah" was sung last evening in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn, and with the assistance of Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano; Miss Lena Little, alto; Mr. Leonard E. Auty, tenor, and Mr. Barrington Foote, bass. The orchestra was made up of players from the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Otto Roth, principal. Mr. Lang was the organist. The hall was crowded.

The performance of the chorus was one that calls for words of high praise. It may have fallen short in intensity and in volume to the remarkable performance of last year, but, on the other hand, there was a decided improvement in the observance of the dynamics. There was more attention paid to contrast, to expression. In other words, the choruses were sung with greater intelligence. Too often a chorus of such a size is merely a gigantic voice, which speaks and stops in obedience to the conductor, but otherwise is uncontrolled. Last night's performance of "For unto us" and "Surely he hath borne" was worthy of a small body of picked singers. Nor are these isolated examples. The chorus work throughout the evening was admirable. The quality of the sopranos was delightfully fresh and their endurance great. The tenors—the weak spot in so many choruses—were confident and never disagreeable, the other parts were very satisfactory. There was but little skulking in the contrapuntal passages; the various entrances were well defined and the walk of each part was well preserved.

Mr. Zerrahn has thus shown that it is possible to sing Handelian choruses with a great number of singers and produce legitimate musical effects. It is to be hoped that this marked improvement in the matter of expression will not be confined to the performance of a familiar oratorio, but will be seen in the other works to be given this season.

Unfortunately there can not so much be said in commendation of the solo singers. The honors were easily carried off by Mrs. Nordica, who made a most favorable impression in her first recitatives and the air "Rejoice greatly." This air was well accentuated, it was delivered frankly, and the bravura was clean. She also sang the "Come unto Him" with effect, and without the sentimentalism that is too often affected by the singer of the air. Her limitations were seen at once, when she attacked the famous "I know that my Redeemer liveth." This air calls for breadth and nobility of expression. It is the public announcement of personal conviction. Mrs. Nordica sang it as though it were a sentimental aria. She indulged herself in violent and unmeaning contrasts; she used at the end of the final crescendo a downward portamento that was at once inartistic and against all the traditions; she was subtle where she should have been frank; and the dignity of the whole was frittered away in the attempt to invest the details with superfluous meaning.

Miss Little sang "He shall feed His flock" exceedingly well, with beauty of tone, with skill and with simple, moving tenderness. Her version of "He was despised" was not marred by undue exaggeration of sentiment, but it suffered at times from false accentuation. Take the bald statement, "He was despised and rejected of men." Surely there should not be great stress put upon the words "was" and "men," while the other words are almost slighted. Miss Little showed in other places a tendency toward false rhetorical accentuation. It is true that the musical emphasis often tempts the singer to ignore the text, but Miss Little at times violated the musical meaning as well as the rhetorical by forcing a tone that was without value of any nature. She was unfortunate in her opening air, in pitch, in quality of tone and in phrasing.

There was not a sufficient pause between the overture and the opening tenor recitative to allow many late comers to gain their seats, and Mr. Auty sang his first number under unfavorable circumstances. During the evening the opportunities given him revealed the fact that his voice is thin, dry and hard. Nor is his vocal skill sufficient to offset his natural deficiencies.

Mr. Barrington Foote has a well deserved reputation as a ballad singer. His enunciation is distinct and it is a pleasure to hear him in good old English songs, such as "The Vicar of Bray." But to sing Handel is another matter. He was earnest and conscientious in his endeavors last evening, but he was simply out of his proper place.

The work of the orchestra was unusually good, although the accompaniments to "Thou shalt break them" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" were carelessly played. The chorus and the solo singers were frequently applauded.

We associate the "Messiah" with a chorus of great size and a full orchestra; we know it with the improvements of Mozart and Franz. Have we, after all, any idea of the oratorio as it was first given in 1742 in Dublin? We know from journals of that day that "the elegant entertainment was conducted in the most regular manner and to the entire satisfaction of the most crowded and polite assembly." The members of the "most grand, polite and crowded audience" laid aside hoops and swords by request of the authorities and gladly paid the half guinea entrance fee. The chorus was made up of the members of two church choirs and the orchestra was composed of Dubourg and "several excellent musicians." We know that the principal parts were sung by Signora Avolio, Mrs. Cibber and two church singers.

As Rockstro says, no man now living has heard the "Messiah" as Handel wrote it. The orchestra he used was very differently made up from our own. In tutti passages the violins were strengthed by oboes, and the violoncellos by bassoons; the usual proportion was one oboe to three violins, one bassoon to each 'cello, and another to each double bass. The proportion of drums and trumpets was different. Then comes the question of how the organ was used. It would be a most interesting experiment to give this oratorio with a small picked chorus, an orchestra of Handel's day, and with the use of Handel's score. Not that the work of Mozart and Franz should be disparaged, but it is undeniably true that "the most loving and intelligent treatment cannot avoid inequality and incongruity; compared with what has been literally transmitted, every modification reflects, both in kind and degree, the individual learning and taste of the adapter."

Philip Hale.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XC., NO. 174.
MONDAY, DEC. 21, 1891.

THE CHRISTMAS ORATORIO.

"The Messiah" Rendered by the Handel and Haydn Society.

Music Hall Crowded Last Evening—Several Fresh Solo Voices—Excellent Work in All Departments—Hint to Late Comers—Charming Chorus and Orchestral Performances.

Christmas week in Boston would fail of a part of its due observance if the Handel and Haydn society should fail of its performance of Handel's "Messiah."

Last evening witnessed its 84th performance, and neither the crowded and appreciative audience, nor the vigorous and enthusiastic chorus of nearly 500 voices gave indication that repetition had in any measure weakened popular interest in the grand old setting of the old, old story of the advent.

The society can always command adequate solo talent for its performances, and last evening, while it introduced some new voices in the solo parts, it did not fall short of its usual excellence in selection and balance. The quartet included Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano, Miss Lena Little, alto, Mr. Leonard E. Anty, tenor, and Mr. Barrington Foote, bass. Mr. Zurham was conductor, of course, and Mr. B. J. Lang was organist, while Mr. Franz Kneisel directed the orchestra, which was made up from the Boston Symphony organization.

It is perhaps unnecessary to write anything in praise of Mrs. Nordica for Boston readers. She was in admirable voice, and her distinct enunciation, accurate attention to the score, and delicate phrasing left nothing to be desired in the numbers that fell to her. In "Come Unto Him," and "Rejoice Greatly," she showed rare appreciation of the sentiment which received special recognition from the audience. In the air, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," to which every one of any soprano who essays "The Messiah," she was perfect in tone and expression, and confirmed the highest estimate of her ability in oratorio work.

Looks as the Test

Miss Little comes fresh from European study, and there was no little interest in her appearance. Her first air, "O Thou That Tellest Good Tidings," displayed a clear, mellow and well trained voice, but one that seemed weak in its upper range. A lack of confidence, perhaps, prevented the display of her full strength. She was at her best in "He was despised," giving a charmingly delicate and intelligent interpretation of the sentiment, but here, too, she seemed to fail in breadth, or, perhaps, she was too conscientious to take full advantage of the opportunities where the score invited special display.

Mr. Arity's was a new voice, and it was unfortunate that his was the first number, "Comfort Ye My People." He displayed a good voice and method, with very distinct enunciation, but, in addition to the nervousness of a stranger, he had to contend with the bustle and annoyance of a herd of late comers, who disturbed the audience and well nigh wrecked the singer. We have seen Mr. Zerrahn check a performance and hold his forces in reproving silence under far less provocation than he had on this occasion. In his later numbers his work was all well done, with a clear and well trained voice and appropriate expression. At the close of "Behold and See," he exhibited an exquisite shading, which the audience was quick to recognize and appreciate.

Mr. Foote showed some nervousness in his first number, but later he mastered it and got into confidence in himself and so that his appearance as a whole was successful. His voice is of moderate strength, and is fully flexible. In his last recitation, "Behold, I Tell You a Mystery," and the following air, "The Trumpet Shall Sound," he quite captured the audience. The trumpet obligato in this number, by Mr. Pierre Muller was admirably given.

Sympathy with His Work,

It would be strange if, after so long experience and so thorough drill in the score of "The Messiah," the chorus should fail in their part. They did not fail. In the earlier numbers there seemed a lack of vigor and volume, but after they reached "For Unto Us a Child Is Born" there was no occasion for criticism on this score. Their work was admirably shaded throughout, and their attack was uniformly accurate. Their success was also the success of Mr. Zerrahn, whose thorough discipline through a series of years has brought them to their present state of high efficiency.

The orchestra deserves high praise for their share of the evening's work. In some of the accompaniments their sympathy with the soloist was remarkable and exquisite. This was especially noticeable in Miss Little's solo, "He Shall Feed His Flock." In the Pastoral symphony the same exquisite shading was exhibited. Mr. Lang and the audience were unfortunate in the location of the organ. Many in the hall hardly heard the instrument, and the grand organ of the early days of Music Hall was sadly missed.

The audience was intelligently appreciative, recognizing the best features of each soloist's work with impartiality, and giving emphatic approval to the chorus numbers. The society, and all who were sharers in the performance deserve compliment and congratulation.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, DECEMBER 20, 1891.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist, Mme. Fursch-Madi.

The Christmas "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn—Paderewski's Return—Nordica's New York Triumph—A "Gems of Oratorio and Song" Concert—Gossip and Comment.

Conductor Nikisch improved his earliest opportunity in the home concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra last evening to commemorate the Mozart centennial, the selections made for the occasion from Mozart's works being the overture to the "Magic Flute," the great Donna Anna aria from "Don Giovanni," the "Masonic Funeral Music," the "Dove Song" from "Marriage of Figaro," and the symphony in E flat.

Such programmes, while altogether commendable and appropriate for such observances, are not altogether enjoyable, on account of the absence of contrasting styles and forms demanded in all successful programme making. Conductor Nikisch, however, made all that was possible of the overture, funeral music and symphony, and was heartily commended for his readings of these several compositions.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer of the evening, and her delivery of the Donna Anna aria was characterized by all the dramatic strength and taste called for in its perfect interpretation. Mme. Fursch-Madi has not been heard here for some seasons, but the pleasant memories of her earlier triumphs were shown in the hearty greeting given her, and the applause following her first contribution to the programme recalled her to bow her acknowledgments. The beauties of the "Dove Song" were made distinctly prominent by Mme. Fursch-Madi's singing of the number, and she was again most heartily applauded at its conclusion.

The public rehearsal of the coming week will be given on Thursday, and for this and the Saturday evening concert the programme will be as follows: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude, "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic, (first time).

TONIGHT'S "MESSIAH."

The Handel and Haydn Society gives its 84th performance of "The Messiah" at Music Hall this evening, and in this connection Secretary Charles W. Stone makes the following announcement:

One hundred and fifty years ago this immortal work lay just completed and awaiting its production in the following year.

With this concert we welcome our Nordica again, and again recall with pleasure and pride that earlier performance of "The Messiah" when her brilliant public career was begun with us. Of Miss Lena Little in oratorio, glad tidings often reached us during her stay in England. Mr. Auty is our guest from Philadelphia, and Mr. Barrington Foote of London comes to us with all the best traditions of the great home of oratorio.

Mr. Kneisel, as usual, will lead the violins, Mr. Muller again will play the trumpet solo, and the players throughout will be from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Our chorus is confidently expected to show itself substantially improved and better than ever before. The society will be assisted by Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano; Miss Lena Little, alto; Mr. Leonard E. Auty, tenor; Mr. Barrington Foote, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1891.

Mr. Nikisch was known as one of the first four conductors in Europe, the other three being Dr. Richter in Vienna, Herr Levy in Munich, and Herr Mottl in Carlsruhe. In this country he has certainly not belied his European reputation. Perhaps the most admirable feature in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the wonderful balance of tone, that just proportion between the parts which is essential to a perfect orchestral unity. Just this balance is probably the quality most difficult of attainment in orchestral work, and more especially in the rendering of the works of the great classical masters.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1891.

Music Hall: The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony Orchestra gave a Mozart programme last Saturday evening, in honor of the centenary of the composer's death. The list was as follows:

Overture to "Die Zauberflote."
Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," from "Don Giovanni."
Masonic Funeral Music.
Aria: "Dove sono," from "Le nozze di Figaro."
Symphony in E-flat.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer.

Influenza had been at work and put two solo players hors de combat. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel were to play the concerto for violin and viola, but both were too ill to appear. Mr. Schroeder, the first 'cellist, was in the same case. The overture began a little vaguely, the orchestra not being well together, but with the fugue matters mended, and all went well to the end. It was a pleasure, too, to hear this fugue taken at so good a tempo. The Masonic Music sounds surprisingly modern, almost Beethovenish; it was played with great, perhaps too dramatic, force of expression, but not with much finish. The ever-welcome symphony went grandly. It was a delightful reproduction of the sunlight that beams from out this masterpiece, and played by Mr. Nikisch con amore. Mme. Fursch-Madi sang the two arias to the admiration of every one. Such Mozart singing is exceedingly rare; and, to show how a really good thing is appreciated, Mme. Fursch-Madi was called out after both songs.

The programme for the concert next Saturday night is: Handel—Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F major, first time; Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal;" Rubinstein—Fourth symphony, "Dramatic," first time. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday afternoon.

Handel and Haydn Society: "The Messiah."

The annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society was given in the Music Hall, Sunday night, before an audience that packed the hall to overflowing—a repetition of the evidence that the great work holds its own with the public, despite modifications of opinions on theological tenets or changes of taste in matters musical. It was the first concert of the seventy-seventh season by the society (No. 680 on the calendar) and the eighty-fourth presentation of the oratorio by this honored association. This was the performing force in addition to the choir:

Mrs. Lillian Nordica	Soprano
Miss Lena Little	Alto
Mr. Leonard E. Auty	Tenor
Mr. Barrington Foote	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

Players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Otto Roth, principal; the trumpet solo by Mr. Pierre Müller.

First in musical importance in considering a performance of "The Messiah" is the work of the chorus. It is a genuine pleasure to say that this was throughout of a very high order in accuracy of attack and of pitch and in faithfulness of expression. If any there were who thought the singing wanted sonority or fulness they should have counted themselves amply compensated by the clearness and sustained power shown by each part in the choral body. Very rarely at the concerts of the society in the last twenty-five years have the tenors given out such a pure, clear, bright tone as was heard from them on this occasion.

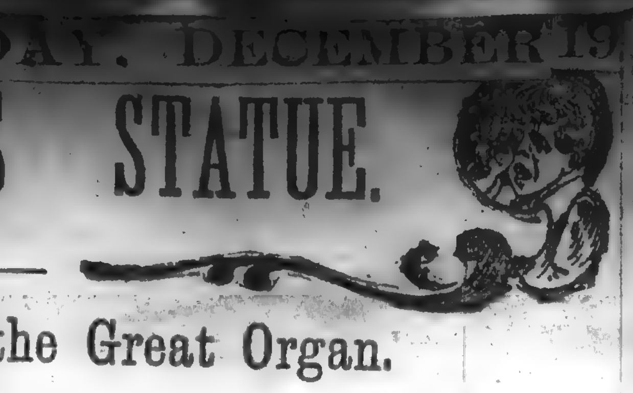
Mrs. Nordica's pure tone, faultless intonation, generally distinct enunciation and careful execution, allied with the prevailing brilliancy of her style, made her execution of all the soprano solos very interesting. From some came the criticism that there was more sentimentality than sentiment in her expression, but this is a judgment which almost invariably follows a performance by a singer whose voice has a crystalline quality. The late Mme. Parepa was often so judged, or misjudged, as many contended. Miss Little was charming when she sang with a moderate pressure on her vocal machinery, displaying at those moments a sweet and sympathetic voice. On other occasions, that is when a strong pressure was used, a dry, untuneful effect, of the sort common to German singers was a result. The new tensor singer Mr. Auty gave many signs of fine intelligence and sang with notable conscientiousness. Physically, however, he was often found inadequate, With him, as with Miss Little, there was sweetness in his gentler moments, and harshness when force was used. Mr. Foote sang the Handel roulades in a manner that proved his careful schooling. His enunciation was wonderfully distinct. Only in weight of tone was he found wanting, but he managed his voice so finely that no unpleasantness was produced by efforts to accomplish more than his natural powers comfortably permitted.

The remaining concerts of the season are thus announced: Feb. 7, the mass in E-flat, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, first time anywhere; Beethoven's Choral Fantasie, with Mrs. Beach at the pianoforte; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Mrs. Carl Alves, Messrs. Campanini and Fischer, solo singers. Good Friday night, April 15, Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music; Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Mrs. Amalie Joachim, Messrs. Parker, Whitney and Lamson, solo singers. "The Creation," Easter Sunday night, April 17; Myron W. Whitney is the only solo singer yet engaged.

[81]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19

UNDER BEETHOVEN'S STATUE.



A Christmas Story of the Great Organ.

By HELEN A. SHAW.

[Written for the Transcript Christmas Supplement.]

IT WAS bright weather,—cold and clear as a jewel.

The sparkling promise of a perfect Christmas-tide was in the air, and the old mall on Boston Common clicked and pattered to the tread of gay crowds crossing either way, all winter-rosy, bundle-laden, and bright-eyed with exercise.

Joyous excitement tingled in the frosty wind, that, with a keen rush, swept the bare branches overhead and buffeted the skirts of laughing girls, who came on, leaning merrily against it, and passed in a bright whirl of petticoats, with little shrieks of fun. One group of these,—a knot of pretty school-girls, with their skates, bound for the Public Garden,—jostled against a tall lad with a small maiden at his side, and crowded them quite off the walk with little ceremony.

The only wonder is, they did not crowd them out of notice, too, and out of this story at the same time. For a plain, shabby little mouse was Draxy, trotting along at her tall brother's side.

Those rosy girls, sweeping by in their bright gowns and plush and furs, looked so bewitching and so brilliant near her, you could hardly help wishing the story to be about them, instead.

There were no fine feathers about Davy, either,—poor lad! Poor bonny Davy, in his threadbare clothes!

Walking along behind him, you would have noticed how faded and thin his coat was, and perhaps you would have smiled at the great patch on the elbow of the sleeve his music was tucked under. But had you come the other way, and met my Davy's face,—believe me, you would never think of patches nor of faded clothes, for there was something in that beautiful, dark eye and brave, clear brow, a prince might envy him.

I fear he would not thank me, though, for choosing such a time to introduce him, when his head was drooping, and the brown eyes were heavy with a mist that almost gathered into drops.

"Davy," chirped Draxy, at his elbow, "Oh, do you see what fun the boys are having, playing football, down on the Parade Ground?"

Davy cast a heavy glance toward the lively youths, but could not muster a word or smile to please her.

"Don't look so awful, Davy," pleaded the little girl. "Besides, here comes that Ernest Maxwell, and he sees you."

Up went Davy's head at that, and his eyes measured the approaching figure steadily.

Ernest Maxwell carried some music under his arm, too. It was by the same divine composer as Davy's. No sweeter because it had such an expensive binding, I am sure. Neither was Ernest Maxwell, himself, any grander because of his own expensive binding.

But he seemed to think that he was, and he gave Davy a very patronizing nod as he passed.

"No use, Draxy!" burst out Davy, as soon as they were out of hearing, "I don't see any justice in it, and I can't bear it. There 's that snob, Maxwell,—his father is just coaxing him, bribing him, to go to Germany and study. Schwarz told me so, in the class, yesterday."

"Oh, my poor Davy! And you 've got to give up your music and go to work in that horrid old place."

"'T is n't that! I don't think I'd be mean enough to begrudge another fellow his luck. But—oh, how can I stand it! The noodle does n't want to go, and won't go. I'd walk through fire for that chance! That 's why I don't get it!"

Draxy looked very sorry; but she could think of nothing comforting to say just then, so she only crept a little nearer to his side and cast her eyes around in quest of cheer.

Small cheer there was for either of them, in that endless procession of happy people and Christmas bundles.

Draxy dared not speak of them. She knew a humble home where there would be but a sad Christmas this year,—no presents at all, and good fortune enough if some means were found of keeping fire and food for all the little ones.

She was but a little maid herself, however, and, though wise enough to know that the sight of other people's joy is not much comfort to the unhappy, she was easily at a loss for subjects that would more surely console a grieving heart.

So, the attractions of the Parade Ground having failed to produce any effect, she turned her eyes on the other side.

There, behind the iron fence, was the old cemetery with its mounds and tombs, lying so still and cold in the winter sunlight.

Here and yonder, on the soldiers' graves, still waved some drabbled remnant of the little flags placed there, long months before, amidst the flowers and the tender grass of spring.

Draxy's eyes grew large and solemn as she looked, and it occurred to her, in some dismal association of ideas, to say darkly, "Oh, Davy! Did you know,—they say—some of the tombs go under this mall, and there are people buried down below these flag-stones we are walking on!"

Dear little Draxy! All her efforts to be cheerful had failed to gain the least response from Davy. But something about this gloomy question, and her saucer eyes and hollow tone, brought a quick smile and flash of fun into his face.

"Yes, I have heard it," he said, looking down at the little face beside him, with a loving and amused expression.

But presently he added, in a bitter tone, "What then? It is no worse to be lying underneath the stones, than to walk on above them,—all your hopes gone,—ambition crushed out of you."

His voice quivered and broke. Draxy stole her little hand in his, and they kept on again in doleful silence,—poor sorrowing things! so out of place in that bright stream of people, hurrying along, with laughing looks and Christmas secrets shining in their eyes.

But, as they reached the crossing of the malls, and Davy came out of his reverie, the little sister's troubled face smote his kind heart, and prompted him to cast about for something to divert her.

"Drax!" said he, presently, in a tone of mischief that she knew full well—

"What?" she responded, eagerly.

"Here is the baroness!" said Davy.

"Oh, my Gracious! Oh, Davy—please turn off and walk the rest of the way on Tremont street! I can't go by that awful old woman. No, I can't!"

Oh, that mysterious old woman, crouching there beside the malls on Boston Common, grinding her old, cracked, half-mute hurdy-gurdy!

Who has forgotten her? In rain and shine, year in, year out, there she was always, sullenly turning the organ-crank, scorning the charitable who dropped pennies, and with her eagle eye piercing each face that passed, as if on the eternal watch for some one.

Lean and gaunt and brown and wrinkled was she,—impervious and indestructible,—rained upon, blown upon, shone upon,—it was all one!

There she would be, still, when next you passed,—familiar as the malls themselves, and yet forever a mystery.

Wonderful old witch! What did she there? Let those who know say what authority there was for the written words, screwed under frame and glass, on top of the old hurdy-gurdy, wherein it was declared that the weird dame was none less than the wife of a French baron, exiled long ago.

Strange freak of fortune! Marvellous old baroness!

"Ugh-h-h!" chattered Draxy, who always fell into a panic at the sight of her. "I wonder who that awful old woman is looking for? Whoever it is, I pity him. Oh, Davy, just imagine you were—the One! And you 've walked and walked all round the world, but at last you will walk across this Common, and—she'll catch you!"

Davy threw back his head and laughed,—a genuine boy's laugh,—sweet to hear.

Draxy and the baroness were great fun always, but the last notion struck him as more droll than usual, and quite beguiled him from the trouble that lay at his heart, till they reached Music Hall place and turned into the court.

Here was hallowed ground. The very paving-stones were like old friends to Davy, but at sight of them, down sank his head again, and his eyes clouded with a desperate look that was pitiful to see.

Those were the days before the great Conservatory had gathered under one ample roof that mass of musical life,—students, teachers, directors and what not,—which now constitutes a little world within four walls.

Then most of our young music-studying population was dispersed about the homes and lodgings of the city,—the diligence of eternal piano-playing announcing their whereabouts,—and the old "Quarterlies," in Music Hall serving to display the results thereof to the interested public and admiring friends.

The old storm-doors croaked as they swung in, a bright fire, in the darkness of the lower hall, winked cheerily through the gloom, and, from the gas-lighted window of the box-office, somebody leaned out to say pleasantly,

"Ah,—Herr Von Weber! That you? Going up to practise?"

Davy took off his hat in an absent-minded way, and answered, drearily enough—

"Yes, sir. Is Schwartz's time up yet?"

"Schwartz just left. Coast is clear. Going to astonish us this time, eh, Davy?"

Davy's features quivered. "I am more likely to break down altogether," he said, turning away quickly with Draxy, and dashing his sleeve across his eyes as soon as they were out of sight on the landing.

"Who 's that?" demanded the gruff voice of a sharp old gentleman who had been talking to the pleasant man in the box-office.

"That, sir? That boy is a genius."

"Humph—genius! Well, what 's the other name you called?"

"Oh!" with a laugh, "We call him that because he looks so much like the pictures of Weber. And there are more than myself who think that there is in that young man the making of such another composer."

"Well, if there is, he'll make it!"

"No chance now," said the other. "They have just lost their father. The mother is an invalid and there is a brood of young shavers to look out for. Poor chap has got to drop music now and roll up his sleeves to support the family. This is to be his last concert. Mighty shame, too!"

But enough of that dark old box-office. Let us go up stairs and hear Davy play.

Fine old Music Hall! You are denuded now of your chief glory,—but let us see you as you were.

An upper light, entering through hidden windows, far aloft, falls on the fair old temple with a classic touch, gleams softly over balcony and niche and bust, and flashes back from the glass panels of the gallery doors, girdling the walls twice round.

But it was not that pearly brightness, far and soft, nor the fine cheerful plan and lines of beauty in the noble hall, that gave it character of old, and breathed the spell, long vanished now, but haunting us forever with its loss.

A mighty presence then abode therein, that filled the eye and mind, and made a very sanctuary of the place.

It was the majesty of the Great Organ, looming from stage to dome like a black cliff, with thundery gloom about its head, and all its dusky heights and dim recesses filled with cathedral shade.

How solemnly that hush and shadow fell on that brooding statue of Beethoven, standing, a dark sentinel, before the organ-mouth.

Davy uncovered his head reverently as he passed under the grave face of the great master, and Draxy, whose little boot-heels soon came clicking over the stage, cast one furtive glance up toward the statue, and then skipped behind the pedestal in a great hurry, trotting up a step or two toward the organ-mouth, and cuddling into a familiar nook, out of Davy's way.

"Oh, Davy!" she crooned, with a little shiver, "he 's as bad as the baroness."

"Who is?" said Davy, absently, unrolling his music on a projection of the pedestal.

"Ugh! That old black Beethoven, all wrapped up in his cloak, and scowling and listening and thinking away!"

Davy looked over at her and smiled. Then he gazed up with love and wistfulness into the bending face above him.

It made a touching picture, the dark master on the pedestal, immortal, pulseless, in bronze; the beautiful lad at his feet, ambitious, desperate, in living flesh and youth.

"Davy," whispered Draxy from her shadowy nook, "let 's play this is a dark cavern, and the banks of organ keys are the dragon's teeth gnashing at me. I am a princess chained to the wall, and you must come in with your sword and save me."

"I'll come and make the dragon sing to you instead," said Davy, going to the organ-seat.

He ran his fingers down the keys. There was a soft rattle of ivory, but no other sound.

"Have n't got the steam on, have they?" said Draxy, proud of knowing all about the domestic habits of the Great Organ.

Davy, reaching to press a knob that rang a bell far in some lower region, smiled down at her bright little face, and then sat waiting dreamily.

"Do you know," she prattled on, "when I 'm out in the audience, at concerts, and the hall is full of people, and the gas is lighted and the organ looks so black and big, I never can believe I am so well acquainted with it and dare to cuddle up like this against it—"

"'Sh!" said Davy, catching the first whisper of a beloved, inspiring sound—the wind beginning to fill the giant pipes.

It comes in a low, murmuring rush, as if from underground, now nearer, nearer, louder, faster, till it swells and rises with a panting sweep, up the huge boles in that great forest of brazen pipes, and fills their mighty sides as if to burst them.

Davy sat motionless and rapt, lost in the great Eolian roar. "Hear it breathe!" he whispered; "hear it breathe!"

His fingers rippled down across the keys. Far above, in some high tree-top of the forest pipes, a voice awakes in answer to his touch that lingers on the ear awhile, so soft, so sweet, so pleading, and then sank again into its nest of silence.

Now, farther still, and hidden in some deeper recess of the organ-forest, another voice awakes.

It calls back to the pleading voice with joy and courage.

Then another and another wakes and sings, and soon the place is full of music and fragrance and beauty, and the tree-tops shake it out upon the air, like dewey drops.

Now the echoes, murmuring the last cadence over and over, to get it by heart, die away themselves, and all is still.

"That 's very good, Davy," said Draxy, tired of being a princess chained to the wall, and stretching her active little limbs in a brisk walk up and down the stage.

Suddenly she trotted off down the steps, and Davy, looking after her, saw her talking to a poor old woman who was cleaning the floor.

"What you doing?" piped Draxy, in her friendly way.

"Faith, darrlin'," said the old woman, straightening up, and holding one hand to her back, "'tis claning up a bit I am, shure."

"Oh!" said Draxy, peeping into the basket of torn scraps, "I suppose you are the janitress."

"Jinnethress is it? Faith, then, perhaps that 's it. I schroob the flures and stairs beyant outside, and I pick the stoof they throw down in here,—bad luck to 'em, intoirely! It breaks my poor ould back. Oh, wirra, wirra!"

With a groan, the poor old creature stooped again to pick up the bits of caramel paper, reserved-seat checks, husks of cardamom, and other relics of last night's audience that were strewn about the aisles and seats.

Draxy looked at her thoughtfully. "That is too hard," she said, at length, in a decisive little tone. "What ails your poor back?"

"God bless you, darrlin', an' kape you long from the same,—'tis rhumatiz, dear, and me ould bones are crackin' wid it. Ivery toime I rise meself from pickin' up these little carrds,—"

"Poor woman! Who makes you do such hard work? You 're too old to do it," said Draxy, beginning, in another aisle, to pick up torn checks and programmes.

"Me ould man is bed-rid this five year, and the little childther,—the grandchildther, darrlin', wid the poor mother in hiven—God be merciful to her swate soul!—I worrks to kape the little childther."

"Oh, I 'm real sorry for you," said Draxy, coming back to the basket, with her skirt held up like an apron, and filled with scraps.

"Ah—God bless her! What 's this, at all? Is it pickin' up the carrds ye are, darrlin'? Look at that, now. Ah—go and sit down wid ye, miss, dear. Shure, ye must n't be doin' the loikes of that. Sit ye down, dear."

"No, I 'm just going to help you. I was here last night, and so you see I made part of this litter," said Draxy. I never thought what a lot of work it was going to make for some poor body, if I tore my programme and chipped my check into little bits."

"Why!" she exclaimed again, directly, "They stick into this matting so! And it 's miles and miles up and down these rows of seats."

And away went Draxy, kind little heart, picking up scraps for dear life, and saying to herself that she would never tear up and scatter checks or programmes again as long as she lived.

So the poor charwoman and the kind little maid went up and down, hard at work, while the soft Christmas twilight fell without, and the great fugue rolled and thundered from the organ.

Oh, what a thing it was to hear the mighty rumble of that giant bass! You could feel it shake the floor beneath your feet. It made the balconies vibrate and tremble, and, sometimes, the great hall seemed almost to rock and roll with sound.

Then, when it ended, there was such silence that the slow ticking of the great clock seemed like the heart-beats of the place, which you could hear because it was so still.

Davy had finished practising, and his little sister, half-way down the hall, was wondering why he did not come out and call her. She began to look often toward the stage, and then at the great clock-face on the balcony.

Hark! Could that have been a strain of music? Or was it the sad, sad voice of some one grieving?

Draxy and the old woman turned at the first sound, and looked toward the organ.

They had scarcely listened while the great fugue was rolling through the hall. But something drew them nearer to this magical strain, and they crept toward it, step by step.

Down the aisle and up the stairs they went, hardly knowing that they did so, and stood, at last, close by the pedestal under the dark statue.

What is Davy playing? Oh, what is this that is making tears fall fast on the two faces it has drawn so near?

It was music that was never written. Music that was never heard before and will not be heard again. For Davy is inspired. He is playing from his own soul. This is his farewell to music, and to all his hopes and dreams. The organ grieves for him. The master, on his pedestal, listens sadly, and seems almost to stir with pity.

The little maid and the untaught old woman are sobbing aloud.

At last there comes a piteous strain,—then a wild crash across the keys, and Davy has flung his head down on his arms. The music is ended.

"Good-by—good-by!" he whispered, kissing the yellow keys where his face lay hidden.

"Oh, Davy!" sobbed a pitiful little voice, and Draxy's arms were around his neck, her soft wet cheek pressed close to his, while the poor old woman behind them wiped her eyes on the hem of her gown and said—

"Don't cry, darrlins! What is the matter, at all? Don't cry, miss, dear, and sir! Oh, but the music broke me harrt, intoirely! "Don't ye cry, darrlins!"

Just then a gruff old voice said—

"Come, come! This won't do. Stop this snivelling!"

An arm that seemed too fatherly and gentle to belong to such a voice, took in Davy and Draxy at once, as they sat on the organ-seat, and seemed to hug them and shake them at the same time.

"Come! What 's the matter here, I say?"

Where he had dropped from was the mystery. Had he been hiding in some recess of the organ?

Impossible to say. But there he was, looking very grim, except about the eyes, which were kind, and—was it possible?—had a suspicious wetness about them, in spite of his orders against snivelling.

The little girl sprang away, very much frightened, and stopped crying at once.

Davy turned around, pale and dazed,—scarcely aroused yet from his dream.

"Sir!" he said, half proudly, half sadly.

"What are you crying about?" demanded the old gentleman.

"Crying!" repeated Davy, with flashing eyes. I 'm not crying!

He drew himself erect, and the color rose in his cheek.

"Ah? spirit, too—eh?" said the old gentleman, exultantly.

Then he wheeled suddenly on Draxy. "What are you crying about, then?" he demanded in a terrible tone.

"Be-because I want to!" said she, stiffening her little neck.

"Oh! Because you want to, eh? Come here?"

Draxy came. Rather defiantly, I am afraid. But then he did seem such an interfering old gentleman.

"Now look at me!" he ordered.

Draxy looked right into his eyes. Something that she saw there must have reassured her, for, pretty soon she smiled, though he was pinching her ca [illegible] you see them hard at work, are you?" said he.

Draxy stared with surprise, but answered never a word.

"Is she?" he asked again, turning to the old woman, who stepped back in a hurry, but recovered herself and curtesied, saying:

"She is, sirr! God bless her! And yourself, too, for a gallant gentleman, and long life to you, sirr!"

"And you 're the kind of fellow who takes care of his mother, and the little brothers and sisters, are you?" the old gentleman went on, turning to Davy. "You 're the sort of chap who wears thin clothes all winter, and gives up his music and buckles down, trying to be a father to the family, are you?" Davy colored and looked away.

"Is he?" persisted this monotonous old gentleman, turning to Draxy.

For answer she just put her arms around her brother's neck and gave him a rousing little kiss.

"Well, then," said the old gentleman, conclusively, "it happens that I am the kind of an old man who loves to help good boys and girls. Sometimes I send the boys off to study music, and I look after the little sisters and the babies till the boys get back."

The looks of Davy and Draxy were a sight to see!

"My name is Maxwell," went on the old gentleman, quietly. "I have heard about you down stairs, and I 've been here some time, myself. Now I 've got a boy. I would like to have him study music abroad—in Europe. He does n't want to go, however."

At this the brother and sister exchanged a glance, but they were dumb and trembling.

"And," said the old gentleman, mysteriously, "I 've got some money that does want to go"—Here he laid a great kind hand on Davy's shoulder—"I 'm going to send you with it, sir'"

Draxy screamed, and running into Mr. Maxwell's arms, hugged him wildly with frantic joy.

Davy gasped, gripped the kind hand, and then, it was no use, broke down.

"Hullo! Perhaps you 're not crying now!" roared Mr. Maxwell, pleased as he could be.

"Sir—Mr. Maxwell—do you really mean it? Oh, I will work so hard and pay you back every cent, and—oh, Mr. Maxwell, you don't know, sir, you don't know."

Davy wrung that great hand once again, bereft of words.

"Well, let 's see." Then said Mr. Maxwell, "Come here, old lady. So the old man is laid up and the children cold and hungry, are they?"

"God help us, sirr! 'Tis thrue, then."

"And the rheumatiz is pretty bad, eh?"

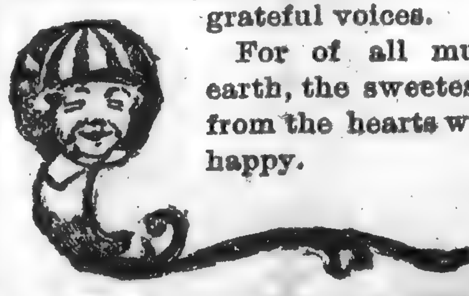
"Dade an' it is sirr. May yerself niver know the loikes of it!"

"Well, cheer up, old lady! I'll see what we can do for you. We 'll make a merry Christmas for the children, after all."

Oh, where, in the great city, was such a scene of joy, as there in the shadow of the organ under Beethoven's statue, on that Christmas eve?

Eloquent were the blessings of the poor old woman, deep and almost unspeakable the thanks of those two young souls, trembling for joy, while with no less delight glowed the warm heart that had bestowed such happiness.

And as the little group stood under the statue of the master, he seemed listening, with solemn gladness, to the music of those grateful voices.



For of all music on this earth, the sweetest pours forth from the hearts we have made happy.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One disappointment was in store for the attendants upon the ninth Symphony concert—the withdrawal of the concerto for violin and viola, which was to have been played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but was given up on account of their illness. For this—and by the way, the programme was all from Mozart and in his honor—was substituted the Masonic funeral music, an announcement of rather lugubrious and ominous cast being made from the stage to the effect that "on account" of the illness just mentioned this sombre selection would be given. But apart from this change the whole evening was one of pleasantness and grace. It is good to hear for an hour or two the exquisite melodies, the rare harmonies, the wonderful orchestral effects and the pure, various human feeling of Mozart, in these grim days when mysticism and trigonometric proportion are sought to be foisted upon the world as the true essence of music, cold calculation is preferred to inspiration, and clangor or twiddling is declared to be the acme of expressiveness. Mr. Nikisch led the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony in an entirely sympathetic manner, not making simplicity trivial or overcharging sentiment. What the Funeral music—like some other pages of the master's work—would be if one could evolve from the past the gloomy horn upon which Mozart relied for his most sepulchral sounds, will probably never be known again; but this reading was good and grave. Mme. Fursch-Madi—in hearing whom once more there was great content—sang from "Don Giovanni" the largo scene, "Or sai che l'onore," and from "The Marriage of Figaro," the air "Dove sono," with that deeply dramatic feeling and in that beautifully balanced style which placed her long ago among great vocal artists. Quiet, sustained and suave in tone, but firm, sincere and direct in expression, she brought a new proof—ah, how sadly needed in these degenerate and careless days!—that the beauty of mere delivery and the fulness of meaning and emotion should meet together whenever there is to be true vocal art.

The programme for tonight needs no soloists, for it consists only of three orchestral works. Two of these are new here—Handel's concerto in F-major for strings and a double wind choir and Rubinstein's fourth, or "Dramatic," symphony. Between these will be placed the prelude to "Parsifal."

Since Mr. George H. Wilson's departure for Chicago, there to assume the secretaryship of the musical department of the World's Fair, the compilation of the notes for the programme Bulletin has been assumed by Mr. Philip Hale, who is sure to make his pages brilliant, diversified and rich with the instructive fruits of knowledge and research.

~~~ Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a reception on Monday evening.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 27, 1891.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony.

The Symphony concert of last evening commended itself to the students and those skilled in music rather than to those whose inclinations are not ultra classical. There was no soloist on the programme, and there were but three numbers given—Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments in F major, Wagner's prelude to the "Parsifal" and Rubinstein's Ocean symphony. The interpretation of these numbers by the fine orchestra under Conductor Nikisch was such as to meet with the heartiest approval, and, as usual, the applause was not lacking after each selection.

The concerto of Handel was written for a strong quartet and two choirs of two horns, two oboes and two bassoons. The work is full of the characteristics of the author. Handel was constantly striving for new effects in his compositions, and this work being most interesting in that direction.

The prelude to the "Parsifal" had its third presentation at the Symphony concerts in this city. It was last given at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert, May 23, 1889. Like all of the preludes of this author, it is immediately suggestive of the play, and one hears the melody that is sung in the great religious scene of the first act in the mystic feast, the Lord's Supper. The simple succession of harmonies and the soft and sweet accompaniments that follow are eloquent with expression of the development of the drama. Now the music impresses the auditor as that of a hidden orchestra, and again there is the sound as if of voices of children which occurs in the finale of the first act. The music broadens in the fourth theme, representing the sufferings of Christ, and here the whole orchestra is brought into play. The beauties of the production were finely delineated by the orchestra.

Last on the programme was the Ocean symphony of Rubinstein. The beauty of this work lies in its grand first number, so replete with melody and originality and so characteristic of the hand of a master hand. The succeeding themes do not lend themselves to such favorable impression, and about them there is a diversity of opinion. The standard of the first theme is not maintained, and the effect is disappointing to the auditor.

Messrs. C. M. Loeffler (violin) and Franz Kneisel (viola) will be the soloists at the next public rehearsal on Friday and concert on Saturday, and the following programme will be performed:

Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola (first movement), cadenza by Hellmesberger (first time at these concerts); Schubert's Entr'acte, "Rosamunde;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season at Music hall, Saturday evening, Dec. 19, was devoted to the memory of Wolfgang Amodius Mozart. The programme was:

Overture to "Die Zauberflote."
Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," from "Don Giovanni."
Masonic Funeral Music.
Aria: "Dove sono," from "Le nozze di Figaro."
Symphony in E Flat.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer.

One thing has been accomplished since Mozart's time, marking an advance in musical appreciation. Think of the greatest genius this world has produced dying in abject poverty and want; think of a devoted wife constantly watching at his bedside, administering stimulants, with encouraging words to keep him alive till his last great work, "Requiem," could be finished; think of the very few attendants at his funeral, and Potter's field for a burial place, without a stone, nor even a marked stick of wood, to show where his grave is. What a contrast is here presented by the present state of things. Genius is now worshiped; talent, both good and inferior, is now rewarded with some measure of liberality. If poor Mozart and his devoted wife could have been fed and feasted on the fat of the land he would have lived longer and been a much happier man. But he lived too early to be appreciated or rewarded by the deeds of men, and it would seem that his God called him home early, that He might take better care of him.

The orchestra did the best they could with the music set before them, a rather difficult programme to make interesting; and, with some of the orchestra under the weather with the prevailing disease, the influenza, comment may be spared.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, was the soloist, performing her work acceptably, brilliantly, as she always does. She has many friends in Boston, which was very apparent when she made her appearance on the stage and also at the completion of her two songs.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall last evening was: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal;" Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic (first time).

Lillian Nordica made such a distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera house on forty eight hours' notice that it secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras, in F., Handel (first time); Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; and the original version of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony. These selections made a curious and not very harmonious combination. The chief point of interest was the Handel work, which was a surprise in the solidity and rich effect of its orchestration. Much of it was as full and as sonorous as if it had been scored yesterday by a follower of the modern school, and the marvel of it is that so much should be accomplished by such simple means. As evidenced in this work, Handel could write wonderfully well for the orchestra when he desired to do so. The brief but lovely Largo is an example in point. It is broadly, richly and impressively arranged, and shows a fine appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments. The fifth movement, a species of minuet, is beautiful in its theme and delightful in its orchestration, the florid dialogue between the solo oboes being exquisite. There must have been fine players of the oboe and horn in Handel's time or such difficult bravura passages as are heard in this movement would not have been written. The oboe solos were played with charming grace and beautiful finish of technique. This concerto shows that there was no slight knowledge of orchestral effect before Haydn and Mozart, and that Handel did not need a Berlioz or a Wagner to teach him close and massive scoring. The work was listened to with unalloyed pleasure, and was enthusiastically applauded. We trust that it may be heard here again at no distant date. It was well worth the reviving, not only for the freshness and interest of the music, but as an example of Handel's masterly use of the orchestra. The "Parsifal" music was well played, but it is tiresome and unmeaning in itself, and is incoherent unless it be followed with a full elucidation on the programme. The symphony was well read and brilliantly, though at times roughly played. At the next concert will be given Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound;" the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin, viola, and orchestra, by Mozart; the Entr'Acte to Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the Symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel are to be the soloists.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS OF CHRISTMAS WEEK.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S PERFORMANCE OF THE "MESSIAH"—THE

Handel, Wagner and Rubinstein were the giants that were grouped together in the tenth Symphony programme.

A concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, by Handel, was the opening number. Much credit is due Mr. Nikisch for rescuing this work from oblivion, and performing it with some modifications, for the first time in Boston. The programme book tells us that the date of its composition, as well as that of its first performance is unknown to history. In its original form it contained nine movements; that is, two measures of a ninth movement were found in the manuscript, the remaining pages being lost, or perhaps never written. Six movements were played at this concert, although the first two were connected in the form of an introduction and allegro. In order to give the work properly some changes in the orchestra were necessary. Two extra oboe players were called into service, and the second pair of horns was placed at the right of the bassoons, among the 'cellos and double basses. The bassoons, of which there were also four, thus came between the horns, the clarinets not being in the score at all.

Those who are acquainted with the works of Handel can imagine the character of this music more easily than it can be described, for it is thoroughly Handelian. The movements bear these titles: Pomposo, allegro, allegro ma non troppo, largo, a tempo ordinario, allegro. The introduction and the largo are broad and dignified and rich in harmony, while the others are delightfully quaint and fascinating. In the second and last allegros the horns are used in a charmingly effective manner. The last in gigue form opening with a passage which is given out by the first horns and repeated by the seconds, is especially attractive. In the second and fifth movements the oboes are the prominent feature; while throughout the entire work the strings are constantly employed either as leading or accompanying instruments. The work was well worth the trouble of the preparation involved. That it was enjoyed by the audience was evident from the spontaneous applause which most of the movements evoked.

Why the prelude to "Parsifal" was made the go-between of this concerto and the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein is one of those things that, we dare say, few fellows, at the most, can find out. It is a riddle which even those few will in all probability scarcely take the trouble to guess at this time of year, when every one wants a holiday mentally as well as bodily. The prelude was played magnificently, however, and Mr. Nikisch amply demonstrated the intensity of his admiration for Wagner, and the greatness of his powers as a conductor as well.

If the Ocean symphony were placed first on a programme, it would be a satisfaction to hear it given in its entirety whenever it is given at all. But a seven movement work for a final number is a little too much; therefore it was a happy thought to perform it as it originally left the hands of its composer.

What a glorious movement is the first! The finale, too, after an evident falling off in inspiration in the two middle movements, shows that Rubinstein made a herculean effort to create a movement that should be a fit companion of the first. It is a melancholy fact, however, that he only partly succeeded. The symphony was played in a manner worthy of the work by conductor and orchestra; and of all the players, no one so completely distinguished himself as did our virtuoso of the kettledrums.

"THE MESSIAH."

The six hundred and eightieth concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, making the commencement of the seventy-seventh season, was given in Music Hall last Sunday evening. "The Messiah" was sung, with Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano, Miss Lena Little, alto, Mr. Leonard E. Auty, tenor, and Mr. Barrington Foote, bass, as soloists. Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Lang were in their accustomed places. The orchestra was led by Mr. Roth, in the place of Mr. Kneisel, who was ill, and the trumpet solo was played by Mr. Pierre Muller.

It is a pleasure to be able to state that the singing of the chorus was as a whole far superior to any that it has done during the past few years. An air of certainty pervaded its work throughout the evening. The attacks were prompt and decisive, most of the difficult runs and other contrapuntal passages were fluently and clearly rendered, and the finales were given with a fullness of tone that indicated an abundance of reserve force. These important details, together with the great gains apparent in quality of tone, balance of parts and expressiveness in phrasing, point to the accession of a large number of members who possess intelligence as well as a mere taste for music, and to the absence of a very considerable number who had nothing but their enthusiasm to recommend them to membership of this great choral body. All this is exceedingly gratifying. It proves that the present management is wide awake and has the real interest of the society at heart.

To refer at length to the singing of the various choruses is unnecessary. In "For unto us a child is born," smoothness, delightfully free enunciation and genuine musical feeling were especially noticeable, although these comments apply almost as closely to "Behold The Lamb." "His yoke is easy" was fine in strength and breadth, and "Hallelujah," though lacking somewhat in fire and sonority, was yet inspiriting and uplifting.

Of the soloists, one thing may be said which applies to each with more or less directness: while the singing of all four gave ample evidence of earnest consideration of the nature of oratorio work in general, and of much thought and study over their respective parts in particular, there was comparatively little in it that indicated the possession of deep emotional natures, or that was calculated to arouse the emotions of an oratorio audience. With the exception of certain touches here and there which had the true ring, the expression which pervaded their singing was of that nature that results from conscientious endeavor, and an excellent understanding of the principles of broad and artistic phrasing.

From this point of view, however, most of the solo singing was exceptionally good. The degree in which different listeners are affected by musical performances that are devoid of the element of greatness must always vary widely. To us, Miss Littles singing was the most appealing and convincing. In spite of the habit she has of excessively prolonging sustained tones, which she has evidently adopted as a means of expression, but which, when frequently indulged in, merges into monotony, much that she did was more than tinged with true feeling. This was plainly apparent in her rendering of "He was despised;" and a more dramatic delivery of the middle portion of that air would have placed the whole on a high plane of artistic performance. Mrs. Nordica's singing was much more serious in intention and finished in execution than any we have ever heard from her before. The recitative, "There were shepherds," was intelligently and expressively given, and "Rejoice greatly" was sung in a thoroughly charming and unaffected manner. In "I know that my Redeemer liveth" the best qualities of her naturally beautiful voice were freely displayed, and her version of the air, if it was not wholly satisfying, at least seemed imbued with sincerity.

Mr. Foote displayed a voice of agreeable quality though of comparatively little power. His singing in his various recitatives and airs like that of the others, was tasteful and finished; but the lack of reserve force was plainly felt in the part of "But who may abide," "The people that walked," and in the strongly dramatic "Why do the Nations," In the last mentioned, however, he was heard at his best, and won hearty applause. Mr. Auty's work was an excellent example of what may be done with a voice which is naturally slight, and lacking in fullness and color. His delivery of "Every Valley" was smooth and showed artistic ability, and his expressive singing of "Behold and see" won for him deserved applause. In "Thou shalt break them," however, his artistic violence was of a very mild sort.

The orchestral playing was much better than is usually the case at the oratorio performances. There was little of that perfunctory "sawing out" of the accompaniments, and the quality of tone produced was worthy of the players. The "Pastoral Symphony" was charmingly played, although the overture displayed considerable groping round in the dark. Altogether a noteworthy performance.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 28, 1891.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert given last Saturday night at Music Hall was a change from the preceding ones of the season, inasmuch as the programme was strictly classical, with no soloist, and composed of three numbers only—Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony." Mr. Nikisch seemed to take special pride in this programme, which was very much of the nature of Christmas music, for the rendering of these numbers was such as to call for it the heartiest approval of the audience. The concerto was written for a strong quartet and two choirs of horns, two oboes and two bassoons. The work of the oboes in the tempo ordinario was exquisitely finished. The whole composition, heard for the first time at the concerts, is full of new effects that are very pleasing.

The "Parsifal" prelude has been heard here three times, its last hearing at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert in '89. It opens with a broad melodic phrase, which is sung later in the great scene of the Lord's supper. The entrance of the theme was not over-excellent; there was a falling short of the sustained effect so perfectly obtained in the adagio and finale of the Ocean symphony. The restless mood of the audience had undoubtedly much to do with this, for utter silence is absolutely necessary to a full enjoyment of the "Parsifal" music.

The whole beauty of the Ocean symphony lies in its first grand number. The succeeding themes do not make the same favorable impression. Mr. Nikisch showed most painstaking work with his orchestra in this number; its rendition was masterly and the effect of the harp was exquisite. It was beyond mere praise.

Saturday evening's programme will consist of Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, Schubert's entr' acte "Rosamunde" and Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major. Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloists.
~~~

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One disappointment was in store for the attendants upon the ninth Symphony concert—the withdrawal of the concerto for violin and viola, which was to have been played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but was given up on account of their illness. For this—and by the way, the programme was all from Mozart and in his honor—was substituted the Masonic funeral music, an announcement of rather lugubrious and ominous cast being made from the stage to the effect that "on account" of the illness just mentioned this sombre selection would be given. But apart from this change the whole evening was one of pleasantness and grace. It is good to hear for an hour or two the exquisite melodies, the rare harmonies, the wonderful orchestral effects and the pure, various human feeling of Mozart, in these grim days when mysticism and trigonometric proportion are sought to be foisted upon the world as the true essence of music, cold calculation is preferred to inspiration, and clangor or twiddling is declared to be the acme of expressiveness. Mr. Nikisch led the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony in an entirely sympathetic manner, not making simplicity trivial or overcharging sentiment. What the Funeral music—like some other pages of the master's work—would be if one could evolve from the past the gloomy horn upon which Mozart relied for his most sepulchral sounds, will probably never be known again; but this reading was good and grave. Mme. Fursch-Madi—in hearing whom once more there was great content—sang from "Don Giovanni" the largo scene, "Or sai che l'onore," and from "The Marriage of Figaro," the air "Dove sono," with that deeply dramatic feeling and in that beautifully balanced style which placed her long ago among great vocal artists. Quiet, sustained and suave in tone, but firm, sincere and direct in expression, she brought a new proof—ah, how sadly needed in these degenerate and careless days!—that the beauty of mere delivery and the fulness of meaning and emotion should meet together whenever there is to be true vocal art.

The programme for tonight needs no soloists, for it consists only of three orchestral works. Two of these are new here—Handel's concerto in F-major for strings and a double wind choir and Rubinstein's fourth, or "Dramatic," symphony. Between these will be placed the prelude to "Parsifal."

Since Mr. George H. Wilson's departure for Chicago, there to assume the secretaryship of the musical department of the World's Fair, the compilation of the notes for the programme Bulletin has been assumed by Mr. Philip Hale, who is sure to make his pages brilliant, diversified and rich with the instructive fruits of knowledge and research.

~~~~ Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch gave a reception on Monday evening.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 27, 1891.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony.

The Symphony concert of last evening commended itself to the students and those skilled in music rather than to those whose inclinations are not ultra classical. There was no soloist on the programme, and there were but three numbers given—Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments in F major, Wagner's prelude to the "Parsifal" and Rubinstein's Ocean symphony. The interpretation of these numbers by the fine orchestra under Conductor Nikisch was such as to meet with the heartiest approval, and, as usual, the applause was not lacking after each selection.

The concerto of Handel was written for a strong quartet and two choirs of two horns, two oboes and two bassoons. The work is full of the characteristics of the author. Handel was constantly striving for new effects in his compositions, and this work being most interesting in that direction.

The prelude to the "Parsifal" had its third presentation at the Symphony concerts in this city. It was last given at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert, May 23, 1889. Like all of the preludes of this author, it is immediately suggestive of the play, and one hears the melody that is sung in the great religious scene of the first act in the mystic feast, the Lord's Supper. The simple succession of harmonies and the soft and sweet accompaniments that follow are eloquent with expression of the development of the drama. Now the music impresses the auditor as that of a hidden orchestra, and again there is the sound as if of voices of children which occurs in the finale of the first act. The music broadens in the fourth theme, representing the sufferings of Christ, and here the whole orchestra is brought into play. The beauties of the production were finely delineated by the orchestra.

Last on the programme was the Ocean symphony of Rubinstein. The beauty of this work lies in its grand first number, so replete with melody and originality and so characteristic of the hand of a master hand. The succeeding themes do not lend themselves to such favorable impression, and about them there is a diversity of opinion. The standard of the first theme is not maintained, and the effect is disappointing to the auditor.

Messrs. C. M. Loeffler (violin) and Franz Kneisel (viola) will be the soloists at the next public rehearsal on Friday and concert on Saturday, and the following programme will be performed:

Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola (first movement), cadenza by Hellmesberger (first time at these concerts); Schubert's Entr'acte, "Rosamunde;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

[83]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1891

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony concert of the season at Music hall, Saturday evening, Dec. 19, was devoted to the memory of Wolfgang Amodius Mozart. The programme was:

Overture to "Die Zauberflote."
Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," from "Don Giovanni."
Masonic Funeral Music.
Aria: "Dove sono," from "Le nozze di Figaro."
Symphony in E Flat.
Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer.

One thing has been accomplished since Mozart's time, marking an advance in musical appreciation. Think of the greatest genius this world has produced dying in abject poverty and want; think of a devoted wife constantly watching at his bedside, administering stimulants, with encouraging words to keep him alive till his last great work, "Requiem," could be finished; think of the very few attendants at his funeral, and Potter's field for a burial place, without a stone, nor even a marked stick of wood, to show where his grave is. What a contrast is here presented by the present state of things. Genius is now worshiped; talent, both good and inferior, is now rewarded with some measure of liberality. If poor Mozart and his devoted wife could have been fed and feasted on the fat of the land he would have lived longer and been a much happier man. But he lived too early to be appreciated or rewarded by the deeds of men, and it would seem that his God called him home early, that He might take better care of him.

The orchestra did the best they could with the music set before them, a rather difficult programme to make interesting; and, with some of the orchestra under the weather with the prevailing disease, the influenza, comment may be spared.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, was the soloist, performing her work acceptably, brilliantly, as she always does. She has many friends in Boston, which was very apparent when she made her appearance on the stage and also at the completion of her two songs.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall last evening was: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal;" Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic (first time).

Lillian Nordica made such a distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera house on forty eight hours' notice that it secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras, in F., Handel (first time); Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner, and the original version of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony. These selections made a curious and not very harmonious combination. The chief point of interest was the Handel work, which was a surprise in the solidity and rich effect of its orchestration. Much of it was as full and as sonorous as if it had been scored yesterday by a follower of the modern school, and the marvel of it is that so much should be accomplished by such simple means. As evidenced in this work, Handel could write wonderfully well for the orchestra when he desired to do so. The brief but lovely Largo is an example in point. It is broadly, richly and impressively arranged, and shows a fine appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments. The fifth movement, a species of minuet, is beautiful in its theme and delightful in its orchestration, the florid dialogue between the solo oboes being exquisite. There must have been fine players of the oboe and horn in Handel's time or such difficult bravura passages as are heard in this movement would not have been written. The oboe solos were played with charming grace and beautiful finish of technique. This concerto shows that there was no slight knowledge of orchestral effect before Haydn and Mozart, and that Handel did not need a Berlioz or a Wagner to teach him close and massive scoring. The work was listened to with unalloyed pleasure, and was enthusiastically applauded. We trust that it may be heard here again at no distant date It was well worth the reviving, not only for the freshness and interest of the music, but as an example of Handel's masterly use of the orchestra. The "Parsifal" music was well played, but it is tiresome and unmeaning in itself, and is incoherent unless it be followed with a full elucidation on the programme. The symphony was well read and brilliantly, though at times roughly played. At the next concert will be given Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound;" the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin, viola, and orchestra, by Mozart; the Entr'Acte to Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the Symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel are to be the soloists.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS OF CHRISTMAS WEEK.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S PERFORMANCE OF THE "MESSIAH"—THE

Handel, Wagner and Rubinsteinwere the giants that were grouped together in the tenth Symphony programme.

A concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, by Handel, was the opening number. Much credit is due Mr. Nikisch for rescuing this work from oblivion, and performing it with some modifications, for the first time in Boston. The programme book tells us that the date of its composition, as well as that of its first performance is unknown to history. In its original form it contained nine movements; that is, two measures of a ninth movement were found in the manuscript, the remaining pages being lost, or perhaps never written. Six movements were played at this concert, although the first two were connected in the form of an introduction and allegro. In order to give the work properly some changes in the orchestra were necessary. Two extra oboe players were called into service, and the second pair of horns was placed at the right of the bassoons, among the 'cellos and double basses. The bassoons, of which there were also four, thus came between the horns, the clarinets not being in the score at all.

Those who are acquainted with the works of Handel can imagine the character of this music more easily than it can be described, for it is thoroughly Handelian. The movements bear these titles: Pomposo, allegro, allegro ma non troppo, largo, a tempo ordinario, allegro. The introduction and the largo are broad and dignified and rich in harmony, while the others are delightfully quaint and fascinating. In the second and last allegros the horns are used in a charmingly effective manner. The last in gigue form opening with a passage which is given out by the first horns and repeated by the seconds, is especially attractive. In the second and fifth movements the oboes are the prominent feature; while throughout the entire work the strings are constantly employed either as leading or accompanying instruments. The work was well worth the trouble of the preparation involved. That it was enjoyed by the audience was evident from the spontaneous applause which most of the movements evoked.

Why the prelude to "Parsifal" was made the go-between of this concerto and the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein is one of those things that, we dare say, few fellows, at the most, can find out. It is a riddle which even those few will in all probability scarcely take the trouble to guess at this time of year, when every one wants a holiday mentally as well as bodily. The prelude was played magnificently, however, and Mr. Nikisch amply demonstrated the intensity of his admiration for Wagner, and the greatness of his powers as a conductor as well.

If the Ocean symphony were placed first on a programme, it would be a satisfaction to hear it given in its entirety whenever it is given at all. But a seven movement work for a final number is a little too much; therefore it was a happy thought to perform it as it originally left the hands of its composer.

What a glorious movement is the first! The finale, too, after an evident falling off in inspiration in the two middle movements, shows that Rubinstein made a herculean effort to create a movement that should be a fit companion of the first. It is a melancholy fact, however, that he only partly succeeded. The symphony was played in a manner worthy of the work by conductor and orchestra; and of all the players, no one so completely distinguished himself as did our virtuoso of the kettledrums.

"THE MESSIAH."

The six hundred and eightieth concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, making the commencement of the seventy-seventh season, was given in Music Hall last Sunday evening. "The Messiah" was sung, with Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano, Miss Lena Little, alto, Mr. Leonard E. Auty, tenor, and Mr. Barrington Foote, bass, as soloists, Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Lang were in their accustomed places. The orchestra was led by Mr. Roth, in the place of Mr. Kneisel, who was ill, and the trumpet solo was played by Mr. Pierre Muller.

It is a pleasure to be able to state that the singing of the chorus was as a whole far superior to any that it has done during the past few years. An air of certainty pervaded its work throughout the evening. The attacks were prompt and decisive, most of the difficult runs and other contrapuntal passages were fluently and clearly rendered, and the finales were given with a fullness of tone that indicated an abundance of reserve force. These important details, together with the great gains apparent in quality of tone, balance of parts and expressiveness in phrasing, point to the accession of a large number of members who possess intelligence as well as a mere taste for music, and to the absence of a very considerable number who had nothing but their enthusiasm to recommend them to membership of this great choral body. All this is exceedingly gratifying. It proves that the present management is wide awake and has the real interest of the society at heart.

To refer at length to the singing of the various choruses is unnecessary. In "For unto us a child is born," smoothness, delightfully free enunciation and genuine musical feeling were especially noticeable, although these comments apply almost as closely to "Behold The Lamb." "His yoke is easy" was fine in strength and breadth, and "Hallelujah," though lacking somewhat in fire and sonority, was yet inspiriting and uplifting.

Of the soloists, one thing may be said which applies to each with more or less directness: while the singing of all four gave ample evidence of earnest consideration of the nature of oratorio work in general, and of much thought and study over their respective parts in particular, there was comparatively little in it that indicated the possession of deep emotional natures, or that was calculated to arouse the emotions of an oratorio audience. With the exception of certain touches here and there which had the true ring, the expression which pervaded their singing was of that nature that results from conscientious endeavor, and an excellent understanding of the principles of broad and artistic phrasing.

From this point of view, however, most of the solo singing was exceptionally good. The degree in which different listeners are affected by musical performances that are devoid of the element of greatness must always vary widely. To us, Miss Littles singing was the most appealing and convincing. In spite of the habit she has of excessively prolonging sustained tones, which she has evidently adopted as a means of expression, but which, when frequently indulged in, merges into monotony, much that she did was more than tinged with true feeling. This was plainly apparent in her rendering of "He was despised;" and a more dramatic delivery of the middle portion of that air would have placed the whole on a high plane of artistic performance. Mrs. Nordica's singing was much more serious in intention and finished in execution than any we have ever heard from her before. The recitative, "There were shepherds," was intelligently and expressively given, and "Rejoice greatly" was sung in a thoroughly charming and unaffected manner. In "I know that my Redeemer liveth" the best qualities of her naturally beautiful voice were freely displayed, and her version of the air, if it was not wholly satisfying, at least seemed imbued with sincerity.

Mr. Foote displayed a voice of agreeable quality though of comparatively little power. His singing in his various recitatives and airs like that of the others, was tasteful and finished; but the lack of reserve force was plainly felt in the part of "But who may abide," "The people that walked," and in the strongly dramatic "Why do the Nations," In the last mentioned, however, he was heard at his best, and won hearty applause. Mr. Auty's work was an excellent example of what may be done with a voice which is naturally slight, and lacking in fullness and color. His delivery of "Every Valley" was smooth and showed artistic ability, and his expressive singing of "Behold and see" won for him deserved applause. In "Thou shalt break them," however, his artistic violence was of a very mild sort.

The orchestral playing was much better than is usually the case at the oratorio performances. There was little of that perfunctory "sawing out" of the accompaniments, and the quality of tone produced was worthy of the players. The "Pastoral Symphony" was charmingly played, although the overture displayed considerable groping round in the dark. Altogether a noteworthy performance.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 28, 1891.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert given last Saturday night at Music Hall was a change from the preceding ones of the season, inasmuch as the programme was strictly classical, with no soloist, and composed of three numbers only—Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony." Mr. Nikisch seemed to take special pride in this programme, which was very much of the nature of Christmas music, for the rendering of these numbers was such as to call for it the heartiest approval of the audience. The concerto was written for a strong quartet and two choirs of horns, two oboes and two bassoons. The work of the oboes in the tempo ordinario was exquisitely finished. The whole composition, heard for the first time at the concerts, is full of new effects that are very pleasing.

The "Parsiful" prelude has been heard here three times, its last hearing at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert in '89. It opens with a broad melodic phrase, which is sung later in the great scene of the Lord's supper. The entrance of the theme was not over-excellent; there was a falling short of the sustained effect so perfectly obtained in the adagio and finale of the Ocean symphony. The restless mood of the audience had undoubtedly much to do with this, for utter silence is absolutely necessary to a full enjoyment of the "Parsiful" music.

The whole beauty of the Ocean symphony lies in its first grand number. The succeeding themes do not make the same favorable impression. Mr. Nikisch showed most painstaking work with his orchestra in this number; its rendition was masterly and the effect of the harp was exquisite. It was beyond mere praise.

Saturday evening's programme will consist of Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, Schubert's entr' acte "Rosamunde" and Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major. Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloists.
~~~~

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

An Important Work Heard for the First Time.

The Composer Often the Expression of His Age.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, Handel; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony (original version).

This Handel concerto was a novelty, and a refreshing one. We know but little of its history, although Rockstro and Chrysander have rummaged manuscripts and records. It is written for string quartette and two choirs of wind instruments, consisting each of two horns, two oboes and a bassoon There are nine movements, and this number in the version used by Mr. Nikisch is reduced to five. It is a remarkably strong and effective work, and in certain respects the instrumental combinations are modern, or this statement may be reversed, and it may be said that the grouping together of instrumental families and using them antiphonally, one against the other, is evidently not a modern invention. In his earlier days, and when he was in Italy, Handel taxed the skill of the solo violinists; in this concerto he set a task of no mean difficulty before his horn and oboe players. It is true that there are figures and passages that are familiar to students of his oratorios and his organ concertos; but as a whole the work is one of amazing freshness. The mannerisms of Handel are to be found; just as they are found in the works of all great composers. They serve as the flourish that in former days was added to a signature. They are perhaps old-fashioned; but the mannerisms of our modern composers may excite the same comment a hundred years from now. In this work they do not annoy by their constant recurrence; and there is more than once a deliberate harmonic surprise, as though Handel had thought to himself, "They will say that I have a trick of rounding my sentences in one and the same way. But this surely is a change." So in its harmonic structure and in its sense of instrumental color the concerto was a genuine surprise to many who thought they knew their Handel.

This music of Handel is at least one hundred and fifty years old. Our advanced friends of the modern school do not deny that the old maker of operas and oratorios was possessed of a certain rude strength, a vigorous rhythm, contrapuntal ingenuity and a pleasing melody that was too often choked by the rigid bands of formalism. They are men of to-day, and they would not probably exchange the prelude to "Parsifal" for the whole voluminous baggage of Handel. But how will the men of 1990 look upon "Parsifal," or will they have even the opportunity?

I have more than once in these columns hinted at the absurdity of comparing together musicians of different centuries or even generations. To solemnly weigh Handel and Wagner in the scales and then pronounce judgment is opposed to the spirit and the canons of modern criticism. The one, as well as the other, was an expression of his time. That is to say, each was in a way ahead of his time, but certain features, certain feelings of each century found fullest expression in the music of the one and in that of the other. Handel was bitterly accused in the English prose and poetry of his day of giving "sound and show, instead of sense." His pathetic melodies were characterized by some as "smooth stupidity," as "sing-songs." At the same time there is much that is essentially English in Handel's music after he abandoned the operatic stage. We know the character of the people he lived among from memoirs and journals. We know what they ate and drank. Their amusements, their conversations, are familiar to us. Their roughness, coarseness, brutality are always painfully present to students of the manners and customs of that century. The satires upon Handel's operas and his opera singers are often couched in the foulest language. The Grand Duke of Chandos, Handel's patron, was warmly praised for buying his third wife from her husband, a groom, who was in the habit of beating her. But, in spite of the many faults of the people, there was a certain manliness, a frank self-reliance, a belief in a special Providence for Englishmen, an indefinable enjoyment in all things that were out of doors, and these qualities or characteristics are found in the fresh and virile music of Handel, as in this concerto, for example. Above all, it was not an age of diseased nerves. The real lovers of music in Handel's time were simply moved by apparently simple means.

When Wagner wrote "Parsifal" he had exhausted in his music the passion of love as it is commonly understood. His philosophy, and perhaps his age, led him to meditate upon the expression in music of self-abnegation, of self-immolation. And the prelude to "Parsifal," taken in connection with the music-drama that follows, is intended to prepare the hearer for what is to come, to put him in the mood. When this prelude is given upon the concert stage, and when it is stripped of its conditions, it becomes merely music pure and simple without symbolical meaning. The composer may say "I mean this and I mean that," but the hearer has a right to reply, "It is not what you mean, but it is what you write that I am chiefly concerned with." It is, therefore, perhaps a great injustice to Wagner to give this prelude in the garish concert hall, for as absolute music it must seem intrinsically empty and bombastic, and worse than that, monotonous. There is a mock solemnity, there is an attempt at religious simplicity, and there is of course a violent attack upon the nerves of the hearer. But the hearer is more or less hardened, his nerves have become accustomed to the disquieting progressions that are always promising a climax and constantly disappoint. At the same time he has lost his taste for simple things; and, the child of his age, [illegible] trust or hope, he finds in the music of Wagner the most complete expression of his mental and physical condition. Perhaps he thinks it is really the only music, when suddenly a Handelian blast assails him; he finds himself drawing a long breath, and he forgets his mental speculations, and he realizes that mere healthy animal existence is not to be despised, and he may even envy secretly the man of Handel's day.

When Rubinstein led in different cities his "Ocean" symphony, his personality lent it a foreign interest, so that it often provoked enthusiasm. When it is heard in cold blood and regarded simply as a symphonic work, it loses with each hearing. By the very title it invites conjecture, and the hearer is too often busied in trying to unroll a panorama as the music is played. Rubinstein has given no programme, and the hearer may find at pleasure all objects and all phenomena above and below the surface, or all thoughts suggested by the mere contemplation of the ocean. The first movement is easily the best, and it is of grand proportions. The other movements seem to have been written at random, and Louis de Romain once suggested that Rubinstein, in making his musical voyage, was caught the second day out in a heavy fog.

The concerto was played with frankness and spirit. The work of the strings was generally to be warmly commended; the oboe solo passages were delightfully played: the horns were not always faultless in intonation or in quality of tone. The "Parsifal" prelude was played with great care, and the "Faith" motiv was most definitly proclaimed by the brass. The performance of the symphony was characterized by a brilliancy that was at times reckless.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1891.

WORLD OF MUSIC.

Echoes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme selected by Director Nikisch for the Symphony orchestra contribution to Christmas week was not of a particularly joyous nature. To tell the truth, it proved rather stupid to all but the most thoughtful and cultured of the orchestra's patrons.

It is, of course, to be publicly declared that the frequenters of these concerts are capable of appreciating all that is good in the higher class of musical composition, but the conductor, the players and the managers knew within themselves that many of those who so eagerly strive to outbid one another in paying premiums for course tickets, enjoy melody more than they do the elusive harmony of the ultra refined classics; and it is to be said to the credit of their good nature that the directors of symphony bands do occasionally submit to the wishes of these richly paying but poorly educated patrons.

Such favors should create sufficient gratitude to overcome any feeling of resentment which might ordinarily be awakened by being forced to battle with two hours of almost unconquerable drowsiness.

That the audience at the rehearsal, given on Thursday instead of Friday, and at the concert last evening, were the smallest of the season, was probably due more to the Christmas festivities than to the unattractiveness of the programme announcements.

There were three numbers on the programme, a Handel concerto for strings and wind orchestra in F major, played for the first time by this orchestra, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony. Handel's writings are always interesting, even if they are sometimes beyond the comprehension of an average auditor. His tonal pictures are so brilliantly and uniquely colored that they win unbounded admiration from those who have not the least idea of what the composer is endeavoring to portray.

It is rather surprising that the concerto in F minor has not been given here before, for it is a most impressive work, grand in solemn harmonies and pregnant with the individuality of its composer.

The prelude was magnificently played and proved a genuine treat to the audience, particularly to those who had attended the "Parsifal" performance in Music Hall last season. The "Ocean Symphony" also received thoroughly satisfactory treatment fromthe orchestra.

On next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Prometheus Bound..........Goldmark
Symphonic concerto for violin and viola (first movement)..........Mozart
Entr'acte, Rossmunde..........Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D major..........Brahms

—The "Messiah" attracted such an immense audience in the Music Hall, Sunday night, that half an hour before the performance began standing room was impossible to obtain. Mme. Nordica, the bright particular star, was in superb voice, and looked queenly all in black. The rounded decollette corsage was edged with wide black chiffon, and not a jewel of any kind was worn. For this reason, doubtless, Mme. Nordica's great personal loveliness shone forth with heightened effect. Miss Little was in mauve satin and white lace. In the vast audience, which was unusually fashionable, were noted: Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. O. W. Peabody, with her nephew Dr. John Homans, Mr. and Mrs. J. Grafton Minot, Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Sprague, Mrs. R. C. Hooper, Mr. William Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mrs. C. E. Inches, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Maud Howe Elliot, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. Pierson Beebe, Lieut. and Mrs. Ruxton, Mr. W. G. Russell and his daughter, Miss Marion Russell, Dr. Richard Sprague, Mr. Frank Beebe, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Osgood, Rev. W. H. Lyon, Mrs. B. J. Lang and daughter, Mr. Henrich Meyn, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Clapp, Mr. W. F. Baldwin, Mr. Eugene Greenleaf, Prof. and Mrs. Royce of Cambridge, and Mr. Roger N. Allen.

—Madame Nordica spent Christmas with her sister, Mrs. W. F. Baldwin, at Dorchester.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 28, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, which was a purely orchestral one, did not redound to the credit of the organization which gave it, for there were not only misreadings, but a degree of noisy roughness that spoiled more than one movement. The programme began with a novelty,—but a very old one,—a Concerto by Handel which had never been heard in our concerts before. It may be remembered that the clarinet was not used in Handel's day, and that therefore there was a degree of attachment to the oboes and bassoons which can scarcely be fully realized by modern musicians. This prominence of oboe was the great characteristic of the tone-color of the present concerto, and the most effective playing in it was the duet between two oboes in the fourth movement, which was executed without a flaw in spite of difficulties as great as ever appear in any modern work. Scarcely less difficult, and scarcely less perfect in rendering, were the horn passages of the finale, a charming Gigue. The first movements were roughly played, but the work was full of interest, and showed that there was a fairly good standard of tone coloring even in the early days of orchestral writing, for Bach and Handel may be considered as the very pioneers of orchestral thought.

To put Handel's work in immediate propinquity to the prelude to "Parsifal" was just to neither of the compositions, although it may have been the conductor's purpose to show the inception and the culmination of orchestral scoring, side by side. Be that as it may, the proximity was unwise, and the contrast far too sharp. The great flaw of the concert was the manner in which the Wagner work was performed; here at least, no apologist can urge the permissibility of freedom of conception, for Wagner is of today, he has directed his own work, he has authorized representatives and successors who perpetuate those details of tempo, shading and execution, which he took such care in evolving, and no one has a right to meddle with the minutiæ as established at Bayreuth. It must have been a surprise then to any musician who had heard the "Abendmahls-thema" sigh out at the first of the performance in the German theatre, to find this dreamy touch transformed into a cyclone in the opening measures of this performance.

In one respect, however, it may be acknowledged that our orchestra distanced the orchestra of Bayreuth; it played louder than any band that Wagner, or Richter, or Levy, or Mottl ever led; the onslaught on "Parsifal" made the Bayreuthian fortissimi seem very puny indeed; the kettle-drummer played as if he were thinking of Haydn's "Suprise Symphony"; the brasses thundered the "Glaubes-thema" in deafening fury, and the prelude was carried by assault. If the witlings of the paragraphic press are right, if Wagner is noise pure and simple, then this may be classed as the very best performance this prelude has ever received, but if one demands something of coherency, a degree of shading rather than wild extremes, and a trifle of accuracy in ensemble then the praise may turn to emphatic censure. It is wonderful that a man as musically gifted as our conductor, who has heard the prelude performed in its best form, should have given such a hurly-burly of sound in its place, and it is strange that our orchestra, which has even a week ago, done fairly good work, should so entirely lose all sense of unity and effective attack.

The ensemble of the "Ocean Symphony" was not much better, but here, at least, the elan of the chief theme of the first movement was grandly given, and the heavy crescendos led up to the solid climaxes at the re-entrances of this chief theme after development and in the effective coda. The second movement was rather coarsely played, and the symphony, after the first movement (which deserved praise), sank to the noisy vulgarity of the preceding performance. A word of commendation may be spoken for the execution of the florid piccolo passages, and the ugly tones of the muted horn made their due effect in the finale. The end was as loud as Gilmore himself could have achieved, and then

Silence like a poultice came To heal the blows of Sound.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three works, each with strongly distinctive peculiarities, made up the programme for the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, last Saturday night. These were:

Handel—Concerto for strings and the wind orchestras in F major. First time.
Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal."
Rubinstein — Ocean Symphony. Original version.

For the opportunity to hear the Handel concerto, a thousand thanks. As explained in the programme book, six of the original nine movements (only a fragment of the ninth being in existence, by the way) have been taken and newly arranged into five movements. The scoring is for very simple appliances, judged from a modern standpoint—string quartet and two groups of wind instruments, each including horns, oboes and bassoons in pairs. Not even a flute for sweetness, a trombone for weight, or drums and cymbals to startle you with a momentary crash. But how delightful it all is! How clear the themes, how rich the harmony, and how expressive the instrumentation, despite its apparent poverty of color! A duet for oboes in the fourth movement so pleased the audience that its repetition was almost demanded. The entire work is an illustration of the rule in art that it is not what you use for material or means that brings success, as how you use it. Hearty and spontaneous applause followed each movement, testifying as much to the refined taste of the hearers as to the masterful performance which this most interesting work received. The wholesome breeziness of both concerto and performance was most refreshing and inspiriting.

It would have been hardly possible to follow Handel's work with one more strongly contrasted in every element than is the prelude to "Parsifal." In the first we had pure form, crystaline in its integrity, with color sparingly but effectively used. From Wagner we had elaborate interweaving of forms, requiring closest attention from the listener to detect their outline, while all the hues and tints known to modern musicians are laid on with greatest lavishness. The prelude, however, has now been heard in Music Hall often enough—at least four times previous to this occasion—for our amateurs to acquire a knowledge of its nature, so that its intricacies have lost some of their perplexity. It was played with splendid warmth, a warmth that was developed into a white heat at moments when some of the dreamy nature and reposefulness of the work seemed to be needlessly sacrificed.

Of Rubinstein's symphony it is again to be said that the first movement is superb, and its power over the hearer suffers no loss by repetition. But all that follows again appears labored. Why it should be called an "Ocean" symphony may well be a mystery, as the composer has given no catalogue of sea views depicted or of marine emotions experienced. Every hearer is, therefore, left to his own resources, if he cares for a translation. Were the possible intentions of the composer distinctly perceptible, the symphony might be grouped with Rossini's overture to "William Tell" as an illustration of an artist's power to paint in tones scenes and a life with which he had no sympathy, if indeed he had not an actual aversion for them. Rubinstein, they say, has for the sea an almost invincible repugnance; while as for Rossini, who can imagine him in entirely agreeable surroundings elsewhere than at a luxuriously served dinner in the heart of Paris where there was no hint of Swiss mountains other than the ice in the wine-cooler?

The programme for the eleventh concert, to be given next Saturday night, is: Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart—Symphonic concerto for violin and viola, first movement; Schubert—Entr'acte from "Rosamunde;" Brahms—Second symphony. Mr. Loeffler will be the violinist, and Mr. Kneisel the violist. The first concert of the Young People's Popular Series is announced for Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 6. Seats are for sale at the ticket office.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1891.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Sander's Theatre, Cambridge, will be given tomorrow night. This is the programme: Wagner, "A Faust overture;" Loeffler, suite for violin and orchestra, first, third and fourth movements, Mr. Loeffler solo violin; Goldmark, suite, "A Rustic Wedding."

Miss Adele aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell are engaged for the first of the Young People's Popular concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 6. Seats for this occasion are ready at the ticket office.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1891.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The fourth concert of the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place this evening at Sanders Theatre, when the following programme will be given: A Faust overture, Wagner; suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, DEC. 31.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its fourth concert at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist, and the programme as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1891.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give its fourth concert at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist. The programme in full is as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1891.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place this evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, when the following programme will be given: A Faust overture, Wagner; suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 31, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER. A FAUST OVERTURE.

C. M. LOEFFLER. SUITE for VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine."
Introduction and Pastorale.—Dumka.—Finale.

GOLDMARK. SYMPHONY, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26.
WEDDING MARCH, with Variations.—Moderato molto.—
BRIDAL SONG.—Allegretto.—
SERENADE.—Allegretto moderato scherzando.—
IN THE GARDEN.—Andante.—
DANCE.—Finale, Allegro molto.

SOLOIST:

Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

[illegible]

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the best programmes of the season thus far was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sander's Theatre, in Cambridge, last evening. It was made up of three numbers, "Wagner's Faust Overture," Mr. C. M. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillies de l'Ukraine," and Goldmark's beautiful symphony, "Rustic Wedding." The audience was large, but cold and unresponsive, and even Mr. Loeffler's fine rendering of his own work failed to bring forth the enthusiasm it merited. The Goldmark Symphony did produce a small amount of excitement, but the entire performance was admirable and deserved hearty applause. The wedding march in the symphony was exquisitely played, and great credit is due the basses and 'cellos for the fine effect produced in the opening measures. The next concert in the series will take place Jan. 21.

VIVIAN.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Wednesday Afternoon, January 6, 1892, at 2.30.

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
MISS MAUD POWELL.

Programme.

OVERTURE. "King Lear." . . . . . . Littolff
(First time.)

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE. . . . . Tschaikowsky
Miss AUS DER OHE.

a) "DANSE ET MARCHE DES GNOMES." . . Reginald de Koven
(First time.)

b) PAGINA D' AMORE. . . . . . F. van der Stucken
(First time.)

c) A CARNIVAL SCENE. . . . . . . Arthur Bird
(First time.)

RONDO CAPRICCIOSO FOR VIOLIN. . . . . Saint-Saens
Miss POWELL.

BALLET MUSIC. "Le Cid." . . . . . . Massenet

TICKETS with reserved seats 50c, 75c, and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891--92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 31, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.	A FAUST OVERTURE.
C. M. LOEFFLER.	SUITE for VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Dumka.—Finale.
GOLDMARK.	SYMPHONY, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26. WEDDING MARCH, with Variations.—Moderato molto.— BRIDAL SONG.—Allegretto.— SERENADE.—Allegretto moderato scherzando.— IN THE GARDEN.—Andante.— DANCE.—Finale, Allegro molto.

SOLOIST:

Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the best programmes of the season thus far was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sander's Theatre, in Cambridge, last evening. It was made up of three numbers, "Wagner's Faust Overture," Mr. C. M. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillies de l'Ukraine," and Goldmark's beautiful symphony, "Rustic Wedding." The audience was large, but cold and unresponsive, and even Mr. Loeffler's fine rendering of his own work failed to bring forth the enthusiasm it merited. The Goldmark Symphony did produce a small amount of excitement, but the entire performance was admirable and deserved hearty applause. The wedding march in the symphony was exquisitely played, and great credit is due the basses and 'cellos for the fine effect produced in the opening measures. The next concert in the series will take place Jan. 21.

VIVIAN.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Wednesday Afternoon, January 6, 1892, at 2.30.

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
MISS MAUD POWELL.

Programme.

OVERTURE. "King Lear." (First time.)	Litolff
CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE. Miss AUS DER OHE.	Tschaikowsky
a) "DANSE ET MARCHE DES GNOMES." (First time.)	Reginald de Koven
b) PAGINA D' AMORE. (First time.)	F. van der Stucken
c) A CARNIVAL SCENE. (First time.)	Arthur Bird
RONDO CAPRICCIOSO FOR VIOLIN. Miss POWELL.	Saint-Saens
BALLET MUSIC. "Le Cid."	Massenet

TICKETS with reserved seats 50c, 75c, and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch arranged one of his oddest programmes for the tenth concert—Handel's quaint concerto for a double wind choir, each consisting of a pair of horns, oboes and bassoons, and a string quartette, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, this last being presented in its original form of only four movements, as the Handel was also condensed from nine divisions to five. The first contrast thus forced was violent and unpleasing, but the transition between the second and third was hearable enough. The Handel music was delightful to hear; its sturdiness, its honesty, its solid sense, its good humor and its uncompromising individuality were all set forth and illuminated by the orchestral treatment, which is in itself so novel, so varied,—in spite of the restricted means with which its author contented himself,—so fanciful in figure and so rich in harmony. It is music which makes one sit up straight in his seat and listen eagerly in order to miss nothing in its antiphonal and choral progress. It is music too which shows the hearer that all the pleasant and striking combinations of orchestral instruments are not summed up in the pages of Berlioz, Wagner, Meyerbeer and their students and imitators, and which delights and surprises him constantly with something which he has never heard or imagined before. And if it sounds thus to modern ears, what astonishing audacity of invention must it not have suggested to those listeners of a century and a half ago, who were always looking askance at Handel as a fellow who was forever on the point of breaking out with something abnormal and unconventional? The orchestra played most of it very well, and the horns and oboes acquitted themselves with remarkable ability. The "Parsifal" was not all given as it should be, its mystical, reflective moods—which are what we most depend upon to atone for its wandering movement and loose rhetorical construction — being broken up again and again by loud assertiveness and bustling sonority. Of the symphony the first movement, which is the best and most satisfactory, got commendable handling, but the others were irregularly read, while in almost all of them that terrible kettle-drummer seemed to have the impression that the work was meant to be a solo for him with an obbligato orchestral accompaniment.

Tonight the Mozart symphonic concerto for violin and viola, which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel were not well enough to play a fortnight ago, will be given; the overture will be Goldmark's "Prometheus Unbound" and the symphony Brahms's second; the entr'acte music in Schubert's "Rosamunde" will also be played.

YOUNG FOLKS' POPULARS.

No afternoon concerts are more welcome to the general public than those which are given—only too seldom—at Music Hall under the name of the Young Folks' Populars. They correspond about as nearly to that title as the modern Youth's Companion does to its caption, but they are always delightful and good, attracting the young, the middle-aged and even the old in pretty well balanced proportions. The first of this season is announced for Wednesday afternoon next, when a thoroughly fine programme is to be presented. All the details have not reached us as we go to press, but we know that many of the numbers are to be from American pens, new things by Mr. Van der Stücken and Mr. Bird being among them. A selection from the "Cid" of Massanet will also be played, and that the solo numbers will be splendidly attractive is assured by the engagement for them of Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening opened with Goldmark's pretentious but garish and somewhat blatant overture "Prometheus Bound." The work is no more clear in meaning on a second hearing than it was on the first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as impressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as striking, but what the music says by way of illustration of Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the bird on his liver still remains a mystery to us. The composer appears to have wrestled with the subject of a tremendous tone picture that presented itself to his imagination, but the only outcome appears to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color on his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color frenzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily comprehended design. It was played with much fire and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness in the wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, the performance was satisfying and remarkably effective. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's Concertante in E-flat, for solo violin and viola and orchestra. The movement is broad in style and almost symphonic in seriousness, and is fairly divided between the orchestra and the solo instruments. It is full of the Mozart charm, and the solo parts are little given up to bravura display, and are for the most part of an antiphonal character. The work was thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delightful in effect. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and finish and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy with the sentiment of the music. The artists were vigorously applauded at the close of the movement, and twice recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's "Rosamunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely read and played. The whole ended with Brahms's symphony No 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at these concerts. The programme was not particularly attractive. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a rule, been dull and monotonous; but programme making is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes necessary every now and then to remind him that there is excellent music that is not music of the German school, and that a programme is not perforce classical and interesting because the solemn and the severely heavy prevails in it. The programme for the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by Mr. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, Mr. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

Musical Note.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will take place to-morrow evening. The programme is: Quartet in E flat, Carl von Dittersdorf; Quartet, B flat, op. 130, Beethoven; Octet for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos, Svendsen. Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schultz will assist.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's Overture to "Prometheus Bound."

A Few Remarks Concerning

it may be the very Prometh er an effective concert-overture, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The beautiful "Rosamunde" music is well known. The Brahms Symphony has been so often heard at these concerts that it does not call for extended comment. It is certainly one of the most genial works of the composer, and ing the playing of the "Prometheus," "Why, this is Goldmark's music."

Goldmark has given the title without adding a descriptive text. The question then is, does the music give the hearer an adequate idea of the great tragedy of Æschylus? It is not necessary to examine the details, to pry curiously, in the hope of finding the chaining of the enemy of Zeus, the comfort vainly brought by the Oceanides, the gnawing of the eternal vulture, the plaint of the wandering Io, the combined attack of the elements upon the heaven-defying sufferer. But does the music rise in tragic grandeur to the level of the play? Is it filled with the spirit of Æschylus, that moves us so deeply even when filtered through the baldest, most prosaic translation? No, it must be confessed that there is a sublimity in the first and in the last speech of Prometheus that Goldmark with all his imagination has not rivaled. Try as he may, let him call upon the brass to do the bravest, let him goad the strings to fury, he is to Æschylus as the explosion of cannon crackers to the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." In spite of modern theories, music is not an interchangeable art. There are emotions, there are phenomena that are better expressed in prose, poetry or painting than in music. And nobler, more impassioned music is often suggested by the writer or painter than is in the power of the musician to invent.

Goldmark called it "Prometheus." He might as well have called it "Hamlet" or "Orestes" or "Napoleon." He chose "Prometheus," and, therefore, necessarily put himself in comparison with the Grecian poet. But let us not insist upon this point. For without giving a detailed programme, Goldmark has indicated by the title both to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it."

which shows great broadness of treatment. It consists of three movements but only the first movement was rendered by these artists, whose merits are so nearly equal.

The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus Bound," brought out all the best points of the orchestra. It was first played at these concerts Nov. 1, 1890. As an orchestral study it is a masterpiece, for it is full of changing combinations and varying effects.

As a delightful change from the Mozart concerto to the Brahms symphony no better choice could have been than that of Schubert's entr'acte, "Rosamunde." This entr'acte in B flat is in the form of an air with two trios, each of which contains delightful passages for wind instruments. It was heard here last in October, 1889.

A grand ending to the programme was found in the Brahms symphony, No. 2, in D major, consisting of four movements. Brahms as a composer, like Browning as a poet, is understood and appreciated by the few. Musicians like him for the masterly way in which he works up his themes and reaches a climax. His compositions are always bringing surprising effects in shade and tone, and for that reason are difficult to render. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this particular symphony was a happy one and the orchestra responded to his idea in a spirited manner.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will precede Schuman's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text of which will be read by George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Wilhelm Heinrich, Heinrich Meyer, Gardner S. Lamson, Sullivan A. Sargent, Ivan Morawski and a chorus from the Cecilia Club.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1892.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

y concert last night at-nal, large and interested Music Hall, where Director a varied and interesting luding selections from t, Schubert and Brahms.
s very felicitous in his in-Goldmark's overture, and stra a wide range of oppor-ctive play and dramatic honic concerto for violin ich Messrs. Loeffler and d as soloists, was listened terest, as it was new at d was probably heard for Boston by such a large

ht lends itself more to the rful skill in the manipula-than to the elucidation of melody. The movements nd at times suggestive of while both Loeffler and d brilliant talent in their violin and the viola. It was ed at the end, but it was of the conception than the the execution, and the of the audience was a der what was really a diffi-on the part of the soloists.
t of a relief to hear Schuf "Rosamunde," and the rise and fall of sound ming effect. The orchesbest in elucidating these es, with which it is preghe abrupt changes of tem-thm that was very pleashony No. 2, in D major, a dull and uninteresting he allegro is reminiscent s reminiscent and unsatis-plaintive notes contain to give it dramatic effect, hich would make it attrac-

to obtrude here and there, dea that the composer's more receptive of other's originally creative. It tunities, though, for the orn, while Nikisch's interded to it a vivacity and ently destitute in others' theme. It improved marllegretto, where the charm ccati merges into a del melody which continues ovement till it winds up though rapid finale. played with remarkable isch's leading was chariginality and ingenuity.
ncert the programme is:
hed symphony; Schu-Byron's "Manfred." The be Mmes. Arthur Nikisch man, and Messrs. Wilhelm er S. Lamson, Heinrich wski and Sullivan A. Sar-
Riddle will read the text.

Symphony Concert.

Young People's popular
he Boston Symphony given in Music Hall next oon at 2.30 o'clock. The s Adele Aus Der Ohe, and is an interesting one, and ........................Littolff rte..........Tschaikowsky s Aus Der Ohe.

Gnomes...Reginald de Koven
..............F. van der Stucken
....................Arthur Bird or violin..........Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
.........................Massenet tion of the piano concerto ado and the ballet music, ons have not before been mphony orchestra.

The Kneisel quartet will give its third concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening. The program will be as follows: Quartet in E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B flat major, op. 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for this concert.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

Mme. Nordica and the Kneisel quartet will give a concert at the opera house in New Bedford, Jan. 7.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,
NEW BEDFORD,
Thursday Evening, January 7,
AT EIGHT.

Under the Management of
C. A. ELLIS.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch arranged one of his oddest programmes for the tenth concert—Handel's quaint concerto for a double wind choir, each consisting of a pair of horns, oboes and bassoons, and a string quartette, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, this last being presented in its original form of only four movements, as the Handel was also condensed from nine divisions to five. The first contrast thus forced was violent and unpleasing, but the transition between the second and third was hearable enough. The Handel music was delightful to hear; its sturdiness, its honesty, its solid sense, its good humor and its uncompromising individuality were all set forth and illuminated by the orchestral treatment, which is in itself so novel, so varied,—in spite of the restricted means with which its

---

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's Overture to "Prometheus Bound."

A Few Remarks Concerning Local Color,

---

it may be the very Prometheus … for an effective concert-overture, too long, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The beautiful "Rosamunde" music is well known. The Brahms Symphony has been so often heard at these concerts that it does not call for extended comment. It is certainly one of the most genial works of the composer, and, with the exception of the second movement, it is crowded with musical beauties. The true

---

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1892.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

The symphony concert last night attracted the usual large and interested

---

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

NEW BEDFORD,

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 7, AT 8.

Only appearance of the renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Accompanied by the following distinguished Artists:

MR. Z. DÖME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Solo Violin and Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER,
Violoncello Virtuoso.

And the famous

KNEISEL QUARTET.

MR. MAX ZACH, ACCOMPANIST.

MADAME NORDICA.

The brilliant career of this great artist is too well known to require extended notice.

Successful alike on the operatic and concert stage, since her first appearance in England the demand for her services has been so constant on the other side of the Atlantic that she has been heard but little in her native land.

During her present tour, which closes on February 1, she has more than justified the expectations raised by her foreign successes. She was the principal vocalist at the Worcester Festival, has appeared in the large cities with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was honored in being chosen as soloist for the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston. More recently she distinguished herself by assuming the difficult role of Valentine, in the "Huguenots," at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, supplying at a day's notice the place of Mme. Albani, and with such success that she was immediately engaged for further appearances. Mme. Nordica already ranks with the world's great artists, and this opportunity of hearing her is one that cannot fail to be appreciated by every lover of music.

---

first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as pressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as king, but what the music says by way of illustration Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the on his liver still remains a mystery to us. composer appears to have wrestled with the sub- of a tremendous tone picture that presented it- to his imagination, but the only outcome ap- rs to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color nzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily nprehended design. It was played with much and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness he wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, performance was satisfying and remarkably effec- e. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's certante in E-flat, for solo violin and viola and or stra. The movement is broad in style and almost phonic in seriousness, and is fairly divided between orchestra and the solo instruments. It is of the Mozart charm, and the solo ts are little given up to bravura display, and are for most part of an antiphonal character. The work thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delight in effect. The solo instruments were played by ssrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and sh and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy h the sentiment of the music. The artists were vig- usly applauded at the close of the movement, and re recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's samunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely d and played. The whole ended with Brahms's sym- ny No 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at e concerts. The programme was not particularly active. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a , been dull and monotonous; but programme mak- is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes essary every now and then to remind him that there excellent music that is not music of the German ool, and that a programme is not perforce classical interesting because the solemn and the severely avy prevails in it. The programme for the next ncert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schu- ann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by r. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Ar- r Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, r. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, r. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

Musical Note.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will take ace to-morrow evening. The programme is: Quartet E flat, Carl von Dittersdorf; Quartet, B flat, op. 130. ethoven; Octet for four violins, two violas and two llos, Svendsen. Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek d Schultz will assist.

---

a descriptive text. The question then is, does the music give the hearer an adequate idea of the great tragedy of Æschylus? It is not necessary to examine the details, to pry curiously, in the hope of finding the chaining of the enemy of Zeus, the comfort vainly brought by the Oceanides, the gnawing of the eternal vulture, the plaint of the wandering Io, the combined attack of the elements upon the heaven-defying sufferer. But does the music rise in tragic grandeur to the level of the play? Is it filled with the spirit of Æschylus, that moves us so deeply even when filtered through the baldest, most prosaic translation? No, it must be confessed that there is a sublimity in the first and in the last speech of Prometheus that Goldmark with all his imagination has not rivaled. Try as he may, let him call upon the brass to do the bravest, let him goad the strings to fury, he is to Æschylus as the explosion of cannon crackers to the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." In spite of modern theories, music is not an interchangeable art. There are emotions, there are phenomena that are better expressed in prose, poetry or painting than in music. And nobler, more impassioned music is often suggested by the writer or painter than is in the power of the musician to invent.

Goldmark called it "Prometheus." He might as well have called it "Hamlet" or "Orestes" or "Napoleon." He chose "Prometheus," and, therefore, necessarily put himself in comparison with the Grecian poet. But let us not insist upon this point. For without giving a detailed programme, Goldmark has indicated by the title both to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it."

---

whose merits are so nearly equal.

The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus Bound," brought out all the best points of the orchestra. It was first played at these concerts Nov. 1, 1890. As an orchestral study it is a masterpiece, for it is full of changing combinations and varying effects.

As a delightful change from the Mozart concerto to the Brahms symphony no better choice could have been than that of Schubert's entr'acte, "Rosamunde." This entr'acte in B flat is in the form of an air with two trios, each of which contains delightful passages for wind instruments. It was heard here last in October, 1889.

A grand ending to the programme was found in the Brahms symphony, No. 2, in D major, consisting of four movements. Brahms as a composer, like Browning as a poet, is understood and appreciated by the few. Musicians like him for the masterly way in which he works up his themes and reaches a climax. His compositions are always bringing surprising effects in shade and tone, and for that reason are difficult to render. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this particular symphony was a happy one and the orchestra responded to his idea in a spirited manner.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will precede Schuman's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text of which will be read by George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Wilhelm Heinrich, Heinrich Meyer, Gardner S. Lamson, Sullivan A. Sargent, Ivan Morawski and a chorus from the Cecilia Club.

E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B flat major, op. 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for this concert.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

Mme. Nordica and the Kneisel quartet will give a concert at the opera house in New Bedford, Jan. 7.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch arranged one of his oddest programmes for the tenth concert—Handel's quaint concerto for a double wind choir, each consisting of a pair of horns, oboes and bassoons, and a string quartette, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, this last being presented in its original form of only four movements, as the Handel was also condensed from nine divisions to five. The first contrast thus forced was violent and unpleasing, but the transition between the second and third was bearable enough. The Handel music was delightful to hear; its sturdiness, its honesty, its solid sense, its good humor and its uncompromising individuality were all set forth and illuminated by the orchestral treatment, which is in itself so novel, so varied,—in spite of the restricted means with which its author contented himself,—so fanciful in figure and so rich in harmony. It is music which makes one sit up straight in his seat and listen eagerly in order to miss nothing in its antiphonal and choral progress. It is music too which shows the hearer that all the pleasant and striking combinations of orchestral instruments are not summed up in the pages of Berlioz, Wagner, Meyerbeer and their students and imitators, and which delights and surprises him constantly with something which he has never heard or imagined before. And if it sounds thus to modern ears, what astonishing audacity of invention must it not have suggested to those listeners of a century and a half ago, who were always looking askance at Handel as a fellow who was forever on the point of breaking out with something abnormal and unconventional? The orchestra played most of it very well, and the horns and oboes acquitted themselves with remarkable ability. The "Parsifal" was not all given as it should be, its mystical, reflective moods—which are what we most depend upon to atone for its wandering movement and loose rhetorical construction — being broken up again and again by loud assertiveness and bustling sonority. Of the symphony the first movement, which is the best and most satisfactory, got commendable handling, but the others were irregularly read, while in almost all of them that terrible kettle-drummer seemed to have the impression that the work was meant to be a solo for him with an obbligato orchestral accompaniment.

Tonight the Mozart symphonic concerto for violin and viola, which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel were not well enough to play a fortnight ago, will be given; the overture will be Goldmark's "Prometheus Unbound" and the symphony Brahms's second; the entr'acte music in Schubert's "Rosamunde" will also be played.

YOUNG FOLKS' POPULARS.

No afternoon concerts are more welcome to the general public than those which are given—only too seldom—at Music Hall under the name of the Young Folks' Populars. They correspond about as nearly to that title as the modern Youth's Companion does to its caption, but they are always delightful and good, attracting the young, the middle-aged and even the old in pretty well balanced proportions. The first of this season is announced for Wednesday afternoon next, when a thoroughly fine programme is to be presented. All the details have not reached us as we go to press, but we know that many of the numbers are to be from American pens, new things by Mr. Van der Stücken and Mr. Bird being among them. A selection from the "Cid" of Massanet will also be played, and that the solo numbers will be splendidly attractive is assured by the engagement for them of Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening opened with Goldmark's pretentious but garish and somewhat blatant overture "Prometheus Bound." The work is no more clear in meaning on a second hearing than it was on the first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as impressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as striking, but what the music says by way of illustration of Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the bird on his liver still remains a mystery to us. The composer appears to have wrestled with the subject of a tremendous tone picture that presented itself to his imagination, but the only outcome appears to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color on his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color frenzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily comprehended design. It was played with much fire and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness in the wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, the performance was satisfying and remarkably effective. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's Concertante in E-flat, for solo violin and viola and orchestra. The movement is broad in style and almost symphonic in seriousness, and is fairly divided between the orchestra and the solo instruments. It is full of the Mozart charm, and the solo parts are little given up to bravura display, and are for the most part of an antiphonal character. The work was thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delightful in effect. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and finish and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy with the sentiment of the music. The artists were vigorously applauded at the close of the movement, and twice recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's "Rosamunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely read and played. The whole ended with Brahms's symphony No 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at these concerts. The programme was not particularly attractive. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a rule, been dull and monotonous; but programme making is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes necessary every now and then to remind him that there is excellent music that is not music of the German school, and that a programme is not perforce classical and interesting because the solemn and the severely heavy prevails in it. The programme for the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by Mr. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, Mr. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

Musical Note.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will take place to-morrow evening. The programme is: Quartet in E flat, Carl von Dittersdorf; Quartet, B flat, op. 130, Beethoven; Octet for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos, Svendsen. Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schultz will assist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's Overture to "Prometheus Bound."

A Few Remarks Concerning Local Color,

With a Short Digression Upon Cadenzas.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert was as follows: Overture, "Prometheus Bound," Goldmark; Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart; Entr'acte in B flat, "Rosamunde," Schubert; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms.

The two works in which the individuality of Goldmark is most strongly felt are the "Sakuntala" overture and the opera, "The Queen of Sheba." This individuality is at the same time Hebraic, Hungarian and what is vaguely described as Oriental: that is to say, Jewish chants, Hungarian modes and rhythms, and intervals that are used by Eastern people all give a peculiar color to his music. Then there must be added a pomp that is borrowed from Meyerbeer, and a richness of instrumentation that is due to Wagner.

The individuality of Goldmark is, then, chiefly remarkable for its feeling of what is called "local color" and its ability to express it. Johannes Weber, the learned and sarcastic musical editor of Le Temps, defines "local color" as the property attributed to music of its complying with the time and the country with which the subject of a vocal or instrumental work is concerned; and he is bold enough to add that it is merely a musical illusion. Thus, he says, "to make Oriental music, they imitate the rhythms and the melodic forms employed by Arabs; but the hearer must first be told that they are Oriental." Without stopping here to argue the question—and there is sound sense in many of Weber's theories on this subject—it may be said that Goldmark, by using old Jewish chants, by employing harmonies abounding in augmented fourths and diminished sixths, by constant shiftings from major to minor, suggested to an imaginative hearer the East. The listener was in the synagogue, or he saw strange and oppressively luxurious vegetation; or in the desert, parched with thirst, he saw afar off the camels of the merchants; or venerable, white-bearded men, half stupefied by heavy perfumes, stretched on their rugs, watching, as in an opium dream, the swaying bodies of swart dancing girls. The music was as the odor of tuberoses, of "charred frankincense and grated sandal wood." It lulled, it cloyed, it enervated. Its sensuousness approached sensuality. Such was the effect produced by Goldmark's local color. But it should be remembered that in "Sakuntala" the hearer was prepared by the very title for an Eastern atmosphere, and in "The Queen of Sheba" the eyes were regaled by Eastern scenes, Eastern costumes and Eastern groupings. He was, therefore, ready to accept the music as Eastern, provided it was strange to him and in keeping with what went upon the stage.

Now, when Goldmark wrote an overture and called it "Overture to Prometheus Bound of Æschylus," he necessarily was obliged to lay aside the coloring that had made him an individuality. Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, delighting in luxury, tempting Solomon with hard questions, coquetting with the courtiers, and the lonely Prometheus, bound down in a cleft of a rock in a waste place in Scythia, are two very different subjects for musical treatment. So Goldmark was obliged to re-arrange his palette. His individuality vanished with the discarded colors. If the composer's name were not upon the programme, no one would say at once during the playing of the "Prometheus," "Why, this is Goldmark's music."

Goldmark has given the title without adding a descriptive text. The question then is, does the music give the hearer an adequate idea of the great tragedy of Æschylus? It is not necessary to examine the details, to pry curiously, in the hope of finding the chaining of the enemy of Zeus, the comfort vainly brought by the Oceanides, the gnawing of the eternal vulture, the plaint of the wandering Io, the combined attack of the elements upon the heaven-defying sufferer. But does the music rise in tragic grandeur to the level of the play? Is it filled with the spirit of Æschylus, that moves us so deeply even when filtered through the baldest, most prosaic translation? No, it must be confessed that there is a sublimity in the first and in the last speech of Prometheus that Goldmark with all his imagination has not rivaled. Try as he may, let him call upon the brass to do the bravest, let him goad the strings to fury, he is to Æschylus as the explosion of cannon crackers to the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." In spite of modern theories, music is not an interchangeable art. There are emotions, there are phenomena that are better expressed in prose, poetry or painting than in music. And nobler, more impassioned music is often suggested by the writer or painter than is in the power of the musician to invent.

Goldmark called it "Prometheus." He might as well have called it "Hamlet" or "Orestes" or "Napoleon." He chose "Prometheus," and, therefore, necessarily put himself in comparison with the Grecian poet. But let us not insist upon this point. For without giving a detailed programme, Goldmark has indicated by the title both to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it." It is then an affair between the individual [illegible] and the [illegible] composer's meaning [illegible] by the player or [illegible] one it may be the very Prometheus [illegible] another an effective concert-overture, too long, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The beautiful "Rosamunde" music is well known. The Brahms Symphony has been so often heard at these concerts that it does not call for extended comment. It is certainly one of the most genial works of the composer, and, with the exception of the second movement, it is crowded with musical beauties. The true disciple of Brahm, however, will always, no doubt, prefer the second to the other movements, chiefly on account of a complexity that dangerously approaches dullness.

The first movement of Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola was played for the first time at these concerts. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, and with rare taste, perfect mechanism and absolute sympathy. The movement itself is broadly treated and it almost assumes symphonic proportions. The solo instruments are generally handled antiphonally, exchanging phrases in different tonal positions. They are seldom found moving in a two-voice passage where each has a separate and independent walk. A long and elaborate cadenza was introduced by Hellemsberger. The cadenza is generally a thing to strike terror to the stoutest soul. It is too often a rambling composition of inordinate length, in which the performer is given an opportunity to indulge himself in scale and arpeggio practice, and in the display of mastery of technical difficulties. Occasionally there is a slight reference to the composer whose work is thus embellished, as much as to say, "I am not wholly unmindful of you," and the interest of the audience is confined to guesses as to the time consumed in its delivery and the ability of the performer to finally join the orchestra in the proper tonality. There is an estimable musician of advanced years in Leipzic, named Reinecke, who is a most grevious offender in this respect, and who seems to regard all music as a field for the sowing of possible cadenzas. It is a pleasure to state that the Hellemsberger cadenza was a most agreeable exception.

The playing of the orchestra in the overture and the symphony was distinguished for its brilliancy and fiery swing; and the "Rosamunde" music was upon the whole discreetly and at the same time sympathetically given. But the attack, especially in the overture, was not always precise, and throughout the evening the brass was coarse, and at times brutal. The trumpets and trombones, as in other concerts of this season, were special offenders, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic tone.

The programme of the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 4, 1892.

The many people who braved the elements to hear the eleventh symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, were well repaid for any inconvenience they may have suffered.

The only novelty offered by the programme was the Mozart concerto for violin and viola, promised a week ago but postponed on account of the illness of both soloists—C. M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel. The date of the composition is unknown, and the original manuscript is presumably not in existence. It was played at the Mozart festival in Salzburg in 1856, from a copy owned by Andre in which cadenzas in Mozart's handwriting were inserted. The cadenza used Saturday night was by Hellmesberger, but was more modern in character than the rest of the composition, which shows great broadness of treatment. It consists of three movements but only the first movement was rendered by these artists, whose merits are so nearly equal.

The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus Bound," brought out all the best points of the orchestra. It was first played at these concerts Nov. 1, 1890. As an orchestral study it is a masterpiece, for it is full of changing combinations and varying effects.

As a delightful change from the Mozart concerto to the Brahms symphony no better choice could have been than that of Schubert's entr'acte, "Rosamunde." This entr'acte in B flat is in the form of an air with two trios, each of which contains delightful passages for wind instruments. It was heard here last in October, 1889.

A grand ending to the programme was found in the Brahms symphony, No. 2, in D major, consisting of four movements. Brahms as a composer, like Browning as a poet, is understood and appreciated by the few. Musicians like him for the masterly way in which he works up his themes and reaches a climax. His compositions are always bringing surprising effects in shade and tone, and for that reason are difficult to render. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this particular symphony was a happy one and the orchestra responded to his idea in a spirited manner.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will precede the Schuman's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text of which will be read by George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Wilhelm Heinrich, Heinrich Meyer, Gardner S. Lamson, Sullivan A. Sargent, Ivan Morawski and a chorus from the Cecilia Club.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1892.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

The symphony concert last night attracted the usual large and interested audience to the Music Hall, where Director Nikisch presented a varied and interesting programme, including selections from Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was very felicitous in his interpretation of Goldmark's overture, and it gave the orchestra a wide range of opportunities for effective play and dramatic climaxes.

Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, in which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel appeared as soloists, was listened to with great interest, as it was new at these concerts, and was probably heard for the first time in Boston by such a large audience.

The arrangement lends itself more to the display of wonderful skill in the manipulation of technique than to the elucidation of much harmony or melody. The movements were intricate, and at times suggestive of attractive effect, while both Loeffler and Kneisel displayed brilliant talent in their command of the violin and the viola. It was somewhat strained at the end, but it was more the fault of the conception than the laboriousness of the execution, and the warm applause of the audience was a deserved reward for what was really a difficult undertaking on the part of the soloists.

It was somewhat of a relief to hear Schubert's entr'acte of "Rosamunde," and the piquant, delicate rise and fall of sound presented a charming effect. The orchestra was at its best in elucidating these pathetic harmonies, with which it is pregnant, and even the abrupt changes of tempo contained a rythm that was very pleasing.

Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major, threatened to be a dull and uninteresting performance. The allegro is reminiscent and sketchy. It is reminiscent and unsatisfactory. The plaintive notes contain neither harmony to give it dramatic effect, nor the pathos which would make it attractive. They seem to obtrude here and there, and give you an idea that the composer's imagination was more receptive of other's impressions than originally creative. It gave many opportunities, though, for the display of the horn, while Nikisch's interpretation of it added to it a vivacity and spirit that is frequently destitute in others' translation of the theme. It improved marvellously in the allegretto, where the charm of the piquant staccati merges into a delightfully graceful melody which continues in spontaneous movement till it winds up with the peaceful though rapid finale.

The orchestra played with remarkable spirit, while Nikisch's leading was characteristic of his originality and ingenuity.

For the 12th concert the programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Schumann, music to Byron's "Manfred." The solo singers will be Mmes. Arthur Nikisch and Julie L. Wyman, and Messrs. Wilhelm Heinrich, Gardner S. Lamson, Heinrich Meyn, Ivan Morawski and Sullivan A. Sargent. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

Young People's Symphony Concert.

The first of the "Young People's popular concerts," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given in Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, and Miss Maud Powell.

The programme is an interesting one, and is as follows:

Overture, King Lear	Littolff
Concerto for pianoforte	Tschaikowsky
Miss Aus Der Ohe.
Danse et Marche des Gnomes	Reginald de Koven
Pagina D' Amore	F. van der Stucken
A Carnival Scene	Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for violin	Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet music, Le Cid	Massenet

With the exception of the piano concerto and the violin rondo and the ballet music, the above selections have not before been played by the symphony orchestra.

The Kneisel quartet will give its third concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening. The program will be as follows: Quartet in E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B flat major, op. 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for this concert.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

Mme. Nordica and the Kneisel quartet will give a concert at the opera house in New Bedford, Jan. 7.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 2, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch arranged one of his oddest programmes for the tenth concert—Handel's quaint concerto for a double wind choir, each consisting of a pair of horns, oboes and bassoons, and a string quartette, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, this last being presented in its original form of only four movements, as the Handel was also condensed from nine divisions to five. The first contrast thus forced was violent and unpleasing, but the transition between the second and third was bearable enough. The Handel music was delightful to hear; its sturdiness, its honesty, its solid sense, its good humor and its uncompromising individuality were all set forth and illuminated by the orchestral treatment, which is in itself so novel, so varied,—in spite of the restricted means with which its author contented himself,—so fanciful in figure and so rich in harmony. It is music which makes one sit up straight in his seat and listen eagerly in order to miss nothing in its antiphonal and choral progress. It is music too which shows the hearer that all the pleasant and striking combinations of orchestral instruments are not summed up in the pages of Berlioz, Wagner, Meyerbeer and their students and imitators, and which delights and surprises him constantly with something which he has never heard or imagined before. And if it sounds thus to modern ears, what astonishing audacity of invention must it not have suggested to those listeners of a century and a half ago, who were always looking askance at Handel as a fellow who was forever on the point of breaking out with something abnormal and unconventional? The orchestra played most of it very well, and the horns and oboes acquitted themselves with remarkable ability. The "Parsifal" was not all given as it should be, its mystical, reflective moods—which are what we most depend upon to atone for its wandering movement and loose rhetorical construction — being broken up again and again by loud assertiveness and bustling sonority. Of the symphony the first movement, which is the best and most satisfactory, got commendable handling, but the others were irregularly read, while in almost all of them that terrible kettle-drummer seemed to have the impression that the work was meant to be a solo for him with an obbligato orchestral accompaniment.

Tonight the Mozart symphonic concerto for violin and viola, which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel were not well enough to play a fortnight ago, will be given; the overture will be Goldmark's "Prometheus Unbound" and the symphony Brahms's second; the entr'acte music in Schubert's "Rosamunde" will also be played.

YOUNG FOLKS' POPULARS.

No afternoon concerts are more welcome to the general public than those which are given—only too seldom—at Music Hall under the name of the Young Folks' Populars. They correspond about as nearly to that title as the modern Youth's Companion does to its caption, but they are always delightful and good, attracting the young, the middle-aged and even the old in pretty well balanced proportions. The first of this season is announced for Wednesday afternoon next, when a thoroughly fine programme is to be presented. All the details have not reached us as we go to press, but we know that many of the numbers are to be from American pens, new things by Mr. Van der Stücken and Mr. Bird being among them. A selection from the "Cid" of Massanet will also be played, and that the solo numbers will be splendidly attractive is assured by the engagement for them of Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening opened with Goldmark's pretentious but garish and somewhat blatant overture "Prometheus Bound." The work is no more clear in meaning on a second hearing than it was on the first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as impressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as striking, but what the music says by way of illustration of Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the bird on his liver still remains a mystery to us. The composer appears to have wrestled with the subject of a tremendous tone picture that presented itself to his imagination, but the only outcome appears to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color on his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color frenzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily comprehended design. It was played with much fire and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness in the wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, the performance was satisfying and remarkably effective. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's Concertante in E flat, for solo violin and viola and orchestra. The movement is broad in style and almost symphonic in seriousness, and is fairly divided between the orchestra and the solo instruments. It is full of the Mozart charm, and the solo parts are little given up to bravura display, and are for the most part of an antiphonal character. The work was thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delightful in effect. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and finish and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy with the sentiment of the music. The artists were vigorously applauded at the close of the movement, and twice recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's "Rosamunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely read and played. The whole ended with Brahms's symphony No 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at these concerts. The programme was not particularly attractive. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a rule, been dull and monotonous; but programme making is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes necessary every now and then to remind him that there is excellent music that is not music of the German school, and that a programme is not perforce classical and interesting because the solemn and the severely heavy prevails in it. The programme for the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by Mr. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, Mr. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

Musical Note.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will take place to-morrow evening. The programme is: Quartet in E flat, Carl von Dittersdorf; Quartet, B flat, op. 130, Beethoven; Octet for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos, Svendsen. Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schultz will assist.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's Overture to "Prometheus Bound."

A Few Remarks Concerning Local Color,

With a Short Digression Upon Cadenzas.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert was as follows: Overture, "Prometheus Bound," Goldmark; Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart; Entr'acte in B flat, "Rosamunde," Schubert; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms.

The two works in which the individuality of Goldmark is most strongly felt are the "Sakuntala" overture and the opera, "The Queen of Sheba." This individuality is at the same time Hebraic, Hungarian and what is vaguely described as Oriental: that is to say, Jewish chants, Hungarian modes and rhythms, and intervals that are used by Eastern people all give a peculiar color to his music. Then there must be added a pomp that is borrowed from Meyerbeer, and a richness of instrumentation that is due to Wagner.

The individuality of Goldmark is, then, chiefly remarkable for its feeling of what is called "local color" and its ability to express it. Johannes Weber, the learned and sarcastic musical editor of Le Temps, defines "local color" as the property attributed to music of its complying with the time and the country with which the subject of a vocal or instrumental work is concerned; and he is bold enough to add that it is merely a musical illusion. Thus, he says, "to make Oriental music, they imitate the rhythms and the melodic forms employed by Arabs; but the hearer must first be told that they are Oriental." Without stopping here to argue the question—and there is sound sense in many of Weber's theories on this subject—it may be said that Goldmark, by using old Jewish chants, by employing harmonies abounding in augmented fourths and diminished sixths, by constant shiftings from major to minor, suggested to an imaginative hearer the East. The listener was in the synagogue, or he saw strange and oppressively luxurious vegetation; or in the desert, parched with thirst, he saw afar off the camels of the merchants; or venerable, white-bearded men, half stupefied by heavy perfumes, stretched on their rugs, watching, as in an opium dream, the swaying bodies of swart dancing girls. The music was as the odor of tuberoses, of "charred frankincense and grated sandal wood." It lulled, it cloyed, it enervated. Its sensuousness approached sensuality. Such was the effect produced by Goldmark's local color. But it should be remembered that in "Sakuntala" the hearer was prepared by the very title for an Eastern atmosphere, and in "The Queen of Sheba" the eyes were regaled by Eastern scenes, Eastern costumes and Eastern groupings. He was, therefore, ready to accept the music as Eastern, provided it was strange to him and in keeping with what went upon the stage.

Now, when Goldmark wrote an overture and called it "Overture to Prometheus Bound of Æschylus," he necessarily was obliged to lay aside the coloring that had made him an individuality. Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, delighting in luxury, tempting Solomon with hard questions, coquetting with the courtiers, and the lonely Prometheus, bound down in a cleft of a rock in a waste place in Scythia, are two very different subjects for musical treatment. So Goldmark was obliged to re-arrange his palette. His individuality vanished with the discarded colors. If the composer's name were not upon the programme, no one would say at once during the playing of the "Prometheus," "Why, this is Goldmark's music."

Goldmark has given the title without adding a descriptive text. The question then is, does the music give the hearer an adequate idea of the great tragedy of Æschylus? It is not necessary to examine the details, to pry curiously, in the hope of finding the chaining of the enemy of Zeus, the comfort vainly brought by the Oceanides, the gnawing of the eternal vulture, the plaint of the wandering Io, the combined attack of the elements upon the heaven-defying sufferer. But does the music rise in tragic grandeur to the level of the play? Is it filled with the spirit of Æschylus, that moves us so deeply even when filtered through the baldest, most prosaic translation? No, it must be confessed that there is a sublimity in the first and in the last speech of Prometheus that Goldmark with all his imagination has not rivaled. Try as he may, let him call upon the brass to do the bravest, let him goad the strings to fury, he is to Æschylus as the explosion of cannon crackers to the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." In spite of modern theories, music is not an interchangeable art. There are emotions, there are phenomena that are better expressed in prose, poetry or painting than in music. And nobler, more impassioned music is often suggested by the writer or painter than is in the power of the musician to invent.

Goldmark called it "Prometheus." He might as well have called it "Hamlet" or "Orestes" or "Napoleon." He chose "Prometheus," and, therefore, necessarily put himself in comparison with the Grecian poet. But let us not insist upon this point. For without giving a detailed programme, Goldmark has indicated by the title both to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it." It is then an affair between the individual hearer and the composer, [illegible] the composer's meaning is fully expressed by the player or players. To one it may be the very Prometheus; to another an effective concert-overture, too long, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The beautiful "Rosamunde" music is well known. The Brahms Symphony has been so often heard at these concerts that it does not call for extended comment. It is certainly one of the most genial works of the composer, and, with the exception of the second movement, it is crowded with musical beauties. The true disciple of Brahm, however, will always, no doubt, prefer the second to the other movements, chiefly on account of a complexity that dangerously approaches dullness.

The first movement of Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola was played for the first time at these concerts. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, and with rare taste, perfect mechanism and absolute sympathy. The movement itself is broadly treated and it almost assumes symphonic proportions. The solo instruments are generally handled antiphonally, exchanging phrases in different tonal positions. They are seldom found moving in a two-voice passage where each has a separate and independent walk. A long and elaborate cadenza was introduced by Hellemsberger. The cadenza is generally a thing to strike terror to the stoutest soul. It is too often a rambling composition of inordinate length, in which the performer is given an opportunity to indulge himself in scale and arpeggio practice, and in the display of mastery of technical difficulties. Occasionally there is a slight reference to the composer whose work is thus embellished, as much as to say, "I am not wholly unmindful of you," and the interest of the audience is confined to guesses as to the time consumed in its delivery and the ability of the performer to finally join the orchestra in the proper tonality. There is an estimable musician of advanced years in Leipzic, named Reinecke, who is a most grevious offender in this respect, and who seems to regard all music as a field for the sowing of possible cadenzas. It is a pleasure to state that the Hellemsberger cadenza was a most agreeable exception.

The playing of the orchestra in the overture and the symphony was distinguished for its brilliancy and fiery swing; and the "Rosamunde" music was upon the whole discreetly and at the same time sympathetically given. But the attack, especially in the overture, was not always precise, and throughout the evening the brass was coarse, and at times brutal. The trumpets and trombones, as in other concerts of this season, were special offenders, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic tone.

The programme of the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 4, 1892.

The many people who braved the elements to hear the eleventh symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, were well repaid for any inconvenience they may have suffered.

The only novelty offered by the programme was the Mozart concerto for violin and viola, promised a week ago but postponed on account of the illness of both soloists—C. M. Loeffler and Franz Kneisel. The date of the composition is unknown, and the original manuscript is presumably not in existence. It was played at the Mozart festival in Salzburg in 1856, from a copy owned by Andre in which cadenzas in Mozart's handwriting were inserted. The cadenza used Saturday night was by Hellmesberger, but was more modern in character than the rest of the composition, which shows great broadness of treatment. It consists of three movements but only the first movement was rendered by these artists, whose merits are so nearly equal.

The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus Bound," brought out all the best points of the orchestra. It was first played at these concerts Nov. 1, 1890. As an orchestral study it is a masterpiece, for it is full of changing combinations and varying effects.

As a delightful change from the Mozart concerto to the Brahms symphony no better choice could have been than that of Schubert's entr'acte, "Rosamunde." This entr'acte in B flat is in the form of an air with two trios, each of which contains delightful passages for wind instruments. It was heard here last in October, 1889.

A grand ending to the programme was found in the Brahms symphony, No. 2, in D major, consisting of four movements. Brahms as a composer, like Browning as a poet, is understood and appreciated by the few. Musicians like him for the masterly way in which he works up his themes and reaches a climax. His compositions are always bringing surprising effects in shade and tone, and for that reason are difficult to render. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of this particular symphony was a happy one and the orchestra responded to his idea in a spirited manner.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will precede Schuman's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text of which will be read by George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Wilhelm Heinrich, Heinrich Meyer, Gardner S. Lamson, Sullivan A. Sargent, Ivan Morawski and a chorus from the Cecilia Club.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1892.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

The symphony concert last night attracted the usual large and interested audience to the Music Hall, where Director Nikisch presented a varied and interesting programme, including selections from Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was very felicitous in his interpretation of Goldmark's overture, and it gave the orchestra a wide range of opportunities for effective play and dramatic climaxes.

Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, in which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel appeared as soloists, was listened to with great interest, as it was new at these concerts, and was probably heard for the first time in Boston by such a large audience.

The arrangement lends itself more to the display of wonderful skill in the manipulation of technique than to the elucidation of much harmony or melody. The movements were intricate, and at times suggestive of attractive effect, while both Loeffler and Kneisel displayed brilliant talent in their command of the violin and the viola. It was somewhat strained at the end, but it was more the fault of the conception than the laboriousness of the execution, and the warm applause of the audience was a deserved reward for what was really a difficult undertaking on the part of the soloists.

It was somewhat of a relief to hear Schubert's entr'acte of "Rosamunde," and the piquant, delicate rise and fall of sound presented a charming effect. The orchestra was at its best in elucidating these pathetic harmonies, with which it is pregnant, and even the abrupt changes of tempo contained a rythm that was very pleasing.

Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major, threatened to be a dull and uninteresting performance. The allegro is reminiscent and sketchy. It is reminiscent and unsatisfactory. The plaintive notes contain neither harmony to give it dramatic effect, nor the pathos which would make it attractive. They seem to obtrude here and there, and give you an idea that the composer's imagination was more receptive of other's impressions than originally creative. It gave many opportunities, though, for the display of the horn, while Nikisch's interpretation of it added to it a vivacity and spirit that is frequently destitute in others' translation of the theme. It improved marvellously in the allegretto, where the charm of the piquant staccati merges into a delightfully graceful melody which continues in spontaneous movement till it winds up with the peaceful though rapid finale.

The orchestra played with remarkable spirit, while Nikisch's leading was characteristic of his originality and ingenuity.

For the 12th concert the programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Schumann, music to Byron's "Manfred." The solo singers will be Mmes. Arthur Nikisch and Julie L. Wyman, and Messrs. Wilhelm Heinrich, Gardner S. Lamson, Heinrich Meyn, Ivan Morawski and Sullivan A. Sargent. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

Young People's Symphony Concert.

The first of the "Young People's popular concerts," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given in Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, and Miss Maud Powell.

The programme is an interesting one, and is as follows:

Overture, King Lear	Littolff
Concerto for pianoforte Miss Aus Der Ohe.	Tschaikowsky
Danse et Marche des Gnomes	Reginald de Koven
Pagina D' Amore	F. van der Stucken
A Carnival Scene	Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for violin Miss Powell.	Saint-Saens
Ballet music, Le Cid	Massenet

With the exception of the piano concerto and the violin rondo and the ballet music, the above selections have not before been played by the symphony orchestra.

The Kneisel quartet will give its third concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening. The program will be as follows: Quartet in E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B flat major, op. 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for this concert.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

Mme. Nordica and the Kneisel quartet will give a concert at the opera house in New Bedford, Jan. 7.

[86]

[illegible] HERALD.

[illegible] JANUARY 3, 1892.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S [illegible]

[illegible] of the young people's popular [illegible] announced this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given next Wednesday afternoon, and for this occasion Mr. Nikisch appears to have fairly surpassed any efforts he has yet made in the line of programmes. The assisting soloists will be Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, violinist, the several selections being as follows:

Overture, "King Lear" .... Littolff
(First time.)
Concerto for pianoforte .... Tschaikowsky
Miss Aus der Ohe.
"[illegible] March of the Gnomes"
(First time.) Reginald de Koven
"Tarina d'Amore" .... F. Van der Stucken
(First time.)
A Carnival Scene .... Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for violin .... Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet music, "Le Cid" .... Massenet

Tickets, with reserved seats, at popular prices, are on sale at the box office.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert last evening were given, as a novelty, a hearing of the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart, which was promised a week before and postponed by reason of the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, to whom the solo parts were assigned. The work, as [illegible] by this opening movement, [illegible] be a most interesting one, and with the violin playing of Mr. Loeffler and the viola playing by Mr. Kneisel, was made highly enjoyable. It is supposed to be one of the later compositions of Mozart, being very generally credited as having been written about 10 years before his death, and the maturity of thought shown in the themes and their treatment strengthens this opinion. The beautiful cadenza by [illegible] was added in last evening's performance, and both the solo players were heartily commended for their highly artistic efforts.

The orchestra has seldom of late been heard to better advantage than in last evening's performance of the overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus Bound." The masterly skill of the composer, as shown in the series of tone pictures given in this composition, makes it a constant source of delight as an orchestral study, and the opportunities it affords for the conductor to bring out its ever varying effects, and to show the wonderful tone tints given by the ever changing combinations, were fully improved by Mr. Nikisch.

Schubert's entr'acte to "Rosamunde" made a charming contrast between the Mozart concerto and the second symphony of Brahms, a spirited reading of this latter work ending the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony is to precede Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text being read by Mr. George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. William Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Ivan Morawski and a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

NEWS NOTES, GOSSIP.

Mme. Nordica is to be the soloist at the Kneisel quartet concert in New Bedford next Thursday evening.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet will begin at Union Hall tomorrow evening, when the programme will be made up of Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major, Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli.

Mme. Nordica makes her farewell appearance in America this season in grand operatic concert in Music Hall Thursday evening, the 28th inst., when she will be supported by Mme. Sophia Scalchi, Sig. Campanini and Mr. Z. Dome, baritone of Covent Garden, London. An orchestra of [illegible] will also assist.

[illegible] BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dec. 26, was: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic (first time).

It will be readily seen that the above programme presented little in the way of novelty or interest to the regular symphony attendant. It is also apparent that the programmes are becoming less and less attractive as the season progresses. The last two have been kiln-dried, if such and expression can be permitted in music. The recent wet weather ought to have a tendency to moisten them up.

Handel was a prolific writer, composing every species of music from a picolo solo up to an opera and oratorio; but this concerto, for strings and two wind orchestras, is rather a misnomer, inasmuch as it would require an orchestra of strings, with two brass bands, to carry out the idea. This, of course, was not attempted, but quite another idea prevailed. Though announced as a novelty, it failed to produce any marked impression. The music is Handelonian, and hence good. It was fairly well played. Such arrangements, however, seldom afford much pleasure, no matter how well played.

The Parsifal music was read with intelligence, in the light of Mr. Nikisch's understanding, and that is acknowledged to be equal, if not superior, to most other conductors we have had with us. Mr. Nikisch certainly ought to understand Wagner's operas, and all other composers' operas as well, for he was purely an operatic conductor when he arrived here, having acted in that capacity at Leipsic. It is a mistake to say he was conductor of the Gewandhaus orchestra, for such is not a fact. Carl Reinnecke has been its conductor for thirty years, and is still in the harness.

The Rubinstein symphony, baring the first movement, is not really musically agreeable, and the orchestra was not at its best in several particulars. Yet, it evidently pleased the audience and that is the main thing, after all.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the series in Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night was:

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart—Symphonic concerto for violin and viola, first movement; Schubert—Entr'acte from "Rosamunde;" Brahms—Second symphony. Mr. Loeffler was the violinist, and Mr. Kneisel the violist.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Messrs. C. M. LOEFFLER, W. KRAFFT, O. NOVACEK, L. SCHULZ.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 8 P.M.
(POSTPONED FROM DECEMBER 28.)

PROGRAMME.

CARL VON DITTERSDORF. (1739—1799.) QUARTET in E flat major.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto non troppo.—Presto.—Finale, Allegro.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in B flat major, op. 130.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro.—Presto.—Andante con moto ma non troppo.—Alla danza tedesca. Allegro assai.—Cavatina. Adagio molto espressivo.—Finale. Allegro.

SVENDSEN. OCTET for four VIOLINS, two VIOLAS, and two VIOLONCELLI.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Allegro risoluto ben marcato.—Allegro scherzando.—Andante sostenuto.—Moderato. Allegro assai con fuoco.

Fourth Concert, Monday Evening, January 25.
Soloist: Mme. FANNY BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING JAN. 4, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was qnite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer, that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. 2, D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is [illegible] the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which [illegible] too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the [illegible] execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer [illegible] a rather pedantic reputation to [illegible]. The [illegible] movement was not nearly [illegible], and the brasses were very un[illegible] [illegible] more than once.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 5.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and the usual large audience of subscription patrons attended.

The programme prepared by Mr. Kneisel for the evening, though not new strictly, was played for the firsttime in these concerts, and its many beauties were fully realized in the admirable work done by the quartet and the assisting musicians taking part in its performance.

The works included in the list for the evening were Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli, the assisting musicians in this latter work being Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft, O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The playing of the quartet has never been better than on this occasion, and the audience was in the happiest mood to encourage the players, giving well merited applause for the admirable performances of the players.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11. Mr. Nikisch will offer on thil occasion a programme of lighter character than usual, opening with the brilliant overture to Lala's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and including Goldmark's delightful symphony, "A Rustic Wedding." An interesting number in contrast with these will be the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist, and will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon" and a group of songs, accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

JOURNAL, Providence, R. I.

Date 1/3

Lillian Nordica made a distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, recently. She undertook the task at forty-eight hours notice, Albani's continued illness making it necessary to provide a substitute. The shortness of the time prevented Mme. Nordica from having any rehearsal other than one of her part with Mr. Vianesi at the pianoforte immediately on her arrival in New York from the West. Her brilliant achievements secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 5, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Third Concert Proves a Treat to Lovers of Intellectual Music.

The concert given last evening by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall was the third of the series, and was postponed from Monday, Dec. 28. The programme presented lost nothing by the delay, if the enthusiasm and size of the audience may be taken as evidence.

The opening number was a quartet in E-flat major, by Carl von Dittersdorf, consisting of allegro, andante, minuetto non troppo, presto and finale, allegro.

This work has long been a favorite with string quartets, and Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists deserve much praise for the masterly manner they interpreted this often strange almost gypsy music—yet ever pleasing and melodious.

The second number included Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 130, which by the way the great composer placed in the front rank of this class of his compositions. The quartet is always graceful and has a peculiar charm about it, found, perhaps, in the dreamy melody, which comes and goes like a fitful shadow throughout its several movements. This number was given in full. The third and last number introduced an additional violin, viola and cello severally rendered by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz. The subject selected was an octet by Svendsen.

This clever Norwegian composer is well known to Boston audiences, and needs no introduction here, though it might be said he introduces into this special work some of those weird fancies of his race. The movement consists of an "Allegro risoluto ben marcato, allegro scherzando, andante sostenuto, moderato, and allegro assai con fuoco."

At the conclusion of this delightful composition the audience expressed itself in a most emphatic manner and heartily applauded Mr. Kneisel and his assistant artists.

Record, Philadelphia, P

Date 1-3

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING JAN. 5, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette gave their third concert at Union Hall last evening, presenting the following programme: Carl von Dittersdorf, quartette in E flat major; Beethoven, quartette in B flat, op. 130; Svendsen, octette for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos. All the numbers were played for the first time at these concerts and they were warmly appreciated by the large audience which was present.

The quartette by Dittersdorf is a work of blithe, healthy character, written somewhat in the style of Haydn, and enjoyable for its extreme daintiness and simplicity. It was delightfully rendered. In the Beethoven number the quartette did not seem to reach the high standard of excellence which usually characterizes their work: there was an evident lack of repose, which seemed to interfere with the precision and perfect ensemble of the quartette as a whole. The work itself is a scholarly one, written in the masterly style of Beethoven's later works, and needs more than a single hearing to be thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated.

The success of the evening was the Svendsen octette; this work, full of the vigor, fire and impetuosity of youth, has a decided Norwegian flavor, and contains many very striking and original effects, combined with rich coloring and warmth of treatment. It was played with a brilliancy, dash and passion which took the audience fairly by storm and was a fitting climax to a highly interesting programme. Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schultz assisted in the octette. The fourth concert is announced for Jan. 25, with Mme. Zeisler as the soloist.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. The joint appearance of the gifted young artistes, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell, will add a very attractive feature to the fine programme announced by Mr. Nikisch.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello.
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, JANUARY 3, 1892.

FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S "POP."

The first of the young people's popular concerts announced this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given next Wednesday afternoon, and for this occasion Mr. Nikisch appears to have fairly surpassed any efforts he has yet made in the line of programmes. The assisting soloists will be Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, violinist, the several selections being as follows:

Overture, "King Lear" .... Litolff
(First time.)
Concerto for pianoforte .... Tschaikowsky
Miss Aus der Ohe.
(a) "Dance et Marche des Gnomes"
(First time.) Reginald de Koven
(b) "Pagina d'Amore" .... F. Van der Stucken
(First time.)
(c) A Carnival Scene .... Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for violin .... Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet music, "Le Cid" .... Massenet

Tickets, with reserved seats, at popular prices, are on sale at the box office.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert last evening were given, as a novelty, a hearing of the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart, which was promised a week before and postponed by reason of the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, to whom the solo parts were assigned. The work, as illustrated by this opening movement, proved to be a most interesting one, and with the violin playing of Mr. Loeffler and the viola playing by Mr. Kneisel, was made highly enjoyable. It is supposed to be one of the later compositions of Mozart, being very generally credited as having been written about 10 years before his death, and the maturity of thought shown in the themes and their treatment strengthens this opinion. The beautiful cadenza by Hellmesberger was added in last evening's performance, and both the solo players were heartily commended for their highly artistic efforts.

The orchestra has seldom of late been heard to better advantage than in last evening's performance of the overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus Bound." The masterly skill of the composer, as shown in the series of tone pictures given in this composition, makes it a constant source of delight as an orchestral study, and the opportunities it affords for the conductor to bring out its ever varying effects, and to show the wonderful tone tints given by the ever changing combinations, were fully improved by Mr. Nikisch.

Schubert's entr'acte to "Rosamunde" made a charming contrast between the Mozart concerto and the second symphony by Brahms, a spirited reading of this latter work ending the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony is to precede Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text being read by Mr. George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. William Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Ivan Morawski and a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

NEWS NOTES, GOSSIP.

Mme. Nordica is to be the soloist at the Kneisel quartet concert in New Bedford next Thursday evening.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet will begin at Union Hall tomorrow evening, when the programme will be made up of Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major, Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli.

Mme. Nordica makes her farewell appearance in America this season in grand operatic concert in Music Hall Thursday evening, the 28th inst., when she will be supported by Mme. Sophia Scalchi, Sig. Campanini and Mr. Z. Dome, baritone of Covent Garden, London. An orchestra of 50 will also assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING JAN. 4, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was quite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer. that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. 2, D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is certainly the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which are not too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the best execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer who has a rather pedantic reputation to many. The first movement was not nearly so steady, and the brasses were very uncertain in their tones more than once.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dec. 26, was: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic (first time).

It will be readily seen that the above programme presented little in the way of novelty or interest to the regular symphony attendant. It is also apparent that the programmes are becoming less and less attractive as the season progresses. The last two have been kiln-dried, if such and expression can be permitted in music. The recent wet weather ought to have a tendency to moisten them up.

Handel was a prolific writer, composing every species of music from a picolo solo up to an opera and oratorio; but this concerto, for strings and two wind orchestras, is rather a misnomer, inasmuch as it would require an orchestra of strings, with two brass bands, to carry out the idea. This, of course, was not attempted, but quite another idea prevailed. Though announced as a novelty, it failed to produce any marked impression. The music is Handelonian, and hence good. It was fairly well played. Such arrangements, however, seldom afford much pleasure, no matter how well played.

The Parsifal music was read with intelligence, in the light of Mr. Nikisch's understanding, and that is acknowledged to be equal, if not superior, to most other conductors we have had with us. Mr. Nikisch certainly ought to understand Wagner's operas, and all other composers' operas as well, for he was purely an operatic conductor when he arrived here, having acted in that capacity at Leipsic. It is a mistake to say he was conductor of the Gewandhaus orchestra, for such is not a fact. Carl Reinnecke has been its conductor for thirty years, and is still in the harness.

The Rubinstein symphony, baring the first movement, is not really musically agreeable, and the orchestra was not at its best in several particulars. Yet, it evidently pleased the audience and that is the main thing, after all.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the series in Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night was:

Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart—Symphonic concerto for violin and viola, first movement; Schubert—Entr'acte from "Rosamunde;" Brahms—Second symphony. Mr. Loeffler was the violinist, and Mr. Kneisel the violist.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 5.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and the usual large audience of subscription patrons attended.

The programme prepared by Mr. Kneisel for the evening, though not new strictly, was played for the firsttime in these concerts, and its many beauties were fully realized in the admirable work done by the quartet and the assisting musicians taking part in its performance.

The works included in the list for the evening were Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli, the assisting musicians in this latter work being Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The playing of the quartet has never been better than on this occasion, and the audience was in the happiest mood to encourage the players, giving well merited applause for the admirable performances of the players.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11. Mr. Nikisch will offer on thil occasion a programme of lighter character than usual, opening with the brilliant overture to Lala's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and including Goldmark's delightful symphony, "A Rustic Wedding." An interesting number in contrast with these will be the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist, and will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon" and a group of songs, accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

JOURNAL, Providence, R. I.

Date 1/3

Lillian Nordica made a distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, recently. She undertook the task at forty-eight hours notice, Albani's continued illness making it necessary to provide a substitute. The shortness of the time prevented Mme. Nordica from having any rehearsal other than one of her part with Mr. Vianesi at the pianoforte immediately on her arrival in New York from the West. Her brilliant achievements secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Messrs. C. M. LOEFFLER, W. KRAFFT, O. NOVACEK, L. SCHULZ.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 8 P. M.
(POSTPONED FROM DECEMBER 28.)

PROGRAMME.

CARL VON DITTERSDORF. (1739—1799.) QUARTET in E flat major.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto non troppo.—Presto.—Finale, Allegro.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in B flat major, op. 130.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro.—Presto.—Andante con moto ma non troppo.—Alla danza tedesca. Allegro assai.—Cavatina. Adagio molto espressivo.—Finale. Allegro.

SVENDSEN. OCTET for four VIOLINS, two VIOLAS, and two VIOLONCELLI.
(First time at these Concerts.)
Allegro risoluto ben marcato.—Allegro scherzando.—Andante sostenuto.—Moderato Allegro assai con fuoco.

Fourth Concert, Monday Evening, January 25.
Soloist: Mme. FANNY BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, JAN. 5, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Third Concert Proves a Treat to Lovers of Intellectual Music.

The concert given last evening by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall was the third of the series, and was postponed from Monday, Dec. 28. The programme presented lost nothing by the delay, if the enthusiasm and size of the audience may be taken as evidence.

The opening number was a quartet in E-flat major, by Carl von Dittersdorf, consisting of allegro, andante, minuetto non troppo, presto and finale, allegro.

This work has long been a favorite with string quartets, and Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists deserve much praise for the masterly manner they interpreted this often strange almost gypsy music—yet ever pleasing and melodious.

The second number included Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 130, which by the way the great composer placed in the front rank of this class of his compositions. The quartet is always graceful and has a peculiar charm about it, found, perhaps, in the dreamy melody, which comes and goes like a fitful shadow throughout its several movements. This number was given in full. The third and last number introduced an additional violin, viola and cello severally rendered by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz. The subject selected was an octet by Svendsen.

This clever Norwegian composer is well known to Boston audiences, and needs no introduction here, though it might be said he introduces into this special work some of those weird fancies of his race. The movement consists of an "Allegro risoluto ben marcato, allegro scherzando, andante sostenuto, moderato, and allegro assai con fuoco."

At the conclusion of this delightful composition the audience expressed itself in a most emphatic manner and heartily applauded Mr. Kneisel and his assistant artists.

Date 1-3

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING JAN. 5, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette gave their third concert at Union Hall last evening, presenting the following programme: Carl von Dittersdorf, quartette in E flat major; Beethoven, quartette in B flat, op. 130; Svendsen, octette for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos. All the numbers were played for the first time at these concerts and they were warmly appreciated by the large audience which was present.

The quartette by Dittersdorf is a work of blithe, healthy character, written somewhat in the style of Haydn, and enjoyable for its extreme daintiness and simplicity. It was delightfully rendered. In the Beethoven number the quartette did not seem to reach the high standard of excellence which usually characterizes their work; there was an evident lack of repose, which seemed to interfere with the precision and perfect ensemble of the quartette as a whole. The work itself is a scholarly one, written in the masterly style of Beethoven's later works, and needs more than a single hearing to be thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated.

The success of the evening was the Svendsen octette; this work, full of the vigor, fire and impetuosity of youth, has a decided Norwegian flavor, and contains many very striking and original effects, combined with rich coloring and warmth of treatment. It was played with a brilliancy, dash and passion which took the audience fairly by storm and was a fitting climax to a highly interesting programme. Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schultz assisted in the octette. The fourth concert is announced for Jan. 25, with Mme. Zeisler as the soloist.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. The joint appearance of the gifted young artistes, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell, will add a very attractive feature to the fine programme announced by Mr. Nikisch.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello.
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

Karl Ditters, afterwards known as Karl von Dittersdorf, was born in Vienna November 2d, 1739. At the age of twelve, he entered as page in the service of Prince von Hildburghausen. He had already studied the violin and he had played in the orchestra of the Church of the Benedictines. After he had joined the orchestra of the Court Theatre he went with Gluck to Italy. At the coronation of Joseph II he went with the court to Frankfort, where as a violinist he was received with enthusiasm. He afterwards served as capellmeister in different courts; he was in the service of the Bishop of Groswardein, and in that of the Prince-Bishop of Breslau. The latter was exceedingly kind to him, and gave him the position of collector of forest rents, and that of high constable and counsellor of the government. As this latter position was only granted to members of the nobility, Ditters was made a von Dittersdorf. His patron also acquired for him the decoration of the Golden Spur. Dittersdorf died in 1799 in the direst poverty in Bohemia.

As a composer he was versatile. He was the author of several oratorios and comic operas. They all enjoyed great popularity in their day, and the "Doktor und Apotheker" is regarded by the German critics of to-day as one of the masterpieces of the German stage. It was revived at the Berlin Royal Opera House in December 1890 with great success, and Lessman boldly declared that it contained more spontaneous humor and genuine musical spirit than all the operettas of Lortzing and his successors. He also wrote 15 orchestral symphonies—or 12, for the statements are conflicting—upon subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses, early examples of program-music. One Symphony, for example, was named "Actäon." The first movement portrayed the chase; Diana took her bath in the second ; Actäon surprised her in the menuet: and in the fourth he was torn in pieces by the hounds. And to prove that there is nothing new under the sun, a learned man of the day wrote analyses of these "characteristic symphonies" for the benefit of the hearers and his own glory. (As a violinist, Ditters showed himself a realist; for in 1786 he gave an imitation of the croaking of frogs upon the violin, and we read that the "cultured audience" was "un commonly well satisfied with this admirable player.") Another symphony bore the title, "Ill Combatti mento delle umane Passioni." He also wrote 12 violin concertos, 6 string quartets, 12 divertissements for two violins and 'cello, 12 four handed clavier sonates, cantatas and a concerto grosso.

He is also the author of a book, his "Autobiography," a sad and yet entertaining life, crammed with useful information concerning the habits of the times and with most sensible advice to students of the violin and composition. This volume is now rare. It is a little book of 300 pages wretchedly printed upon miserable paper. It was dictated to his son, and it was published in Leipzig by Breitkopf and Härtel in 1801. While it is true that the custom of having private orchestras gave great opportunities to composers in the service of Princes and inspired them to write without anxiety concerning an orchestra, public or publisher, the lot of these composers was a precarious one, and they were dependent upon the caprices of their patrons. The motto of Dittersdorf's Autobiography might well be this: "O! how wretched is that poor man that hangs on Princes' favors." Here is Dittersdorf, one of the acknowledged masters of his time, a virtuoso and a composer of undisputed ability, closing his description of his life with a pitiful statement of his income and expenses, and giving these as his last words to the reader: "Dear reader, do not suspect me of having written the above lines for the purpose of pumping alms from you. It is more than probable that I shall not be alive when you read this little book. But if any one will help my poor family after the destruction of my cottage, that is already rotten, O then will God surely recompense him! I am honest enough to admit that I have made my family doubly unhappy. First, on account of my poverty; second, on account of my sickness. Yet there is some excuse for my poverty, as my pension for twenty-six years of service has always been too small to pay my debts, and the money I had laid aside in case of need, the most of which has gone into the physician's little bag, the apothecary's shop and the health baths, (and all without help) I have been obliged to part with. On the contrary, my heedlessness in the sparing of my health is unpardonable, and the more so because a kindly nature presented me with a strong and solid body, upon which I, poor fool, have made wanton attacks."

This quartet in E flat was a favorite number of the famous Heckmann String Quartet of Cologne. "The first movement flows on smoothly and pleasantly in the style of Haydn. It is the work of a good musician of modest pretensions and healthy, blithesome humor. The finale brings a most delightful surprise, which Haydn need not have been ashamed to own: a species of gypsy music—a touch reaching out into the future! While the first violin plays a bold and defiantly thrown-off melody, the three other instruments hold a droning bass upon the deepest strings, which imitates most closely the bagpipe."

The Prince Nicolaus von Galitzen, of Saint Petersburg, was rich and fond of music. His yearly income was 60,000 ducats, and he amused his leisure moments by playing upon the violoncello. He wrote to Beethoven, saying that he was a great admirer of his talent; that if Beethoven would write one, two or three string quartets for him, he would pay whatever price he asked; and he assured him most politely of his distinguished consideration, etc. Beethoven replied to him in French, that he was highly pleased; that he could never set a date for the completion of a work, as he was not one of the "day laborers" who worked at so much by the day and page; that, nevertheless, as he was obliged to work for his living, he would write the quartets, and he fixed the price at 50 ducats each. The Prince replied in May, 1823, accepting the conditions without reserve. "I only ask for myself," he added, "a dedication to me, and the manuscript when you are through with it."

The quartets written by Beethoven for the Prince are op. 127, op. 130, and op. 132. The noble patron of art never paid for them, and when Beethoven dunned him, he replied as follows: "My dear and esteemed M. de Beethoven, you probably think me light and negligent for not answering your letter before this, especially since I have received from you two new masterpieces of your immortal and inexhaustble genius. But I have been so unlucky! Now I live way back in Russia, and in a few days I shall go to the war in Persia. Before I go, [illegible]oncelli.

---

Mme. Nordica makes her farewell appearance in America this season in grand operatic concert in Music Hall Thursday evening, the 28th inst., when she will be supported by Mme. Sophia Scalchi, Sig. Campanini and Mr. Z. Dome, baritone of Covent Garden, London. An orchestra of [illegible] will also assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING JAN. 4, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was quite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer, that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. [illegible] D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is [illegible] the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which are not too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the [illegible] execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer [illegible] rather pedantic reputation to [illegible]. The [illegible] movement was not nearly [illegible] the brasses were very un[illegible] more than once.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 5.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and the usual large audience of subscription patrons attended.

The programme prepared by Mr. Kneisel for the evening, though not new strictly, was played for the first time in these concerts, and its many beauties were fully realized in the admirable work done by the quartet and the assisting musicians taking part in its performance.

The works included in the list for the evening were Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli, the assisting musicians in this latter work being Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The playing of the quartet has never been better than on this occasion, and the audience was in the happiest mood to encourage the players, giving well merited applause for the admirable performances of the players.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11. Mr. Nikisch will offer on this occasion a programme of lighter character than usual, opening with the brilliant overture to Lala's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and including Goldmark's delightful symphony, "A Rustic Wedding." An interesting number in contrast with these will be the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist, and will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon" and a group of songs, accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

JOURNAL, Providence, R. I.

Date 1/3

Lillian Nordica made a "distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, recently. She undertook the task at forty-eight hours notice, Albani's continued illness making it necessary to provide a substitute. The shortness of the time prevented Mme. Nordica from having any rehearsal other than one of her part with Mr. Vianesi at the pianoforte immediately on her arrival in New York from the West. Her brilliant achievements secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 5, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Third Concert Proves a Treat to Lovers of Intellectual Music.

The concert given last evening by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall was the third of the series, and was postponed from Monday, Dec. 28. The programme presented lost nothing by the delay, if the enthusiasm and size of the audience may be taken as evidence.

The opening number was a quartet in E-flat major, by Carl von Dittersdorf, consisting of allegro, andante, minuetto non troppo, presto and finale, allegro.

This work has long been a favorite with string quartets, and Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists deserve much praise for the masterly manner they interpreted this often strange almost gypsy music—yet ever pleasing and melodious.

The second number included Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 130, which by the way the great composer placed in the front rank of this class of his compositions. The quartet is always graceful and has a peculiar charm about it, found, perhaps, in the dreamy melody, which comes and goes like a fitful shadow throughout its several movements. This number was given in full. The third and last number introduced an additional violin, viola and cello severally rendered by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz. The subject selected was an octet by Svendsen.

This clever Norwegian composer is well known to Boston audiences, and needs no introduction here, though it might be said he introduces into this special work some of those weird fancies of his race. The movement consists of an "Allegro risoluto ben marcato, allegro scherzando, andante sostenuto, moderato, and allegro assai con fuoco."

At the conclusion of this delightful composition the audience expressed itself in a most emphatic manner and heartily applauded Mr. Kneisel and his assistant artists.

Record, Philadelphia, P

Date 1-3

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING JAN. 5, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette gave their third concert at Union Hall last evening, presenting the following programme: Carl von Dittersdorf, quartette in E flat major; Beethoven, quartette in B flat, op. 130; Svendsen, octette for four violins, two violas and two cellos. All the numbers were played for the first time at these concerts and they were warmly appreciated by the large audience which was present.

The quartette by Dittersdorf is a work of blithe, healthy character, written somewhat in the style of Haydn, and enjoyable for its extreme daintiness and simplicity. It was delightfully rendered. In the Beethoven number the quartette did not seem to reach the high standard of excellence which usually characterizes their work; there was an evident lack of repose, which seemed to interfere with the precision and perfect ensemble of the quartette as a whole. The work itself is a scholarly one, written in the masterly style of Beethoven's later works, and needs more than a single hearing to be thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated.

The success of the evening was the Svendsen octette; this work, full of the vigor, fire and impetuosity of youth, has a decided Norwegian flavor, and contains many very striking and original effects, combined with rich coloring and warmth of treatment. It was played with a brilliancy, dash and passion which took the audience fairly by storm and was a fitting climax to a highly interesting programme. Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schultz assisted in the octette. The fourth concert is announced for Jan. 25, with Mme. Zeisler as the soloist.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. The joint appearance of the gifted young artistes, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell, will add a very attractive feature to the fine programme announced by Mr. Nikisch.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo.
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt.
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner.
Soli for Violoncello.
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cossmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

I shall surely send to Stieglitz & Co. 125 ducats." But he never sent them.

It is said that Beethoven during the composition of the three Galitzin quartets was besieged by so many ideas that he was compelled to write the quartets in C sharp minor and in F major. All these later quartets have provoked much discussion. They were not highly esteemed by his contemporaries, with the exception of Schuppanzigh, Link, and other devoted friends who did their best to translate them for the benefit of amateurs of music. Holz told Beethoven, when he had finished the one in B flat, op. 130, that he considered it the finest quartet he had yet written. "Each has its worth in its own way," was the proud answer of the composer. He however once avowed that he himself preferred the one in C sharp minor. The op. 130 was composed in 1825-26. There is a tradition that Beethoven was especially fond of the Cavatine in E flat, and said that none of his melodies had ever caused him such emotion. He had intended to use the fugue known as op. 133 for the finale of the quartet, and it is found there in the manuscript sent by Beethoven to the Prince; but Artaria, the publisher persuaded him to substitute another movement, on account of the length of the fugue. Some claim that the finale was the last thing written by Beethoven; but this is disputed.

The entertaining and hysterical de Lenz sees in the movements of this quartet the whole future of chamber music. The presto, cavatine and adagio are "the dust of the stars." Less impressionable critics, although they do not yield to Mr. de Lenz in their admiration of Beethoven, frankly say that they are obliged in the later quartets to hunt for the music until they find it; and that they are hardly to be regarded as pieces written for violins, "but that in despair of finding colors delicate and true enough, the artist has preferred to leave his conceptions as charcoal sketches." They also speak of "the poorness and scratchiness of tone produced, owing to the great compass the four parts are constantly made to cover.

Johann Severin Svendsen, Norwegian violinist and composer, was born in Christiania in 1840. He studied in Leipzig, and travelled extensively. In 1883 he was called to Copenhagen as Court-Kapellmeister. He is known in Boston by his orchestral works and chamber music. He is not a voluminous composer. Pougin, after speaking of his faults as seen in his orchestral writings, speaks thus of his merits: "His personality is eminently frank, sometimes even a little bizarre. There is poetic coloring in his andantes, a delightful fantasy in his scherzos, which are peculiarly his own in the ideas and the developments. His personality, which was sunk in the first symphony, is more clearly seen in the second, and is especially noticeable in his string quintet and string octet. And in this latter kind of music it seems to me he is strongest and really a master."

This octet is one of his early works, op. 3. The true octet differs from the double quartet, "for the eight instruments work together independently and not in two bodies—just as in the case of a composition for eight voices compared with one for two choirs or double chorus." Notes by Philip Hale.

Mme. Nordica makes her farewell appearance in America this season in grand operatic concert in Music Hall Thursday evening, the 28th inst., when she will be supported by Mme. Sophia Scalchi, Sig. Campanini and Mr. Z. Dome, baritone of Covent Garden, London. An orchestra of [illegible] will also assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING JAN. 4, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was quite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer, that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. 2, D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is certainly the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which are not too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the [illegible] execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer [illegible] rather pedantic reputation to [illegible] first movement was not nearly [illegible] the brasses were very un- [illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 5.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and the usual large audience of subscription patrons attended.

The programme prepared by Mr. Kneisel for the evening, though not new strictly, was played for the first time in these concerts, and its many beauties were fully realized in the admirable work done by the quartet and the assisting musicians taking part in its performance.

The works included in the list for the evening were Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncelli, the assisting musicians in this latter work being Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft, O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The playing of the quartet has never been better than on this occasion, and the audience was in the happiest mood to encourage the players, giving well merited applause for the admirable performances of the players.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11. Mr. Nikisch will offer on this occasion a programme of lighter character than usual, opening with the brilliant overture to Lala's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and including Goldmark's delightful symphony, "A Rustic Wedding." An interesting number in contrast with these will be the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist, and will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon" and a group of songs, accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch.

JOURNAL, Providence, R. I.

Date 1/9

Lillian Nordica made a distinguished success as Valentine in "The Huguenots" at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, recently. She undertook the task at forty-eight hours notice, Albani's continued illness making it necessary to provide a substitute. The shortness of the time prevented Mme. Nordica from having any rehearsal other than one of her part with Mr. Vianesi at the pianoforte immediately on her arrival in New York from the West. Her brilliant achievements secured her another engagement with Abbey & Grau to sing in "L'Africaine" on Jan. 15.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, JAN. 5, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Third Concert Proves a Treat to Lovers of Intellectual Music.

The concert given last evening by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall was the third of the series, and was postponed from Monday, Dec. 28. The programme presented lost nothing by the delay, if the enthusiasm and size of the audience may be taken as evidence.

The opening number was a quartet in E-flat major, by Carl von Dittersdorf, consisting of allegro, andante, minuetto non troppo, presto and finale, allegro.

This work has long been a favorite with string quartets, and Mr. Kneisel and his fellow artists deserve much praise for the masterly manner they interpreted this often strange almost gypsy music—yet ever pleasing and melodious.

The second number included Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 130, which by the way the great composer placed in the front rank of this class of his compositions. The quartet is always graceful and has a peculiar charm about it, found, perhaps, in the dreamy melody, which comes and goes like a fitful shadow throughout its several movements. This number was given in full. The third and last number introduced an additional violin, viola and cello severally rendered by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz. The subject selected was an octet by Svendsen.

This clever Norwegian composer is well known to Boston audiences, and needs no introduction here, though it might be said he introduces into this special work some of those weird fancies of his race. The movement consists of an "Allegro risoluto ben marcato, allegro scherzando, andante sostenuto, moderato, and allegro assai con fuoco."

At the conclusion of this delightful composition the audience expressed itself in a most emphatic manner and heartily applauded Mr. Kneisel and his assistant artists.

Record, Philadelphia, P

Date 1-3

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING JAN. 5, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel Quartette gave their third concert at Union Hall last evening, presenting the following programme: Carl von Dittersdorf, quartette in E flat major; Beethoven, quartette in B flat, op. 130; Svendsen, octette for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos. All the numbers were played for the first time at these concerts and they were warmly appreciated by the large audience which was present.

The quartette by Dittersdorf is a work of blithe, healthy character, written somewhat in the style of Haydn, and enjoyable for its extreme daintiness and simplicity. It was delightfully rendered. In the Beethoven number the quartette did not seem to reach the high standard of excellence which usually characterizes their work; there was an evident lack of repose, which seemed to interfere with the precision and perfect ensemble of the quartette as a whole. The work itself is a scholarly one, written in the masterly style of Beethoven's later works, and needs more than a single hearing to be thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated.

The success of the evening was the Svendsen octette; this work, full of the vigor, fire and impetuosity of youth, has a decided Norwegian flavor, and contains many very striking and original effects, combined with rich coloring and warmth of treatment. It was played with a brilliancy, dash and passion which took the audience fairly by storm and was a fitting climax to a highly interesting programme. Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schultz assisted in the octette. The fourth concert is announced for Jan. 25, with Mme. Zeisler as the soloist.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. The joint appearance of the gifted young artistes, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell, will add a very attractive feature to the fine programme announced by Mr. Nikisch.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys"	Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon"	Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal"	Wagner
Soli for Violoncello.
a Adagio	Tartini
b Moment Musicale	Schubert
c Tarentelle	Cassmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade	R. Strauss
b Nussbaum	Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur"	Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding"	Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE FINAL PADEREWSKI RECITALS—THE PHILHARMONIC.

The eleventh Symphony rehearsal and concert programme had for its first number Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound." A second hearing strengthens to some extent the favorable impression it created last season, when it was performed for the first time here. The composer's somewhat excessive dwelling upon the second theme imparts an air of monotony to the middle and concluding portions of the work, but as a whole it is strong and musically attractive. It was finely played.

Following the overture came the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola by Mozart. This work was on the original programme which was to have been presented at the Mozart concert two weeks ago, but was withdrawn owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. The movement performed is interesting and the treatment is broad and dignified; but its construction is such as to give to the solo instruments only moderate opportunities for individual display. Of course its performance in a hall as large as Music Hall was not dreamed of by Mozart. In spite of the brilliant, penetrating quality of Mr. Loeffler's violin and the full, noble tones that Mr. Kneisel drew from his viola, the solo parts were too slight in character to enable these players to hold their own successfully against the full string orchestra; and without the cadenza (written by Hellmesberges), the performance would have fallen flat. But this cadenza and especially its performance, made all the difference in the world. That each performer displayed in his part great beauty of tone and finish may be readily believed; but the unanimity of feeling that both evinced is less easily comprehended. The manner in which they played together,—their almost infallible accuracy in attacking and finishing phrases, the delicacy and variety of their nuances,—was nothing short of wonderful. It was, indeed, a triumph of a very unusual kind, and the enthusiastic applause which followed the conclusion of the movement was well earned.

The familiar and justly popular "Entr'acte" to Schubert's "Rosamunde" will never cease to be enjoyable. Its beautiful themes and exquisite tone coloring are always sure to excite a glow of delight in the heart of every music lover. It was given in an exceedingly delicate and tasteful manner; the wood-wind and horn playing being especially worthy of commendation.

Brahm's Symphony in D, was the closing number. Like Schubert's entr' act emusic, this beautiful work will always be a favorite with all lovers of pure music. Every successive performance but serves to reveal to the attentive listener many beauties of form and expression which it contains, but which at first remain unnoticed. With Brahms as well as Schumann Mr. Nikisch is at his best, which is equivalent to saying that the symphony was performed in a thoroughly artistic manner.

The third concert of the series by the Kniesel Quartet in Union Hall will be given on Monday night. This is the programme: Quartet in E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B-flat major, op 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for for this concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon. For solo players Miss Adele aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell are promised. This is the programme: For orchestra—Litolff, overture to "King Lear;" Reginald de Koven, dance and march of gnomes; F. Van der Stucken, "A Page of Love;" Arthur Bird, "A Carnival Scene;" Massenet, ballet music in "The Cid." Each of these works, except that last named, will be a novelty here. For pianoforte and orchestra—Tschaikowsky, concerto, Miss Aus der Ohe at the pianoforte. For violin and orchestra—Saint-Saens, rondo capriccioso, Miss Powell, solo violin.

Clipping from Telegraph,

~~BULLETIN~~, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/2

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following programme will be rendered: Overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; song with Orchestra, "Mignon," Liszt; Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; Solo for Violoncello, Alvin Schroeder; Songs with Piano; Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

—The renowned pianist, Ignace Paderewski, is announced to give three piano forte recitals at the Academy of Music on the afternoons of the 19th, 21st, and 22d insts. It is settled in advance that these will be great musical events. Mr. S. Behrens has the enterprise in charge. Mr. Behrens was manager of the great Von Bulow matinee at the Academy, which remains the banner event of the kind in Philadelphia. Will Paderewski break the record?

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given last evening in Union Hall. The programme was one of great interest, and each of the numbers was played for the first time at these concerts. Unfortunately the concert was too long. It lasted over two hours, and when chamber music is heard for that length of time the ear is generally fatigued, however admirable the performance may be.

The first number was a quartette in E flat major by Karl von Dittersdorf, the distinguished violinist and composer, who died at the very end of the last century. "The darling of our nation," Gerber called him in his Dictionary of Musicians written before Dittersdorf's death. During the composer's lifetime he was chiefly known by his violin playing, his operas, his oratorios and his symphonies upon subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses—early examples of programme music. His string quartettes are not mentioned by his contemporaries. Nor does Dittersdorf himself allude to them in his fascinating and pathetic "Autobiography"—a book that for its genuine sincerity, its frankness in exposing faults of character, its delightful simplicity, may be compared to the memories of Cellini and Restif. And yet this quartette in E flat must certainly have excited attention in its day, for in some respects, particularly in its last movement, where the first violin plays a defiant gypsy melody to the accompaniment of a bagpipe drone, it was ahead of its time. The first movement is in the style of Haydn, smoothly written, melodious, and interesting throughout. The andante is distinguished by the air given the first violin, and the menuet is of the old fashioned sort, a compromise between the pomp of the court danse and the jollity of the romping of the people. It is a relief in these days when so many musicians, less richly endowed by nature than Dittersdorf, strive to conceal poverty of ideas by labored attempts at profundity; when they must be characteristic at any cost; and when they talk knowingly of the intellectual in music and of the mission of music—it is a relief to hear the honest and pretty tunes of old composers who wrote spontaneously.

The great quartette of Beethoven in B flat, op. 130, followed the Dittersdorf number. It is a wonderful, an almost impossible work. There is the noble cavatine that Beethoven confessed had moved him more deeply than any one of his melodies. And there are pages that inevitably seem coarse and without purpose or beauty owing to the treatment of the four parts. Perhaps the critics are not to be blamed who claim that the earlier quartettes of Beethoven are music; that in the later quartettes music occasionally occurs. We are all too much in awe of great names. We are too apt to accept everything that is written by a famous man as wholly admirable. We do not even reject the contents of his waste basket. Now, no one denies the frequent sublimity of thought, the marvelous effects found in the later works of Beethoven; but when it is said that they are from beginning to end the supreme expression of his genius, that is a different matter. To be sure, even in these alleged days of liberty of thought it is counted as blasphemy to question the value of these later works; and to prefer them to the rounded compositions of the earlier period is held by some a sure symptom of superior musical intelligence.

The final number was Svendsen's octet for strings, op. 3. It is a long and carefully elaborated work. The first movement is perhaps too carefully treated, and the thematic development is so insisted upon that the themes themselves lose their value, which is, after all, but slight. The second movement is an exceedingly characteristic allegro scherzando. It is full of color, cleverly arranged for the instruments, and there is a fantasy displayed that at times is bizarre. Upon the whole, it is the most striking movement of the work, although the andante is not without beauty, and the finale is strongly written. The octet suffered from its position, coming after the Beethoven number, which had exhausted the attention of all who had closely followed it.

The performance throughout the evening was worthy of the highest praise. These works, differing so widely in character, were all most sympathetically treated. The frankness and the simplicity of Dittersdorf were reproduced without affectation; and the romantic spirit of Beethoven was not confounded with the modern romanticism of Svendsen. The great difficulties of the Beethoven quartette were surmounted with apparent ease. And take it all and all, the concert was a remarkable exhibition of the perfection of ensemble playing. In the octet Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz lent valuable assistance.

The next concert will be given Monday evening, Jan. 25. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys"..................Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon"........Liszt
Prelude "Parsifal"......................Wagner
Solo for Violoncello.
a Adagio..................................Tartini
b Moment Musicale....................Schubert
c Tarentella.............................Cassmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade.............................R. Strauss
b Nussbaum............................Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur"..........Brahms
Symphony "Rustic Wedding"....Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artiste, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

OBSERVER, Newport, R. I.

1-4

A Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's popularity [illegible] city judging from the high appreciation manifested for its performance at Sander's Theatre, Music Hall, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. It was the fourth of a series of six and the audience was a crowded one. The theatre is a very pretty little one, but certainly not adapted for a concert hall, the acoustic properties being more suited to the rendering of a Latin prize poem than a violin solo, a fact that Mr. C. M Loeffler, the well-known soloist, thoroughly appreciates. The program was an especially attractive one, the first number, "A Faust Overture," by Wagner, being by no means as extremely Wagnerian as some of the great composer's better known works, but better calculated to please at a first hearing. The second number was a "Suite for violin and orchestra" composed by Mr. Loeffler who took the solo part. It's title is "Les Veillies de l'Ukraine" It is a thoroughly charming production and the fact that they are associated with such a clever composer must be a source of pride to the orchestra. The ability to compose and to execute a brilliant musical work is given to but few men, and in this instance the skill manifested in the solo performance was only equalled by what may almost be termed genius displayed in the composition. The reception of Mr. Loeffler's efforts were very cordial but wonder was expressed that it was not more pronounced. The third and last part of the program was the well-known Goldmark Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op 26. It has five movements, (1) "Wedding March," with variations; (2) "Bridal Song;" (3) "Serenade" (4) "In the Garden;" (5) "Dance and Finale." It is a thoroughly exquisite work, compelling the musical devotee to flee, in thought, countryward. And so realistic does it appear in parts that it required but little vividness of imagination to be able to agree with an auditor who said it was possible to believe one's self in the country and to be able to "smell the wild flowers." Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducted with great ease and evidently had full confidence in his musicians.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

MUSIC.

Two Great Orchestras to Be Heard on Consecutive Monday Nights.

The second New York Symphony Orchestra concert takes place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Walter Damrosch will conduct and Madame Marie Ritter-Goetze and Adolph Brodsky will be the soloists.

Madame Goetze is a contralto who has gained an enviable position on the concert and operatic stages. During the last season of Wagner opera in New York she and Mme. Lehmann won the highest honors through their excellent operatic impersonations. Her accession to the concert stage has been one of the musical events of the season.

Mr. Bredsky is the concert-master and solo violinist of the Damrosch orchestra and is a thoroughly accomplished artist. His solo playing on the violin has attracted as much favorable attention as that of any virtuoso heard in this country in recent years. The programme which Mr. Damrosch has arranged for this concert is a country admiarble one.

Symphony in C..............................Schubert
Concerto, for Violin with Orchestra. Mendelssohn
Adolph Brodsky.
Theme and Variations on the Austrian National Hymn...........................Haydn
String Orchestra.
Air, from "William of Orange"..............Eckert
Frau Ritter-Goetze.
Rhapsody, No. 1.....................................Liszt

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch and his Boston musicians have won for themselves a popularity in this city which insures them a cordial welcome and a great audience whenever they appear. The third concert of their series at the Academy of Music will be given on Monday evening, January 11. A somewhat lighter programme than usual will be presented, opening with the brilliant overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys" and closing with Goldmark's charming symphony, "The Rustic Wedding." An interesting contrast to these numbers will be afforded by the prelude, "Parsibal," Wagner. Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist. She will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon," and in a group of songs accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch. The sale of seats opens to-morrow at 1119 Chestnut Street.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Ma
Date 1/2

....The Boston Symphony orchestra will give Shum~~ann's music to "Manfred" on~~ Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9. Mr. George Riddle will read the poem.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1892.

AT THE tenth Symphony Concert fancy could picture waves, shipwrecks and calms in Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony, and the quiet power of the holy grail in the Parcifal Prelude; but what does Handel's Concerto in F picture, with its echoing and re-echoing of strings and wind orchestras, except his own richly joyous musical conceits. Though probably written about 1740, it had not been given in Boston before; nor did we hear now all of the original nine movements, but only some five of them, with their use of themes elsewhere found in his oratorios. The Rubinstein Symphony was given in its original form. Christmas and the rain kept scores of people away from this delightful concert, or sent them home too early.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE FINAL PADEREWSKI RECITALS—THE PHILHARMONIC.

The eleventh Symphony rehearsal and concert programme had for its first number Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound." A second hearing strengthens to some extent the favorable impression it created last season, when it was performed for the first time here. The composer's somewhat excessive dwelling upon the second theme imparts an air of monotony to the middle and concluding portions of the work, but as a whole it is strong and musically attractive. It was finely played.

Following the overture came the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola by Mozart. This work was on the original programme which was to have been presented at the Mozart concert two weeks ago, but was withdrawn owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. The movement performed is interesting and the treatment is broad and dignified; but its construction is such as to give to the solo instruments only moderate opportunities for individual display. Of course its performance in a hall as large as Music Hall was not dreamed of by Mozart. In spite of the brilliant, penetrating quality of Mr. Loeffler's violin and the full, noble tones that Mr. Kneisel drew from his viola, the solo parts were too slight in character to enable these players to hold their own successfully against the full string orchestra; and without the cadenza (written by Hellmesberges), the performance would have fallen flat. Butthis cadenza and especially its performance,made all the difference in the world. That each performer displayed in his part great beauty of tone and finish may be readily believed; but the unanimity of feeling that both evinced is less easily comprehended. The manner in which they played together,—their almost infallible accuracy in attacking and finishing phrases, the delicacy and variety of their nuances,—was nothing short of wonderful. It was, indeed, a triumph of a very unusual kind, and the enthusiastic applause which followed the conclusion of the movement was well earned.

The familiar and justly popular "Entr'acte" to Schubert's "Rosamunde" will never cease to be enjoyable. Its beautiful themes and exquisite tone coloring are always sure to excite a glow of delight in the heart of every music lover. It was given in an exceedingly delicate and tasteful manner; the wood-wind and horn playing being especially worthy of commendation.

Brahm's Symphony in D, was the closing number. Like Schubert's entr' act emusic, this beautiful work will always be a favorite with all lovers of pure music. Every successive performance but serves to reveal to the attentive listener many beauties of form and expression which it contains, but which at first remain unnoticed. With Brahms as well as Schumann Mr. Nikisch is at his best, which is equivalent to saying that the symphony was performed in a thoroughly artistic manner.

The third concert of the series by the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall will be given on Monday night. This is the programme: Quartet in E flat major, Dittersdorf; quartet in B-flat major, op 130, Beethoven; Svendsen's string octet. Tickets dated Dec. 28 are good for for this concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon. For solo players Miss Adele aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell are promised. This is the programme: For orchestra—Litolff, overture to "King Lear;" Reginald de Koven, dance and march of gnomes; F. Van der Stucken, "A Page of Love;" Arthur Bird, "A Carnival Scene;" Massenet, ballet music in "The Cid." Each of these works, except that last named, will be a novelty here. For pianoforte and orchestra—Tschaikowsky, concerto, Miss Aus der Ohe at the pianoforte. For violin and orchestra—Saint-Saens, rondo capriccioso, Miss Powell, solo violin.

Clipping from Telegraph,

~~BULLETIN~~, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/2

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following programme will be rendered: Overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; song with Orchestra, "Mignon," Liszt; Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; Solo for Violoncello, Alvin Schroeder; Songs with Piano; Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it.

—The renowned pianist, Ignace Paderewski, is announced to give three piano forte recitals at the Academy of Music on the afternoons of the 19th, 21st, and 22d insts. It is settled in advance that these will be great musical events. Mr. S. Behrens has the enterprise in charge. Mr. Behrens was manager of the great Von Bulow matinee at the Academy, which remains the banner event of the kind in Philadelphia. Will Paderewski break the record?

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given last evening in Union Hall. The programme was one of great interest, and each of the numbers was played for the first time at these concerts. Unfortunately the concert was too long. It lasted over two hours, and when chamber music is heard for that length of time the ear is generally fatigued, however admirable the performance may be.

The first number was a quartette in E flat major by Karl von Dittersdorf, the distinguished violinist and composer, who died at the very end of the last century. "The darling of our nation," Gerber called him in his Dictionary of Musicians written before Dittersdorf's death. During the composer's lifetime he was chiefly known by his violin playing, his operas, his oratorios and his symphonies upon subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses—early examples of programme music. His string quartettes are not mentioned by his contemporaries. Nor does Dittersdorf himself allude to them in his fascinating and pathetic "Autobiography"—a book that for its genuine sincerity, its frankness in exposing faults of character, its delightful simplicity, may be compared to the memories of Cellini and Restif. And yet this quartette in E flat must certainly have excited attention in its day, for in some respects, particularly in its last movement, where the first violin plays a defiant gypsy melody to the accompaniment of a bagpipe drone, it was ahead of its time. The first movement is in the style of Haydn, smoothly written, melodious, and interesting throughout. The andante is distinguished by the air given the first violin, and the menuet is of the old fashioned sort, a compromise between the pomp of the court danse and the jollity of the romping of the people. It is a relief in these days when so many musicians, less richly endowed by nature than Dittersdorf, strive to conceal poverty of ideas by labored attempts at profundity; when they must be characteristic at any cost; and when they talk knowingly of the intellectual in music and of the mission of music—it is a relief to hear the honest and pretty tunes of old composers who wrote spontaneously.

The great quartette of Beethoven in B flat, op. 130. followed the Dittersdorf number. It is a wonderful, an almost impossible work. There is the noble cavatine that Beethoven confessed had moved him more deeply than any one of his melodies. And there are pages that inevitably seem coarse and without purpose or beauty owing to the treatment of the four parts. Perhaps the critics are not to be blamed who claim that the earlier quartettes of Beethoven are music; that in the later quartettes music occasionally occurs. We are all too much in awe of great names. We are too apt to accept everything that is written by a famous man as wholly admirable. We do not even reject the contents of his waste basket. Now, no one denies the frequent sublimity of thought, the marvelous effects found in the later works of Beethoven; but when it is said that they are from beginning to end the supreme expression of his genius, that is a different matter. To be sure, even in these alleged days of liberty of thought it is counted as blasphemy to question the value of these later works; and to prefer them to the rounded compositions of the earlier period is held by some a sure symptom of superior musical intelligence.

The final number was Svendsen's octet for strings, op. 3. It is a long and carefully elaborated work. The first movement is perhaps too carefully treated, and the thematic development is so insisted upon that the themes themselves lose their value, which is, after all, but slight. The second movement is an exceedingly characteristic allegro scherzando. It is full of color, cleverly arranged for the instruments, and there is a fantasy displayed that at times is bizarre. Upon the whole, it is the most striking movement of the work, although the andante is not without beauty, and the finale is strongly written. The octet suffered from its position, coming after the Beethoven number, which had exhausted the attention of all who had closely followed it.

The performance throughout the evening was worthy of the highest praise. These works, differing so widely in character, were all most sympathetically treated. The frankness and the simplicity of Dittersdorf were reproduced without affectation; and the romantic spirit of Beethoven was not confounded with the modern romanticism of Svendsen. The great difficulties of the Beethoven quartette were surmounted with apparent ease. And take it all and all, the concert was a remarkable exhibition of the perfection of ensemble playing. In the octet Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz lent valuable assistance.

The next concert will be given Monday evening, Jan. 25. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 11, when the following varied and attractive programme will be rendered:

Overture "Le Roi D'ys"..................Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon"........Liszt
Prelude "Parsifal"....................Wagner
Solo for Violoncello.
a Adagio..............................Tartini
b Moment Musicale..................Schubert
c Tarentella........................Cassmann
Songs with Piano.
a Serenade........................R. Strauss
b Nussbaum........................Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur"............Brahms
Symphony "Rustic Wedding"....Goldmark

The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artiste, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

OBSERVER, Newport, R. I.

Date 1-4

A Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's popularity [illegible] city judging from the high appreciation manifested for its performance at Sander's Theatre, Music Hall, Cambridge, on Thursday evening. It was the fourth of a series of six and the audience was a crowded one. The theatre is a very pretty little one, but certainly not adapted for a concert hall, the acoustic properties being more suited to the rendering of a Latin prize poem than a violin solo,a fact that Mr. C. M Loeffler, the well-known soloist, thoroughly appreciates. The program was an especially attractive one, the first number, "A Faust Overture," by Wagner, being by no means as extremely Wagnerian as some of the great composer's better known works, but better calculated to please at a first hearing. The second number was a "Suite for violin and orchestra" composed by Mr. Loeffler who took the solo part. It's title is "Les Veillies de l'Ukraine" It is a thoroughly charming production and the fact that they are associated with such a clever composer must be a source of pride to the orchestra. The ability to compose and to execute a brilliant musical work is given to but few men,and in this instance the skill manifested in the solo performance was only equalled by what may almost be termed genius displayed in the composition. The reception of Mr. Loeffler's efforts were very cordial but wonder was expressed that it was not more pronounced. The third and last part of the program was the well known Goldmark Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op 26. It has five movements, (1) "Wedding March," with variations; (2) "Bridal Song;" (3) "Serenade" (4) "In the Garden;" (5) "Dance and Finale." It is a thoroughly exquisite work, compelling the musical devotee to flee, in thought, countryward. And so realistic does it appear in parts that it required but little vividness of imagination to be able to agree with an auditor who said it was possible to believe one's self in the country and to be able to "smell the wild flowers." Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducted with great ease and evidently had full confidence in his musicians.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-8

MUSIC.

Two Great Orchestras to Be Heard on Consecutive Monday Nights.

The second New York Symphony Orchestra concert takes place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Walter Damrosch will conduct and Madame Marie Ritter-Goetze and Adolph Brodsky will be the soloists.

Madame Goetze is a contralto who has gained an enviable position on the concert and operatic stages. During the last season of Wagner opera in New York she and Mme. Lehmann won the highest honors through their excellent operatic impersonations. Her accession to the concert stage has been one of the musical events of the season.

Mr. Brodsky is the concert-master and solo violinist of the Damrosch orchestra and is a thoroughly accomplished artist. His solo playing on the violin has attracted as much favorable attention as that of any virtuoso heard in this country in recent years. The programme which Mr. Damrosch has arranged for this concert is a country admiarble one.

Symphony in C..................................Schubert
Concerto, for Violin with Orchestra. Mendelssohn
Adolph Brodsky.
Theme and Variations on the Austrian National Hymn..Haydn
String Orchestra.
Air, from "William of Orange"..............Eckert
Frau Ritter-Goetze.
Rhapsody, No. 1...Liszt

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch and his Boston musicians have won for themselves a popularity in this city which insures them a cordial welcome and a great audience whenever they appear. The third concert of their series at the Academy of Music will be given on Monday evening, January 11. A somewhat lighter programme than usual will be presented, opening with the brilliant overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys" and closing with Goldmark's charming symphony, "The Rustic Wedding." An interesting contrast to these numbers will be afforded by the prelude, "Parsibal," Wagner. Mrs. Nikisch will be the vocalist. She will be heard in Liszt's "Mignon," and in a group of songs accompanied at the piano by Mr. Nikisch. The sale of seats opens to-morrow at 1119 Chestnut Street.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Ma
Date 1/2

....The Boston Symphony orchestra will give Shumann's music to "Manfred" on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9. Mr. George Riddle will read the poem.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1892.

AT THE tenth Symphony Concert fancy could picture waves, shipwrecks and calms in Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony, and the quiet power of the holy grail in the Parcifal Prelude; but what does Handel's Concerto in F picture, with its echoing and re-echoing of strings and wind orchestras, except his own richly joyous musical conceits. Though probably written about 1740, it had not been given in Boston before; nor did we hear now all of the original nine movements, but only some five of them, with their use of themes elsewhere found in his oratorios. The Rubinstein Symphony was given in its original form. Christmas and the rain kept scores of people away from this delightful concert, or sent them home too early.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD.

Thursday Evening, January 7, 1892, at 8.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE RENOWNED
PRIMA DONNA SOPRANO,

Madame Nordica!

Accompanied by the following distinguished Artists:

Mr. Z. DÖME,

Baritone, of Covent Garden, London.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

Solo Violin and Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER,

Violoncello Virtuoso, and the famous

KNEISEL QUARTET.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1ST VIOLIN,	MR. L. SVECENSKI, VIOLA.
MR. OTTO ROTH, 2D VIOLIN.	MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER, VIOLONCELLO.

Programme.

QUARTET in E flat. Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Finale. KNEISEL QUARTET.	Carl von Dittersdorf
ARIA. "Eri tu" (Masked Ball.) MR. DÖME.	Verdi
SOLI for VIOLONCELLO. a) SARABANDE. b) TARENTELLE. MR. SCHROEDER.	Bach Cossman
ARIA. "Una voce." (Barber of Seville.) MME. NORDICA.	Rossini
ANDANTE from QUARTET in D major. KNEISEL QUARTET.	Tschaikowsky
SONG. "Les Filles de Cadiz." MME. NORDICA.	Delibes
SOLO for VIOLIN. Rhapsodie Hongroise. MR. KNEISEL.	Hauser
SONG. "Star of the Evening." (Tannhæuser.) MR. DÖME.	Wagner
a) CAVATINA from QUARTET B flat. b) MENUET. KNEISEL QUARTET.	Beethoven Boccherini
POLACCA. "Esmeralda." MME. MORDICA.	A. Goring Thomas
PRESTO from QUARTET D major. KNEISEL QUARTET.	Haydn

TICKETS with reserved seats 75c, and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

ALWIN SCHROEDER.

[89]

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

Union Hall: Kneisel Quartet.

The third concert of the current series by the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall, postponed from Dec. 28, was given on Monday night, when these three works were played:

Dittersdorf—Quartet in E-flat major.
Beethoven—Quartet in B-flat major, op. 130.
Svendsen—Octet for strings, op. 3.

Quartet—Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder. Assistants in the octet—Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz.

Each of these works was noted on the bill as a novelty at these concerts. Dittersdorf's quartet is an interesting work, not so much on its own account perhaps as because of the illustration that it furnishes of the effect which an artist's environment has on his productions. Here is a quartet with so many reminders of Haydn that only a close student may be sure that it is not the better known master to whom he is listening. Dittersdorf is now unknown except to a few connoisseurs here and there, yet in his day his claim to distinction as a composer in many forms was freely recognized by the knowing ones, even if the public did not sufficiently recompense him for his efforts to edify the lovers of music. The resemblance to his more famous contemporary and fellow townsman must be attributed to the unconscious influence of the fashion of the period. Dittersdorf, however, could be orignal, as is shown in the Andante of this quartet, where the first violin plays a gypsy tune to the drone, like a bagpipe, of the other members of the quartet. In sprightly, simple melody, the quartet is a fine example of the sort of thing that satisfied amateurs a hundred years ago.

Beethoven's great quartet, one of the three written on the order of the Russian prince, Nicholas von Galitzin, and never paid for by that noble amateur, is, like much of the chamber music by its composer that is numbered beyond one hundred on the "opus" list, a puzzler to many. The short movement marked Alla danza Tedesca and the cavatine, for which the master confessed a special admiration, are neither too profound nor too light for the amateur of average capacity. For the rest, however, one must have a special training, not to say liking, thoroughly to enjoy it. Svendsen's octet, on the other hand, is a composition that is likely to please everybody that takes an honest delight in chamber music. With moments that are not free from extravagance, or at least from a charge of overdoing, judged by a conservative standard, it has a pervading picturesqueness, all expressed with a freedom that is very captivating. The second movement, Allegro Scherzardo, is particularly impressive as a bit of picturesque romanticism in music.

Throughout the concert the players sustained their high reputation for accuracy in all matters. At the fourth concert, Jan. 25, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. This is the programme: For orchestra—Litolff, overture to "King Lear;" Reginald de Koven, dance and march of gnomes; F. Van der Stücken, "A Page of Love;" Arthur Bird, "A Carnival Scene;" Massenet, ballet music in "The Cid." Each of these works, except that last named, will be a novelty here. For pianoforte and orchestra—Tschaikowsky, concerto, Miss aus der Ohe at the pianoforte. For violin and orchestra—Saint-Saëns, rondo capriccioso, Miss Powell, solo violin.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

Musical Matters.

The third concert of the Kneizel Quartet was given last evening at Union Hall. The programme included a quartet in E flat, by Dittersdorf; the B flat quartet of Beethoven, Op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for strings, Op. 3. The last composition was the least interesting of the three, but at the same time an acceptable contribution. The so-called "great quartet" of Beethoven, intermittant with beauty and less acceptable writing, was finely rendered. Most interesting of all was the Dittersdorf number, with its fascinating and melodious measures, pure and frank in treatment from beginning to end. Would that our modern composers might return to this charming mode of chamber music. But, alas! it takes spontaneous genius to produce such. The intellect is secondary. It is unnecessary to say that the playing during the whole programme was faultless. What else could be the result of such refined taste and direction as Mr. Franz Kneizel presents.

The Young People's Popular Concert tomorrow afternoon will present a programme that must meet the desires of every one. Aus der Ohe will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, and Maud Powell, without question the first lady violinist of the country, will play the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint-Saens. Three American compositions will be given by the orchestra, and all for the first time.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1892.

FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, the violinist.

The first number of the programme was Litolff's overture to "King Lear," a play that has been used as an opera subject by Andre and Semeladis. Overtures bearing the same title have been composed by Leidgebel, Balakireff and Berlioz. The one by the great Frenchman—alas! it is too seldom heard—is full of the grief and the agony and the raging storm of Shakspeare's tragedy. In comparison with it this overture by Litolff is a poor thing, conventional and dull. And what, pray, has it to do with Lear or Cordelia? To be sure it is not without an incongruous and tinsel pomp, not, perhaps, out of place in an overture written for some special occasion—for the opening of a German exposition of industries or for the dedication of a city market.

Three numbers by American composers were bunched together, and, as the overture, they were played for the first time in Boston. The name of Reginald De Koven has been hitherto associated with comic operas and songs. He is now the musical editor of the New York World. He has given the orchestral piece played yesterday the title "Danse and March of the Gnomes." The gnome is a familiar figure in the musical menagerie, and his habits are well known. He delights in the triangle, the cymbals and the bass drum, and he prefers, as a rule, the minor mode to the major. Mr. De Koven's gnomes have, however, learned one new trick. When they dance they whistle the tunes of Grieg. Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a melodious salon piece for orchestra, and Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an echo of music that has been written before his day, descriptive, or supposed to be descriptive of the carnival. The instrumentation is clever—and that is all.

Miss Aus der Ohe was heard in Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. This concerto gains with each hearing. It is full of fine fantasy, noble frenzy, haunting melody, and skillful workmanship. Above all, it has a strange, pungent, savage perfume. It makes severe demands upon the temperament and the mechanism of the pianist. Now, Miss Aus der Ohe is a most interesting temperamental study. She glides across the stage, cool, virginal, the Diana of the pianoforte: but the moment she touches the keys she undergoes a transformation; and while she does not lose her self-control and while she watches the flight of her musical arrows, little by little she becomes intensely human. Seldom is such virility seen in a woman's playing: and, yesterday, her feminine instinct of refinement kept her from abusing her strength. So that while her performance was bold and broad, strong and manly, it was also impassioned; and when occasion required, she showed daintiness, elegance, and a sentiment that was never mawkish. Although she played with abandon, the ability to curb her passion accompanied the display of her temperament. She was most heartily applauded.

Miss Maud Powell played Saint-Saens's Rondo Capriccioso. She has long been distinguished for the breadth and richness of her tone, the sureness of her mechanism, and the sincerity of her art. To-day she plays with greater elasticity and with more marked confidence in the expression of her convictions. It is a pleasure to watch the steady growth of this admirable violinist; it is also a pleasure to foresee that she has not yet reached the limits of her capacity. She, too, was most warmly applauded. In spite of many recalls she modestly and sensibly contented herself with bowing in response to the demands of the audience.

The final number of the programme was the brilliant and exhilarating ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." It was given with great spirit and with a full appreciation of its rhythms and its colors.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 7, 1892.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

First of the Series Given at Music Hall Yesterday.

Despite the inclemency of the weather the first concert in the series of "Young People's Populars," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, attracted a very large audience to Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch had arranged a programme in which several novelties were introduced for the first time in this city, and in addition to the orchestral numbers Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell appeared as soloists.

The opening number by the orchestra was Littolff's overture, "King Lear." The piece was ambitious in design, but lacked harmonious development, and there was but little variety in the instrumentation, in which the brasses played a very prominent part. "Pagina d'Amore," by F. van der Stucken, was in many places reminiscent of Wagner, and appeared to be more of an imitation than an inspiration.

Of Mr. Reginald de Koven's "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" it is gratifying to speak in praise. The dainty, tripping measures of the dance, the odd conceits in orchestration, and the humorous blending of instruments were delightfully suggestive of the revels of the elves, and the composition was greeted with generous applause. "A Carnival Scene," by Mr. Arthur Bird, was also well received. The composer is happy in ingenious scoring, and the separate themes depicting the bustle and jollity of the merrymasqueraders were clearly worked out and quaintly contrasted. These numbers were performed for the first time here.

Miss Aus der Ohe played the long and difficult concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23, by Tschaikowsky. The piece bristles with difficulties, but Miss Der Ohe played with perfect freedom and ease, and charmed the audience with a beautiful performance. Her octave playing seemed almost perfection, and her rendition of the peculiar characteristics of the Russian composer was thoroughly enjoyable.

The charming violinist, Miss Maud Powell, gave a rondo for violin by Saint-Saens in an exquisite manner. She was recalled several times, but no encores were given. The entertaining concert ended with an admirable performance by the orchestra of Massenet's ballet music from [illegible]

GRAND OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD.

Thursday Evening, January 7, 1892, at 8.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE RENOWNED
PRIMA DONNA SOPRANO,

Madame Nordica!

Accompanied by the following distinguished Artists:

Mr. Z. DÖME,

Baritone, of Covent Garden, London.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

Solo Violin and Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER,

Violoncello Virtuoso, and the famous

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.	Mr. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.	Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

Programme.

QUARTET in E flat. Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Finale.	KNEISEL QUARTET.	Carl von Dittersdorf
ARIA. "Eri tu" (Masked Ball.)	MR. DÖME.	Verdi
SOLI for Violoncello. a) Sarabande. b) Tarentelle.	MR. SCHROEDER.	 Bach Cossman
ARIA. "Una voce." (Barber of Seville.)	MME. NORDICA.	Rossini
ANDANTE from Quartet in D major.	KNEISEL QUARTET.	Tschaikowsky
SONG. "Les Filles de Cadiz."	MME. NORDICA.	Delibes
SOLO for Violin. Rhapsodie Hongroise.	MR. KNEISEL.	Hauser
SONG. "Star of the Evening." (Tannhæuser.)	MR. DÖME.	Wagner
a) CAVATINA from Quartet B flat. b) MENUET.	KNEISEL QUARTET.	Beethoven Boccherini
POLACCA. "Esmeralda."	MME. MORDICA.	A. Goring Thomas
PRESTO from Quartet D major.	KNEISEL QUARTET.	Haydn

TICKETS with reserved seats 75c, and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

Union Hall: Kneisel Quartet.

The third concert of the current series by the Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall, postponed from Dec. 28, was given on Monday night, when these three works were played:

Dittersdorf—Quartet in E-flat major.
Beethoven—Quartet in B-flat major, op. 130.
Svendsen—Octet for strings, op. 3.

Quartet—Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder. Assistants in the octet—Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz.

Each of these works was noted on the bill as a novelty at these concerts. Dittersdorf's quartet is an interesting work, not so much on its own account perhaps as because of the illustration that it furnishes of the effect which an artist's environment has on his productions. Here is a quartet with so many reminders of Haydn that only a close student may be sure that it is not the better known master to whom he is listening. Dittersdorf is now unknown except to a few connoisseurs here and there, yet in his day his claim to distinction as a composer in many forms was freely recognized by the knowing ones, even if the public did not sufficiently recompense him for his efforts to edify the lovers of music. The resemblance to his more famous contemporary and fellow townsman must be attributed to the unconscious influence of the fashion of the period. Dittersdorf, however, could be orignal, as is shown in the Andante of this quartet, where the first violin plays a gypsy tune to the drone, like a bagpipe, of the other members of the quartet. In sprightly, simple melody, the quartet is a fine example of the sort of thing that satisfied amateurs a hundred years ago.

Beethoven's great quartet, one of the three written on the order of the Russian prince, Nicholas von Galitzin, and never paid for by that noble amateur, is, like much of the chamber music by its composer that is numbered beyond one hundred on the "opus" list, a puzzler to many. The short movement marked Alla danza Tedesca and the cavatine, for which the master confessed a special admiration, are neither too profound nor too light for the amateur of average capacity. For the rest, however, one must have a special training, not to say liking, thoroughly to enjoy it. Svendsen's octet, on the other hand, is a composition that is likely to please everybody that takes an honest delight in chamber music. With moments that are not free from extravagance, or at least from a charge of overdoing, judged by a conservative standard, it has a pervading picturesqueness, all expressed with a freedom that is very captivating. The second movement, Allegro Scherzardo, is particularly impressive as a bit of picturesque romanticism in music.

Throughout the concert the players sustained their high reputation for accuracy in all matters. At the fourth concert, Jan. 25, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall tomorrow afternoon. This is the programme: For orchestra—Litolff, overture to "King Lear;" Reginald de Koven, dance and march of gnomes; F. Van der Stücken, "A Page of Love;" Arthur Bird, "A Carnival Scene;" Massenet, ballet music in "The Cid." Each of these works, except that last named, will be a novelty here. For pianoforte and orchestra—Tschaikowsky, concerto, Miss aus der Ohe at the pianoforte. For violin and orchestra—Saint-Saëns, rondo capriccioso, Miss Powell, solo violin.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

Musical Matters.

X

The third concert of the Kneizel Quartet was given last evening at Union Hall. The programme included a quartet in E flat, by Dittersdorf; the B flat quartet of Beethoven, Op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for strings, Op. 3. The last composition was the least interesting of the three, but at the same time an acceptable contribution. The so-called "great quartet" of Beethoven, intermittant with beauty and less acceptable writing, was finely rendered. Most interesting of all was the Dittersdorf number, with its fascinating and melodious measures, pure and frank in treatment from beginning to end. Would that our modern composers might return to this charming mode of chamber music. But, alas! it takes spontaneous genius to produce such. The intellect is secondary. It is unnecessary to say that the playing during the whole programme was faultless. What else could be the result of such refined taste and direction as Mr. Franz Kneizel presents.

The Young People's Popular Concert tomorrow afternoon will present a programme that must meet the desires of every one. Aus der Ohe will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, and Maud Powell, without question the first lady violinist of the country, will play the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint-Saens. Three American compositions will be given by the orchestra, and all for the first time.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1892.

FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, the violinist.

The first number of the programme was Litolff's overture to "King Lear," a play that has been used as an opera subject by Andre and Semeladis. Overtures bearing the same title have been composed by Leidgebel, Balakireff and Berlioz. The one by the great Frenchman—alas! it is too seldom heard—is full of the grief and the agony and the raging storm of Shakspeare's tragedy. In comparison with it this overture by Litolff is a poor thing, conventional and dull. And what, pray, has it to do with Lear or Cordelia? To be sure it is not without an incongruous and tinsel pomp, not, perhaps, out of place in an overture written for some special occasion—for the opening of a German exposition of industries or for the dedication of a city market.

Three numbers by American composers were bunched together, and, as the overture, they were played for the first time in Boston. The name of Reginald De Koven has been hitherto associated with comic operas and songs. He is now the musical editor of the New York World. He has given the orchestral piece played yesterday the title "Danse and March of the Gnomes." The gnome is a familiar figure in the musical menagerie, and his habits are well known. He delights in the triangle, the cymbals and the bass drum, and he prefers, as a rule, the minor mode to the major. Mr. De Koven's gnomes have, however, learned one new trick. When they dance they whistle the tunes of Grieg. Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a melodious salon piece for orchestra, and Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an echo of music that has been written before his day, descriptive, or supposed to be descriptive of the carnival. The instrumentation is clever—and that is all.

Miss Aus der Ohe was heard in Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. This concerto gains with each hearing. It is full of fine fantasy, noble frenzy, haunting melody, and skillful workmanship. Above all, it has a strange, pungent, savage perfume. It makes severe demands upon the temperament and the mechanism of the pianist. Now, Miss Aus der Ohe is a most interesting temperamental study. She glides across the stage, cool, virginal, the Diana of the pianoforte: but the moment she touches the keys she undergoes a transformation; and while she does not lose her self-control and while she watches the flight of her musical arrows, little by little she becomes intensely human. Seldom is such virility seen in a woman's playing; and, yesterday, her feminine instinct of refinement kept her from abusing her strength. So that while her performance was bold and broad, strong and manly, it was also impassioned; and when occasion required, she showed daintiness, elegance, and a sentiment that was never mawkish. Although she played with abandon, the ability to curb her passion accompanied the display of her temperament. She was most heartily applauded.

Miss Maud Powell played Saint-Saens's Rondo Capriccioso. She has long been distinguished for the breadth and richness of her tone, the sureness of her mechanism, and the sincerity of her art. To-day she plays with greater elasticity and with more marked confidence in the expression of her convictions. It is a pleasure to watch the steady growth of this admirable violinist; it is also a pleasure to foresee that she has not yet reached the limits of her capacity. She, too, was most warmly applauded. In spite of many recalls she modestly and sensibly contented herself with bowing in response to the demands of the audience.

The final number of the programme was the brilliant and exhilarating ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." It was given with great spirit and with a full appreciation of its rhythms and its colors.

Philip Hale.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 7, 1892.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

First of the Series Given at Music Hall Yesterday.

Despite the inclemency of the weather the first concert in the series of "Young People's Populars," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, attracted a very large audience to Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch had arranged a programme in which several novelties were introduced for the first time in this city, and in addition to the orchestral numbers Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell appeared as soloists.

The opening number by the orchestra was Littolff's overture, "King Lear." The piece was ambitious in design, but lacked harmonious development, and there was but little variety in the instrumentation, in which the brasses played a very prominent part. "Pagina d'Amore," by F. van der Stucken, was in many places reminiscent of Wagner, and appeared to be more of an imitation than an inspiration.

Of Mr. Reginald de Koven's "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" it is gratifying to speak in praise. The dainty, tripping measures of the dance, the odd conceits in orchestration, and the humorous blending of instruments were delightfully suggestive of the revels of the elves, and the composition was greeted with generous applause. "A Carnival Scene," by Mr. Arthur Bird, was also well received. The composer is happy in ingenious scoring, and the separate themes depicting the bustle and jollity of the merrymasqueraders were clearly worked out and quaintly contrasted. These numbers were performed for the first time here.

Miss Aus der Ohe played the long and difficult concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23, by Tschaikowsky. The piece bristles with difficulties, but Miss Der Ohe played with perfect freedom and ease, and charmed the audience with a beautiful performance. Her octave playing seemed almost perfection, and her rendition of the peculiar characteristics of the Russian composer was thoroughly enjoyable.

The charming violinist, Miss Maud Powell, gave a rondo for violin by Saint-Saens in an exquisite manner. She was recalled several times, but no encores were given. The entertaining concert ended with an admirable performance by the orchestra of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid."

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

WORCESTER THEATRE,

WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, January 12,
AT EIGHT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVE

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING JAN. 7,

The Young People's Popular Concert.

It was a programme full of interest, and containing many novelties, that was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon by our symphony orchestra, and our conductor proved himself in sympathy with native work by placing three American compositions on the list. A fair-sized audience was in attendance, and the encore-fiend attempted to force the soloists into repetitions, but was defeated.

The "King Lear" overture by Litolff was a highly-spiced dish which began the banquet. It was military even to the bass-drum point, and the basses roared as if they had taken the line from the tragedy:—

> "Blow winds and crack your cheeks."

to themselves. Only one tender clarinette phrase seemed to suggest the existence of a Cordelia; the rest was dissonant, sombre, and above all, spasmodic. It was played with amazing force, throughout. Now followed more legitimate power, in Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, played by Miss Aus der Ohe. This lady is the most leonine of female pianists, and the work suited her broad and fiery vein. She held her own against the thunderings of the orchestra, and her octave work and heavy chords were very effective, but the light passagen-playing was not so perfect. The orchestra hurried the soloist once or twice in the andante, and the horn players gave a few specimens of disagreeable tone-color. The cadenza of the first movement was rather an incoherent bit of composition, but the entire work was full of those touches of folk-music with which not only Tsckaikowsky, but Rubenstein, Grieg, Suendsen, Dvorak and Liszt have made their works characteristic. We owe many an original flavor, in modern music to the great northern repertoire of folk song and dance, and in this concerto all the themes seemed to speak of Russian influence, and all, except one in the andante, were beautiful; the exception was rather a tawdry subject in rapid waltz rhythm.

The other soloist was the young violinist—Miss Maud Powell—who performed a capricious work with great dash and purity of intonation, but with an occasional lack of force in passages on the G string. She received numerous recalls, but wisely forbore to inaugurate the encore system. The excellent Western composer, Reginald de Koven, was represented on the programme by a "Danse et marche des Gnomes." The piece was sprightly and attractive, and although a trifle "Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by no means plagiarized, or even conventional. The Gnomes skipped in fourths chiefly, the Glockenspiel added its sweetness, and sforzando effects were plentiful. Mr. Van der Hucken's "Pagina d'Amore" was ecstatic enough, but not as fine as some of the compositions that he has given us. Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was full of the modern sensational devices, all the way from piccolo shrieks to the baleful tones of muted horns, but such a musical Saturnalia is not very difficult to achieve since Berlioz led the way into tonal diablerie. There was some effective work in the deepest register of the bassoon, and an impressive march theme appeared, but as a whole the composition was not novel.

Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," with many odd touches of flat sevenths and new scale forms, ended a concert that was popular enough and yet of sustained interest to the musicians present.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

AY, JANUARY 7, 189

Music Hall: Young People's Popular.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Young People's Popular in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being:

Litolff: Overture to "King Lear."
Tschaikowsky: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.
De Koven: Danse et Marche des Gnomes.
Van der Stucken: Pagina d'Amore.
Bird: A Carnival Scene.
Saint-Saëns: Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.
Massenet: Ballet Music from "Le Cid."

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell the violinist.

It is perhaps not necessary for a name to mean very much, but one likes it to mean at least something. If yesterday's concert was a "Young People's Popular," one wonders what sort of a programme Mr. Nikisch would draw up for an "Old People's Popular!" One looks in vain for anything especially juvenile in the list of music; there was little, if anything, especially adapted to the entertainment of youth, and certainly nothing of educational value. Almost everything seemed calculated, on the contrary, to appeal to a rather jaded musical palate. It was like setting the supper table at a juvenile party with curried lobster, pâté de foie gras, and flagons of old Bourbon or "nice, cooling gin."

Apart from this, however, the concert was interesting enough. Litolff's "King Lear" overture, albeit sometimes verging upon the mock-terrible, is a notable advance upon his more familiar "Robespierre." The three American pieces were interesting to hear, Mr. De Koven's dance and march standing easily first for musical value. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" seems rather flimsy, and Arthur Bird falls in with the prevalent notion today that painting the orchestra red is the true way of writing a carnival scene. The "Cid" ballet music is brilliant as may be.

It was a great pleasure to hear Miss aus der Ohe play the great Tschaikowsky concerto. The work itself holds its own admirably; very few modern concertos can compare with it in fertility of invention, firmness of musical purpose, and stout construction. There is some rather unkempt savagery in it, even some triviality now and then; but Tschaikowsky shows in it that he has so much to say, and says it with such force and distinctness, that the work cannot but be called admirable. Miss aus der Ohe played it superbly from beginning to end; she was in evident sympathy with the composition, and showed herself at her very best. It was grand playing.

Miss Powell played the bright and graceful Saint-Saëns rondo in admirable style; with winning animation, musicianly feeling, and in every way adequate technique.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1892.

"Young People's Popular."

The audience at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, was as large as could be expected when the state of the weather is taken into consideration. The programme of this first concert of a series that was a success last season was light and bright—a feature that will be carried out through the entire course.

There were seven numbers: Littolff's overture, "King Lear"; Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23, Tschaikowsky; Reginald de Koven's "Danse et Marche des Gnomes"; Pagina D'Amore, F. Van der Stucken; "A Carnival Scene," Arthur Bird; Saint-Saens's rondo capriccioso for violin, and Massenet's ballet music, "Le Cid." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mlle. Adele Aus Der Ohe and Miss Maude Powell composed the talent.

All the orchestral numbers except the ballet music were novelties. The "King Lear" overture opens quietly, but works up to a brilliant climax, with the assistance of more brass than is usually heard in this orchestra. The "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" contains a charming little solo for the wood wind instruments. The change from the waltz tempo to that of the march and back again to the original time is delightful. The "Pagina D'Amore" is wholly different in character, is legato throughout, full of rich effects and surprising changes. "A Carnival Scene" is a succession of bright pictures and was rendered with all the spirit and effect which Mr. Nikisch knows how to obtain from the orchestra. The ballet music is familiar to most musicians and was a fitting close to a well-chosen programme.

The soloists are favorites in Boston, and were warmly welcomed by the audience. Mlle. Aus Der Ohe fully sustained the reputation she had won as a pianist of first rank. Her playing was brilliant, her touch firm and true and her technique fine.

Miss Powell is one of the few women who have thoroughly mastered the violin. Her touch is strong and her tones clear and pure. Her selection was not calculated to show off her powers to any great extent, but it was rendered artistically.

This afternoon at 2 o'clock the Mapleson grand concert, with a programme consisting of gems of oratorio and song, will be given in Music Hall. The programme will be long—twenty-six numbers—and the array of talent will be unusually large. Mr. Carl Zerrahn will conduct, and the success of the concert is assured.

VIVIAN.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

NEW BEDFORD,
Thursday Evening, January 7,
AT EIGHT.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

WORCESTER THEATRE.

WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, January 12,
AT EIGHT.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

NEW BEDFORD,
Thursday Evening, January 7,
AT EIGHT.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING JAN. 7, 1892.

The Young People's Popular Concert.

It was a programme full of interest, and containing many novelties, that was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon by our symphony orchestra, and our conductor proved himself in sympathy with native work by placing three American compositions on the list. A fair-sized audience was in attendance, and the encore-fiend attempted to force the soloists into repetitions, but was defeated.

The "King Lear" overture by Litolff was a highly-spiced dish which began the banquet. It was military even to the bass-drum point, and the basses roared as if they had taken the line from the tragedy:—

"Blow winds and crack your cheeks."

to themselves. Only one tender clarinette phrase seemed to suggest the existence of a Cordelia; the rest was dissonant, sombre, and above all, spasmodic. It was played with amazing force, throughout. Now followed more legitimate power, in Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, played by Miss Aus der Ohe. This lady is the most leonine of female pianists, and the work suited her broad and fiery vein. She held her own against the thunderings of the orchestra, and her octave work and heavy chords were very effective, but the light passagen-playing was not so perfect. The orchestra hurried the soloist once or twice in the andante, and the horn players gave a few specimens of disagreeable tone-color. The cadenza of the first movement was rather an incoherent bit of composition, but the entire work was full of those touches of folk-music with which not only Tsckaikowsky, but Rubenstein, Grieg, Suendsen, Dvorak and Liszt have made their works characteristic. We owe many an original flavor, in modern music to the great northern repertoire of folk song and dance, and in this concerto all the themes seemed to speak of Russian influence, and all, except one in the andante, were beautiful; the exception was rather a tawdry subject in rapid waltz rhythm.

The other soloist was the young violinist—Miss Maud Powell—who performed a capricious work with great dash and purity of intonation, but with an occasional lack of force in passages on the G string. She received numerous recalls, but wisely forbore to inaugurate the encore system. The excellent Western composer, Reginald de Koven, was represented on the programme by a "Danse et marche des Gnomes." The piece was sprightly and attractive, and although a trifle "Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by no means plagiarized, or even conventional. The Gnomes skipped in fourths chiefly, the Glockenspiel added its sweetness, and sforzando effects were plentiful. Mr. Van der Hucken's "Pagina d'Amore" was ecstatic enough, but not as fine as some of the compositions that he has given us. Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was full of the modern sensational devices, all the way from piccolo shrieks to the baleful tones of muted horns, but such a musical Saturnalia is not very difficult to achieve since Berlioz led the way into tonal diablerie. There was some effective work in the deepest register of the bassoon, and an impressive march theme appeared, but as a whole the composition was not novel.

Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," with many odd touches of flat sevenths and new scale forms, ended a concert that was popular enough and yet of sustained interest to the musicians present.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1892.

Music Hall: Young People's Popular.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Young People's Popular in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being:

Litolff: Overture to "King Lear."
Tschaikowsky: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.
De Koven: Danse et Marche des Gnomes.
Van der Stucken: Pagina d'Amore.
Bird: A Carnival Scene.
Saint-Saëns: Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.
Massenet: Ballet Music from "Le Cid."

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell the violinist.

It is perhaps not necessary for a name to mean very much, but one likes it to mean at least something. If yesterday's concert was a "Young People's Popular," one wonders what sort of a programme Mr. Nikisch would draw up for an "Old People's Popular!" One looks in vain for anything especially juvenile in the list of music; there was little, if anything, especially adapted to the entertainment of youth, and certainly nothing of educational value. Almost everything seemed calculated, on the contrary, to appeal to a rather jaded musical palate. It was like setting the supper table at a juvenile party with curried lobster, pâté de foie gras, and flagons of old Bourbon or "nice, cooling gin."

Apart from this, however, the concert was interesting enough. Litolff's "King Lear" overture, albeit sometimes verging upon the mock-terrible, is a notable advance upon his more familiar "Robespierre." The three American pieces were interesting to hear, Mr. De Koven's dance and march standing easily first for musical value. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" seems rather flimsy, and Arthur Bird falls in with the prevalent notion today that painting the orchestra red is the true way of writing a carnival scene. The "Cid" ballet music is brilliant as may be.

It was a great pleasure to hear Miss aus der Ohe play the great Tschaikowsky concerto. The work itself holds its own admirably; very few modern concertos can compare with it in fertility of invention, firmness of musical purpose, and stout construction. There is some rather unkempt savagery in it, even some triviality now and then; but Tschaikowsky shows in it that he has so much to say, and says it with such force and distinctness, that the work cannot but be called admirable. Miss aus der Ohe played it superbly from beginning to end; she was in evident sympathy with the composition, and showed herself at her very best. It was grand playing.

Miss Powell played the bright and graceful Saint-Saëns rondo in admirable style; with winning animation, musicianly feeling, and in every way adequate technique.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1892.

"Young People's Popular."

The audience at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, was as large as could be expected when the state of the weather is taken into consideration. The programme of this first concert of a series that was a success last season was light and bright—a feature that will be carried out through the entire course.

There were seven numbers: Littolff's overture, "King Lear"; Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23, Tschaikowsky; Reginald de Koven's "Danse et Marche des Gnomes"; Pagina D'Amore, F. Van der Stucken; "A Carnival Scene," Arthur Bird; Saint-Saens's rondo capriccioso for violin, and Massenet's ballet music, "Le Cid." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mlle. Adele Aus Der Ohe and Miss Maude Powell composed the talent.

All the orchestral numbers except the ballet music were novelties. The "King Lear" overture opens quietly, but works up to a brilliant climax, with the assistance of more brass than is usually heard in this orchestra. The "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" contains a charming little solo for the wood wind instruments. The change from the waltz tempo to that of the march and back again to the original time is delightful. The "Pagina D'Amore" is wholly different in character, is legato throughout, full of rich effects and surprising changes. "A Carnival Scene" is a succession of bright pictures and was rendered with all the spirit and effect which Mr. Nikisch knows how to obtain from the orchestra. The ballet music is familiar to most musicians and was a fitting close to a well-chosen programme.

The soloists are favorites in Boston, and were warmly welcomed by the audience. Mlle. Aus Der Ohe fully sustained the reputation she had won as a pianist of first rank. Her playing was brilliant, her touch firm and true and her technique fine.

Miss Powell is one of the few women who have thoroughly mastered the violin. Her touch is strong and her tones clear and pure. Her selection was not calculated to show off her powers to any great extent, but it was rendered artistically.

This afternoon at 2 o'clock the Mapleson grand concert, with a programme consisting of gems of oratorio and song, will be given in Music Hall. The programme will be long—twenty-six numbers—and the array of talent will be unusually large. Mr. Carl Zerrahn will conduct, and the success of the concert is assured.

VIVIAN.

[90]

WORCESTER THEATRE,

WORCESTER,

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 12, AT 8.

Grand Operatic Concert,

Only appearance of the renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Accompanied by the following Artists:

MME. SOFIA SCALCHI,
The distinguished Contralto.
(By permission Messrs. Henry E. Abbey and Maurice Grau.)

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI,
The famous Tenor.

MR. Z. DÖME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.
(His first appearance in Worcester.)

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
The gifted and favorite Pianist.

Tickets with Reserved Seats, $1.50 and $1.00,

ACCORDING TO LOCATION.

Sale of seats and boxes opens at the box office, Saturday, January 9, at 9 A.M.

MADAME NORDICA.

The brilliant career of this great artist is too well known to require extended notice.

Successful alike on the operatic and concert stage, since her first appearance in England the demand for her services has been so constant on the other side of the Atlantic that she has been heard but little in her native land.

During her present tour, which closes on February 1, she has more than justified the expectations raised by her foreign successes. After her engagement at the Worcester Festival, she appeared in the principal cities with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was honored in being chosen as soloist for the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston. More recently she distinguished herself by assuming the difficult role of Valentine, in the "Huguenots," at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, supplying at a day's notice the place of Mme. Albani, and with such success that she was immediately engaged for further appearances. Mme. Nordica already ranks with the world's great artists, and this opportunity of hearing her cannot fail to be appreciated by every lover of music.

THURSDAY MO

The Young People's Popular Co

It was a programme full of in containing many novelties, that at Music Hall yesterday afterno symphony orchestra, and our proved himself in sympathy w
work by placing three American tions on the list. A fair-sized was in attendance, and the en attempted to force the soloists in tions, but was defeated.

The "King Lear" overture by a highly-spiced dish which began quet. It was military even to drum point, and the basses roared had taken the line from the trage

"Blow winds and crack your che to themselves. Only one tender phrase seemed to suggest the ex a Cordelia; the rest was dissonan and above all, spasmodic. It w with amazing force, throughout.
lowed more legitimate power, in owsky's first piano concerto,
Miss Aus der Ohe. This lady is leonine of female pianists, and suited her broad and fiery vein.
her own against the thunderin orchestra, and her octave work chords were very effective, light passagen-playing was perfect. The orchestra hur soloist once or twice in the an the horn players gave a few spe disagreeable tone-color. The c the first movement was rather rent bit of composition, but t work was full of those touche music with which not only Tsck but Rubenstein, Grieg, Suendse and Liszt have made their works istic. We owe many an origina modern music to the great north toire of folk song and dance, a concerto all the themes seemed t
Russian influence, and all, exc the andante, were beautiful; the was rather a tawdry subject in r rhythm.

The other soloist was the yo ist—Miss Maud Powell—who a capricious work with great purity of intonation, but with sional lack of force in passag
G string. She received numero but wisely forbore to inaugura core system. The excellent Wes poser, Reginald de Koven, was r on the programme by a "Danse des Gnomes." The piece was spr attractive, and although
"Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by plagiarized, or even conventio
Gnomes skipped in fourths c
Glockenspiel added its sweet sforzando effects were plentiful.
der Hucken's "Pagina d'Am ecstatic enough, but not as fine
the compositions that he has Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was modern sensational devices, all from piccolo shrieks to th tones of muted horns, but such Saturnalia is not very difficult since Berlioz led the way diablerie. There was some eff in the deepest register of the b an impressive march theme app
as a whole the composition was Massenet's ballet music from with many odd touches of flat se new scale forms, ended a conce popular enough and yet of sust est to the musicians present.

LOUIS C

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

NEW BEDFORD,

GRAND OPERA HOUSE

MADAME SCALCHI.

✠ ✠

The first appearance in Worcester of this famous singer is an event which calls for more than passing notice. As an Operatic Contralto, Mme. Scalchi is recognized as without a peer, and naturally her services are highly prized by the Impressarios of the leading Opera Houses of Europe wherever Italian Opera finds a home.

In America she is well known through her association with Mme. Patti, with whom she has fairly divided the honors on many a concert tour. During the recent season of Opera at the Auditorium in Chicago Mme. Scalchi is credited with winning first honors in a company of remarkable strength.

The Young People's Popular Co

It was a programme full of "in containing many novelties, that w
at Music Hall yesterday afterno symphony orchestra, and our c proved himself in sympathy w
work by placing three American tions on the list. A fair-sized was in attendance, and the en attempted to force the soloists int
tions, but was defeated.
The "King Lear" overture by L a highly-spiced dish which began quet. It was military even to drum point, and the basses roared had taken the line from the traged
"Blow winds and crack your chee to themselves. Only one tender phrase seemed to suggest the exi a Cordelia; the rest was dissonant and above all, spasmodic. It w with amazing force, throughout.
lowed more legitimate power, in owsky's first piano concerto,
Miss Aus der Ohe. This lady is leonine of female pianists, and suited her broad and fiery vein.
her own against the thunderin orchestra, and her octave work a chords were very effective, light passagen-playing was perfect. The orchestra hur soloist once or twice in the and the horn players gave a few spe disagreeable tone-color. The ca the first movement was rather a rent bit of composition, but t work was full of those touches music with which not only Tscka but Rubenstein, Grieg, Suendsen and Liszt have made their works
istic. We owe many an origina modern music to the great north toire of folk song and dance, a concerto all the themes seemed t
Russian influence, and all, exce
the andante, were beautiful; the was rather a tawdry subject in ra rhythm.
The other soloist was the you
ist—Miss Maud Powell—who a capricious work with great purity of intonation, but with sional lack of force in passag
G string. She received numerou but wisely forbore to inaugurat core system. The excellent West poser, Reginald de Koven, was re
on the programme by a "Danse des Gnomes." The piece was spr attractive, and although
"Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by plagiarized, or even convention
Gnomes skipped in fourths ch
Glockenspiel added its sweet sforzando effects were plentiful.
der Hucken's "Pagina d'Am ecstatic enough, but not as fine
the compositions that he has Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was f modern sensational devices, all
from piccolo shrieks to th
tones of muted horns, but such Saturnalia is not very difficult since Berlioz led the way i diablerie. There was some effe in the deepest register of the ba an impressive march theme app
as a whole the composition was Massenet's ballet music from with many odd touches of flat se new scale forms, ended a concer popular enough and yet of susta est to the musicians present.

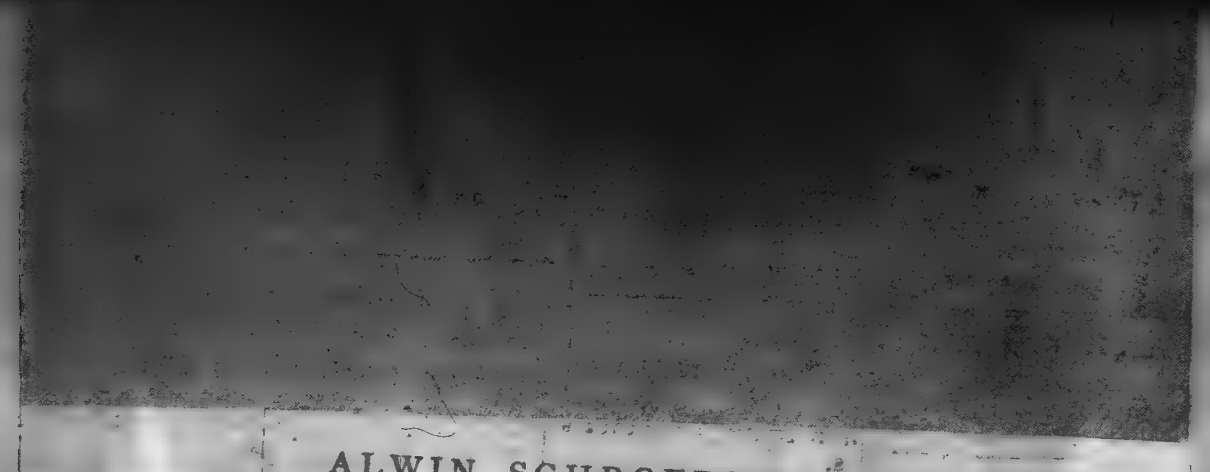
LOUIS C

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD,



ALWIN SCHROEDER.

...She, too, was most ... of many recalls ... tented herself ... demands of the audience.

The final number of the programme was the brilliant and exhilarating ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." It was given with great spirit and with a full appreciation of its rhythms and its colors.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1892.

Musical Matters.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening at Union Hall. The programme included a quartet in E flat, by Dittersdorf; the B flat quartet of Beethoven, Op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for strings, Op. 3. The last composition was the least interesting of the three, but at the same time an acceptable contribution. The so-called "great quartet" of Beethoven, intermittent with beauty and less acceptable writing, was finely rendered. Most interesting of all was the Ditter dorf number, with its fascinating and melodious measures, pure and frank in treatment from beginning to end. Would that our modern composers might return to this charming mode of chamber music. But, alas! it takes spontaneous genius to produce such. The intellect is secondary. It is unnecessary to say that the playing during the whole programme was faultless. What else could be the result of such refined taste and direction as Mr. Franz Kneizel presents.

The Young People's Popular Concert tomorrow afternoon will present a programme that must meet the desires of every one. Aus der Ohe will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, and Maud Powell, without question the first lady violinist of the country, will play the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint-Saens. Three American compositions will be given by the orchestra, and all for the first time.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 7, 1892.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

First of the Series Given at Music Hall Yesterday.

Despite the inclemency of the weather the first concert in the series of "Young People's Populars," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, attracted a very large audience to Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch had arranged a programme in which several novelties were introduced for the first time in this city, and in addition to the orchestral numbers Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell appeared as soloists.

The opening number by the orchestra was Littolff's overture, "King Lear." The piece was ambitious in design, but lacked harmonious development, and there was but little variety in the instrumentation, in which the brasses played a very prominent part. "Pagina d'Amore," by F. van der Stucken, was in many places reminiscent of Wagner, and appeared to be more of an imitation than an inspiration.

Of Mr. Reginald de Koven's "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" it is gratifying to speak in praise. The dainty, tripping measures of the dance, the odd conceits in orchestration, and the humorous blending of instruments were delightfully suggestive of the revels of the elves, and the composition was greeted with generous applause. "A Carnival Scene," by Mr. Arthur Bird, was also well received. The composer is happy in ingenious scoring, and the separate themes depicting the bustle and jollity of the merrymasqueraders were clearly worked out and quaintly contrasted. These numbers were performed for the first time here.

Miss Aus der Ohe played the long and difficult concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23, by Tschaikowsky. The piece bristles with difficulties, but Miss Der Ohe played with perfect freedom and ease, and charmed the audience with a beautiful performance. Her octave playing seemed almost perfection, and her rendition of the peculiar characteristics of the Russian composer was thoroughly enjoyable.

The charming violinist, Miss Maud Powell, gave a rondo for violin by Saint-Saens in an exquisite manner. She was recalled several times, but no encores were given. The entertaining concert ended with an admirable performance by the orchestra of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid."

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

NEW BEDFORD,

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 7, AT 8.

Only appearance of the renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Accompanied by the following Artists:

MR. Z. DÖME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Solo Violin and Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER,
Violoncello Virtuoso.

And the famous

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello
Mr. E. ROSE, Accompanist.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET, in E flat, ... Allegro — Andante — Minuetto — Finale. KNEISEL QUARTET.	Carl von Dittersdorf
ARIA. "Eri tu" (Masked Ball), ... Mr. DÖME.	Verdi
SOLI, for Violoncello. a. Sarabande, ... b. Tarentelle, ... Mr. SCHROEDER.	 Bach Cossman
ARIA. "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville), ... Mme. NORDICA.	Rossini
ANDANTE, from Quartet, in D major, . . KNEISEL QUARTET.	Tschaikowsky
SONG. "Les Filles de Cadiz," . . . . . . Mme. NORDICA.	Délibes
SOLO, for Violin. Rhapsodie Hongroise, . . . Mr. KNEISEL.	Hauser
SONG. "Star of the Evening" (Tannhaeuser) . . . Mr. DÖME.	Wagner
a. CAVATINA, from Quartet, B-flat, . . . b. MENUET, ... KNEISEL QUARTET.	Beethoven Boccherini
POLACCA. "Esmeralda," . . . . Mme. NORDICA.	A. Goring Thomas
PRESTO, from Quartet, D major, ... KNEISEL QUARTET.	Haydn

THE PIANO IS A STEINWAY, FROM THE WAREROOMS OF M. STEINERT & SONS, BOSTON.

[illegible] JANUARY 7, 1892.

The First "Young People's Popular" of the Season.

The first of the present season's "Young People's Populars" was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, and the programme for the day was full of attractive features, the soloists being Miss Adele Aus der Ohe pianist, and Miss Maud Powell violinist.

Mr. Nikisch had quite a field day with American composers on this occasion, bringing forward three compositions for a first hearing written by native or adopted citizens. These were the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; the "Pagina d'Amore," by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird, and all the compositions proved worthy the prominence given them. Mr. De Koven has done a clever bit of work in his tone picture of the revels of the gnomes, and, without departing in any radical fashion from the conventional in such writings, has made many odd effects in his scoring which please and fascinate in the hearing.

Mr. Van der Stucken's amorous themes are worked out with rare grace and skill in his contribution to yesterday's programme, and, as played by Mr. Nikisch, it left a distinct impression of the rare genius of the composer for such writing.

Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene" is a bright and jolly idealization of the sights and scenes at such festival times, and is, all in all, one of the best bits of tone painting in this line heard here from a home or foreign born composer.

The "King Lear" overture by Litolf had a first hearing also in this programme, and proved a composition eminently in keeping with the reputation of the composer, its dramatic strength reflecting the power and force of Litolf in this class of composition.

The ballet music of Massenet's "Le Cid" ended the list of orchestral numbers, and gave a brilliant ending to the day's programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe chose the first of Tschaikowsky's concertos as her selection for the day, and in its performance she gave new evidence of her remarkable skill and genius as a player. The opening movement was grandly played, and the lively andante had as graceful and bewitching an interpretation as the most captious critic could desire, while the final allegro was an exhibition of the player's technical skill which charmed all who listened. Miss Aus der Ohe was repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments of the applause following her efforts.

Miss Maud Powell won an equal success in the rondo capriccioso, for violin, by Saint Saens, in which she showed a masterly command of the instrument, and displayed the results of her devotion to her art since her last appearance here to fine advantage. She stands in the foremost rank of the women violinists of the day, and has honestly won the prominence she now enjoys. She was repeatedly recalled after the performance of her number.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the Young People's Popular concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon before an audience of fair size. In his make up of the program Mr. Nikisch had paid particular attention to the character of the concert and also to the representation of American composers, three of them—Reginald de Koven, F. Van der Stucken and Arthur Bird—appearing prominently. The first of these was represented by his "Danse et March des Gnomes," an odd composition, as its subject would intimate and one which calls to mind "Peer Gynt" without actually being reminiscent. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of work and received full justice at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a graceful, romantic composition, but hardly the equal of some of his previous work. Mr. Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an effort in tone painting which is made startlingly sensational, and some very effective work was done particularly in the lower register, and in the introduction of a march theme. The rest of the program was made up of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," and the "King Lear" overture by Litolff.

The soloists were Miss Aus der Ohe, who chose the first of Tschaikowsky's concertos, and Miss Maud Powell, who rendered the rondo capriccioso for violin by Saint-Saens. Miss Powell emphasized her right to a place in the first rank of women violinists of the day by her execution of this capricious subject and showed the results of her work even since her last appearance here. Miss Aus der Ohe in her broad, powerful treatment of her selection gave further evidence of her strength and virility as a pianist.

The third of the Kneisel concerts was given at Union Hall on Monday evening, and the program embraced Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncellos. For this latter the assisting musicians were Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft, O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The recent concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Chickering Hall, New York, have been attended by audiences that completely filled all seating and standing room. The local journals speak in a uniformly laudatory manner of the performance of Herr Nikisch's programs and of the efforts of his orchestra.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening at the Academy of Music. To the attractions of a thoroughly interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has selected from the [illegible] composers—Lalo, Wagner and Goldmark—will be added solo numbers by two [illegible] the admirable 'cellist of the orchestra, Mr. Schroeder, and Mrs. Nikisch. Besides songs with piano, which will give opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's exquisite accompaniment, Mrs. Nikisch will render [illegible] "Mignon" to the accompaniment [illegible] orchestra.

[91]

WORCESTER THEATRE.

ROCK & BROOKS, MANAGERS.

GRAND Operatic Concert

Under the direction of C. A. ELLIS,

TUESDAY EVENING, January 12, 1892, at 8.

Only appearance of the following distinguished Artists:

Mme. Lillian Nordica,

Mme. Sofia Scalchi,

(By permission of Mess. Henry E. Abbey and Maurice Grau.)

Sig. Italo Campanini,

Mr. Zoltan Dome,

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe.

Programme.

1.	BALLADE.	MISS AUS DER OHE.	Chopin
2.	ARIA. "Trumpeter of Sakkingen.	MR. DÖME.	Nessler
3.	AIR. "Ah rendinir," from the Opera "Mitrane." (A. D. 1686).	MME. SCALCHI.	Rissi
4.	ARIA. "Faust."	SIG. CAMPANINI.	Gounod
5.	ARIA. "Aida."	MME. NORDICA.	Verdi
6.	WALTZ CAPRICE.	MISS AUS DER OHE.	Taussig
7.	SONG. "Vorrei Morir."	SIG. CAMPANINI.	Tosti
8.	HABANERA. "Carmen."	MME. SCALCHI.	Bizet
9.	ARIA. "Tannhæuser."	MR. DÖME.	Wagner
10.	POLACCA. "Esmerelda."	MME. NORDICA.	A. Goring Thomas
11.	RHAPSODIE HONGROISE.	MISS AUS DER OHE.	Liszt
12.	QUARTET. "Rigoletto."	MME. NORDICA, MME. SCALCHI, SIG. CAMPANINI, MR. DÖME.	Verdi

TICKETS with reserved seats $1.50 and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-5

For the Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, the following attractive arrangement of numbers is announced: Overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; song, with orchestra, "Mignon," Liszt; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; soli for violincello, a, Adagio, Tartini; b, Moment Musicale, Schubert; c, Tarentelle; Cassmann; songs, with piano, a, Serenade, R. Strauss; b, Nussbaum, Schumann; c, "Des Liebesten Schwür," Brahms; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The soloists will be Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 9, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Goldmark's excited, clamorous and vehement overture, called by him "Prometheus," began the eleventh Symphony concert. In spite of its brilliancy, its forcefulness and the melodic beauty which gives relief at times to its tempestuous character, it is worth more as a suggestion or reminder than as an accomplishment or an illustration. The fiery revolt, the sense of injustice, the impotent wrath against the cruel curbing of creative genius and the pangs of physical torment are not to be definitely conveyed or portrayed by any combination of orchestral instruments or in the space of ten minutes. The agonies of Laocoön and his sons, the stricken pride of Niobe's children and the voiceless woe of the mother, the swelling strength of Antomedon constraining the steeds of Achilles, the madness of Leah and such grand climacteries of human passion may only be made truly known in words, in action, on the glowing canvas or in the enduring stone and bronze. Therein are definiteness and permanence; but in the music of a band all is vague, imaginative and provocative of a thousand different opinions. That Goldmark has made a sonorous and splendid concert-piece is true enough; but there is more Greek tragedy in a few bars of Paine's Œdipus music than in the whole of it. The postponed movement from the Mozart violin and viola concerto was next produced and tested and found good. It is strong in substance and graceful in form, the two solo instruments—perfectly played by Messrs. Lœffler and Kneisel—constantly responding to each other in the sweetest of tempers, repeating the same ideas in similar phrases and occasionally moving together in close harmony. An elaborate, but not dissonant or extravagant cadenza by Hellmesberger was included in the performance. The delicately beautiful entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music and Brahms's second symphony completed the programme. The orchestra played for the most part well, and always with animation and ardor. There was overmuch force in the brass music and the irrepressible kettle-drums, and more exactitude in some entrances would have been welcome; on the other hand there were quick attention to the colorings in the overture and nicety in the Schubert and the Brahms scherzo.

Tonight Schumann's "Manfred" music will be given, Mr. George Riddle, who has once before read the condensed poem of Byron, reassuming that duty. The Cecilia will supply the chorus and the short solo parts will be sung by Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent and Morawski. Schubert's unfinished symphony will precede.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' POPULARS.

Mr. Nikisch gave on Wednesday afternoon, at the first of this season's Young Folks' Popular concerts, a delightful programme in a delightful performance. Most of the numbers were new, three were of American authorship, and the soloists were good artists and general favorites. The American works were Mr. Reginald De Koven's "Dance and March of Gnomes," which shows his talent in a different light from "Robin Hood," but does not prove it capable as yet of treating such a subject with other than conventional colorings; Mr. Van der Stucken's "Page of Love," which has a good deal of Raff and Wagner in its flavor, and suggests a page which one would be glad upon the whole to turn over, because its swelling languors are too often qualified with strident dissonances and unharmonious oppositions; and then Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival," which is felicitous throughout, but especially so in its skilful returns to the gay and lightsome original theme after every irruption of the fantastic and diversified episodes which cross it, as if groups of maskers were passing below the balcony, where a group of happy people sat at ease. Miss Aus der Ohe played Tschaikowsky's piano concerto with force and brilliancy, considering with equal care and appositeness of style the sustained tranquillity of the andante and the scintillant phrases and boldly broken rhythms of the allegri. Miss Maud Powell gave the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns so ably and so sparklingly as to get seven recalls; but the plaudits extorted no encore. The pretty ballet music from Massenet's "Cid," Littolff's noisy and highly-colored, but not too significant, "King Lear" overture, presented for the first time, completed the programme which had called together a very large audience.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 7.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1892.

The First "Young People's Popular" of the Season.

The first of the present season's "Young People's Populars" was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, and the programme for the day was full of attractive features, the soloists being Miss Adele Aus der Ohe pianist, and Miss Maud Powell violinist.

Mr. Nikisch had quite a field day with American composers on this occasion, bringing forward three compositions for a first hearing written by native or adopted citizens. These were the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; the "Pagina d'Amore," by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird, and all the compositions proved worthy the prominence given them. Mr. De Koven has done a clever bit of work in his tone picture of the revels of the gnomes, and, without departing in any radical fashion from the conventional in such writings, has made many odd effects in his scoring which please and fascinate in the hearing.

Mr. Van der Stucken's amorous themes are worked out with rare grace and skill in his contribution to yesterday's programme, and, as played by Mr. Nikisch, it left a distinct impression of the rare genius of the composer for such writing.

Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene" is a bright and jolly idealization of the sights and scenes at such festival times, and is, all in all, one of the best bits of tone painting in this line heard here from a home or foreign born composer.

The "King Lear" overture by Litolf had a first hearing also in this programme, and proved a composition eminently in keeping with the reputation of the composer, its dramatic strength reflecting the power and force of Litolf in this class of composition.

The ballet music of Massenet's "Le Cid" ended the list of orchestral numbers, and gave a brilliant ending to the day's programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe chose the first of Tschaikowsky's concertos as her selection for the day, and in its performance she gave new evidence of her remarkable skill and genius as a player. The opening movement was grandly played, and the lively andante had as graceful and bewitching an interpretation as the most captious critic could desire, while the final allegro was an exhibition of the player's technical skill which charmed all who listened. Miss Aus der Ohe was repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments of the applause following her efforts.

Miss Maud Powell won an equal success in the rondo capriccioso, for violin, by Saint Saens, in which she showed a masterly command of the instrument, and displayed the results of her devotion to her art since her last appearance here to fine advantage. She stands in the foremost rank of the women violinists of the day, and has honestly won the prominence she now enjoys. She was repeatedly recalled after the performance of her number.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 9.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the Young People's Popular concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon before an audience of fair size. In his make up of the program Mr. Nikisch had paid particular attention to the character of the concert and also to the representation of American composers, three of them—Reginald de Koven, F. Van der Stucken and Arthur Bird—appearing prominently. The first of these was represented by his "Danse et March des Gnomes," an odd composition, as its subject would intimate and one which calls to mind "Peer Gynt" without actually being reminiscent. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of work and received full justice at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a graceful, romantic composition, but hardly the equal of some of his previous work. Mr. Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an effort in tone painting which is made startlingly sensational, and some very effective work was done particularly in the lower register, and in the introduction of a march theme. The rest of the program was made up of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," and the "King Lear" overture by Litolff.

The soloists were Miss Aus der Ohe, who chose the first of Tschaikowsky's concertos, and Miss Maud Powell, who rendered the rondo capriccioso for violin by Saint-Saens. Miss Powell emphasized her right to a place in the first rank of women violinists of the day by her execution of this capricious subject and showed the results of her work even since her last appearance here. Miss Aus der Ohe in her broad, powerful treatment of her selection gave further evidence of her strength and virility as a pianist.

The third of the Kneisel concerts was given at Union Hall on Monday evening, and the program embraced Carl von Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major; Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130, and Svendsen's octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncellos. For this latter the assisting musicians were Messrs. C. M. Loeffler, W. Krafft, O. Novacek and L. Schulz.

The recent concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Chickering Hall, New York, have been attended by audiences that completely filled all seating and standing room. The local journals speak in a uniformly laudatory manner of the performance of Herr Nikisch's programs and of the efforts of his orchestra.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Monday evening at the Academy of Music. To the attractions of a thoroughly interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has selected from the later composers—Lalo, Wagner and Goldmark—will be added solo numbers by two artists—the admirable 'cellist of the orchestra, Mr. Schroeder, and Mrs. Nikisch. Beside songs with piano, which will give opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's exquisite accompaniment, Mrs. Nikisch will render Liszt's "Mignon" to the accompaniment of the orchestra.

[91]

WORCESTER THEATRE.

ROCK & BROOKS, MANAGERS.

GRAND Operatic Concert

Under the direction of C. A. ELLIS,

TUESDAY EVENING, January 12, 1892, at 8.

Only appearance of the following distinguished Artists:

Mme. Lillian Nordica,

Mme. Sofia Scalchi,

(By permission of Mess. Henry E. Abbey and Maurice Grau.)

Sig. Italo Campanini,

Mr. Zoltan Dome,

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe.

Programme.

1. BALLADE. . . . . Chopin
   MISS AUS DER OHE.
2. ARIA. "Trumpeter of Sakkingen. . . . . . Nessler
   MR. DOME.
3. AIR. "Ah rendinir," from the Opera "Mitrane." (A. D. 1686). Rissi
   MME. SCALCHI.
4. ARIA. "Faust." . . . . Gounod
   SIG. CAMPANINI.
5. ARIA. "Aida." . . . . Verdi
   MME. NORDICA.
6. WALTZ CAPRICE. . . . . . . Taussig
   MISS AUS DER OHE.
7. SONG. "Vorrei Morir." . . . . . . Tosti
   SIG. CAMPANINI.
8. HABANERA. "Carmen." . . . . . . Bizet
   MME. SCALCHI.
9. ARIA. "Tannhæuser." . . . . . . Wagner
   MR. DÖME.
10. POLACCA. "Esmerelda." . . . . A. Goring Thomas
    MME. NORDICA.
11. RHAPSODIE HONGROISE. . . . . . . Liszt
    MISS AUS DER OHE.
12. QUARTET. "Rigoletto." . . . . . Verdi
    MME. NORDICA, MME. SCALCHI, SIG. CAMPANINI, MR. DÖME.

TICKETS with reserved seats $1.50 and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-5

For the Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, the following attractive arrangement of numbers is announced: Overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; song, with orchestra, "Mignon," Liszt; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; soli for violincello, a, Adagio, Tartini; b, Moment Musicale, Schubert; c, Tarentelle; Cassmann; songs, with piano, a, Serenade, R. Strauss; b, Nussbaum, Schumann; c, "Des Liebesten Schwür," Brahms; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The soloists will be Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 9, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Goldmark's excited, clamorous and vehement overture, called by him "Prometheus," began the eleventh Symphony concert. In spite of its brilliancy, its forcefulness and the melodic beauty which gives relief at times to its tempestuous character, it is worth more as a suggestion or reminder than as an accomplishment or an illustration. The fiery revolt, the sense of injustice, the impotent wrath against the cruel curbing of creative genius and the pangs of physical torment are not to be definitely conveyed or portrayed by any combination of orchestral instruments or in the space of ten minutes. The agonies of Laocoön and his sons, the stricken pride of Niobe's children and the voiceless woe of the mother, the swelling strength of Antomedon constraining the steeds of Achilles, the madness of Leah and such grand climacteries of human passion may only be made truly known in words, in action, on the glowing canvas or in the enduring stone and bronze. Therein are definiteness and permanence; but in the music of a band all is vague, imaginative and provocative of a thousand different opinions. That Goldmark has made a sonorous and splendid concert-piece is true enough; but there is more Greek tragedy in a few bars of Paine's Œdipus music than in the whole of it. The postponed movement from the Mozart violin and viola concerto was next produced and tested and found good. It is strong in substance and graceful in form, the two solo instruments—perfectly played by Messrs. Lœffler and Kneisel—constantly responding to each other in the sweetest of tempers, repeating the same ideas in similar phrases and occasionally moving together in close harmony. An elaborate, but not dissonant or extravagant cadenza by Hellmesberger was included in the performance. The delicately beautiful entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music and Brahms's second symphony completed the programme. The orchestra played for the most part well, and always with animation and ardor. There was overmuch force in the brass music and the irrepressible kettle-drums, and more exactitude in some entrances would have been welcome; on the other hand there were quick attention to the colorings in the overture and nicety in the Schubert and the Brahms scherzo.

Tonight Schumann's "Manfred" music will be given, Mr. George Riddle, who has once before read the condensed poem of Byron, reassuming that duty. The Cecilia will supply the chorus and the short solo parts will be sung by Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent and Morawski. Schubert's unfinished symphony will precede.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' POPULARS.

Mr. Nikisch gave on Wednesday afternoon, at the first of this season's Young Folks' Popular concerts, a delightful programme in a delightful performance. Most of the numbers were new, three were of American authorship, and the soloists were good artists and general favorites. The American works were Mr. Reginald De Koven's "Dance and March of Gnomes," which shows his talent in a different light from "Robin Hood," but does not prove it capable as yet of treating such a subject with other than conventional colorings; Mr. Van der Stucken's "Page of Love," which has a good deal of Raff and Wagner in its flavor, and suggests a page which one would be glad upon the whole to turn over, because its swelling languors are too often qualified with strident dissonances and unharmonious oppositions; and then Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival," which is felicitous throughout, but especially so in its skilful returns to the gay and lightsome original theme after every irruption of the fantastic and diversified episodes which cross it, as if groups of maskers were passing below the balcony, where a group of happy people sat at ease. Miss Aus der Ohe played Tschaikowsky's piano concerto with force and brilliancy, considering with equal care and appositeness of style the sustained tranquillity of the andante and the scintillant phrases and boldly broken rhythms of the allegri. Miss Maud Powell gave the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns so ably and so sparklingly as to get seven recalls; but the plaudits extorted no encore. The pretty ballet music from Massenet's "Cid," Littolff's noisy and highly-colored, but not too significant, "King Lear" overture, presented for the first time, completed the programme which had called together a very large audience.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The thousands of faithful attendants at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts were treated to a change at the twelfth in its series such as has not been their good (or ill) fortune to experience since that somewhat depressing performance of "Fidelio," which marked the close of last season. This time Schumann's "Manfred" was presented; and to put the audience into the right mood for listening to that tale of woe, Schubert's unfinished symphony was brought into play.

"Manfred," as a concert piece is on the whole, ineffective and disappointing; and it is probable that, produced on the modern stage, with all the scenic illusions that the stage mechanics of the day are enabled to create, it would be hardly less so. The reasons are obvious. One is that Byron's dramatic poem furnishes no basis for acting; indeed its author is on record as having boasted that, while setting no great store by the work, he at least had written something that could not be acted. A feeling of contempt that he at that time nourished for the theatre was engendered by the sometime previous failure of a play of his at Drury Lane. Another and far more important reason is that Schumann's music is not dramatic. Manfred's mournful soliloquies might become endurable if they were relieved by descriptive music, rich in harmonic effects and graphic in scoring. But, as it stands, there are few measures that act as a stimulus to the imagination; and, as for the vocal numbers, they are ill-designed to display the noblest qualities of the voice, or to arouse the dramatic instincts of the singer. It is to be doubted then, if the most enticing or awe-inspiring scenic display would serve to materially increase general interest in the work. As a concert piece, "Manfred" would reach the acme of its effectiveness in a hall about half as large as Music Hall. In such a place the voice of the reader would not be lost in space, and the delicate outlines of the musical setting would be fully apparent.

Schumann's music, if it is not dramatic, is for the most part beautiful and thoroughly Schumannesque. This is true of the overture, which, however, is less effective than the "Genoveva" overture; and the tender beauty of the entr' acte never fails to appeal strongly to the heart of the sensitive listener. The descriptive music throughout is also worthy of Schumann, that accompanying the appearance of the Witch, and Manfred's address being especially charming. The vocal portion is much less satisfying; for besides being essentially undramatic, it is lyrically unimpressive.

The performance as a whole was excellent. Mr. George Riddle read the text with his well known finish and breadth of style, keeping pace with the music with an ease that was at once artistic and admirable. Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich and Meyn sang their short solos in an expressive manner, and Messrs. Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay gave a smooth performance of the Incantation scene. The chorus, made up from the Cecilia, was also effective in its several numbers, the Requiem being delicately as well as broadly delivered. Little, if any, fault can be found with the work of the orchestra; on the contrary, both in the Schumann music and the smyphony it was well up to the standard of this organization.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The accomplished members of the Kneisel Quartet are nothing if not generous. They never spare themselves in time or trouble, when the interests of art and their patrons are concerned; and their programmes, in length as well as in quality, prove the strength of their determination to give the friendly attendants of their concerts the full worth of their money. There is never any question as to the quality of these programmes, but there sometimes is as to their length. Two hours of solid quartet playing is a little too much, even for the cultured Bostonian; and when another quarter is added, as was the case last Monday evening, at the third concert in the series, a word of protest seems necessary. Really, Herr Franz, your kindness of heart, as evinced in sandwiching a tid-bit in the shape of a Beethoven quartet (and an opus 130 at that) between a Dittersdorff quartet and a Lvendsen octet, is too great to be fully appreciated.

The Dittersdorff, given for the first time at these concerts, is delightful music. Notwithstanding its strong resemblance in style to Haydn's, it bears many marks of originality in the general cast of its themes, and its harmonic effects. It is Haydn, yet it is not Haydn. The dainty allegro, the odd minuet, the decidedly uncommon finale all possess a characteristic which we do not associate with Haydn's music. The quartet was played in an exquisitely finished manner, and was the most truly enjoyable number of the evening.

In the octet, written for four violins, two violins, and two celli, Messrs Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz assisted. The work is constructed on an elaborate plan, and is certainly interesting. Much of the music is brilliant and effective, and it also contains passages of a genuinely tender and passionate nature. But in spite of these touches of sincere feeling there is an air of artificiality about it, an apparent straining after effect, which detracts from its strength as a whole.

Of the four movements the allegro scherzando, with its alternate moods of gayety and seriousness, is the most spontaneous in character and attractive to the listener. The opening of the andante is expressive, and is richly harmonized; while the fanciful and brilliant finale is well designed to bring about an effective close. The playing was individually strong, and the ensemble was generally fine, though there were occasional instances of uncertainty in this latter respect.

Of the performance of the Beethoven quartet little can be said but words of praise. A large audience was present, and applause was frequent and hearty.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first Young People's popular concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon. A highly entertaining programme was presented. which, without doubt, would have been enjoyed by an audience limited in size only by the capacity of the hall, if the violent storm of the day had not intervened. There were five orchestral numbers, four of which were played for the first time in Boston. Litolff's overture to "King Lear" was evidently written at a time when its composer's mind was pretty thoroughly saturated with Berlioz, Wagner and the theatre. It is a brilliant and effective concert piece, and is interesting in that it displays an easy command of the modern orchestra, and a charming dexterity in making use of other people's ideas. But even with all these resources to draw upon, the composer succeeded only in producing a conventional and, in most respects, commonplace work, which characteristics, its gorgeous instrumentation fails to conceal.

In the middle of the programme three short pieces by American composers were grouped together: "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; "Pagina D'Amore," by F. van der Stucken; and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird. All of these young men are admittedly the possessors of talent in no slight degree.

Of the three, Arthur Bird ranks first; but although in his "Carnival Scene" is to be found great variety of orchestral treatment, it is not the equal of his fascinating "Scene Orientale," in thematic material or in completeness of musical expression. The Danse has points of attractiveness in its rhythmic and instrumental effects; and Mr. van der Stucken's sensuous and boldly orchestrated song is certainly an effective concert piece.

Two of the most popular soloists now before the public were also heard at this concert. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe gave a generally strong, musician-like performance of Tschaikowsky's first concerto in B flat minor. She was not at her best in the first movement, her technical work being somewhat labored and unfinished. The andante, too, although played with much taste, suffered from a too great delicacy of touch, the player's pianissimo frequently being scarcely heard at all. Her handling of the finale, however, was characterized by buoyancy, fire and rhythmical clearness, and at its close she was enthusiastically and deservedly recalled. Miss Aus der Ohe is a pianist of brains as well as of keen sensibilities. She has made marked gains in delicacy of touch since last season, when it was to be feared that she was fast eradicating the womanly qualities of her playing, in her apparent ambition to play "like a man."

Miss Maud Powell, like Miss Aus der Ohe, not only evinces fine technical skill, but the nature of a musician in all that she does. Her performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso" was exceedingly artistic and brilliant. For some reason her tone was not as pure as is usually the case, it being somewhat veiled in quality. Perhaps it was due to the damp atmosphere. She, too, was recalled until there appeared to be no longer a hope that she would grant an encore. The closing number was the gorgeous ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." The work of the orchestra was full of verve, and Mr. Nikisch's strongly dramatic instincts imparted an effect to every number that was little short of dazzling. The broad, fresco-like style of his tone-painting, however, was a little too pronounced even for Music Hall, a very considerable amount of coarseness of execution being apparent throughout.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1892.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

Schumann's Music to Byron's "Manfred" Finely Played.

Last evening's symphony concert, the twelfth of the series, was attended by a notably large audience who greatly enjoyed the best performance of Byron's "Manfred" that has ever been given here. The weirdly beautiful and appropriate music which Schumann has given Byron's exquisite poem received intelligent, expressive and sympathetic interpretation. Seldom has Mr. Nikisch's band been more satisfying. The overture was magnificently played, and particularly good was the orchestra's effect throughout the "third act."

Excellent support was contributed by a large and splendidly trained chorus from the Cecilia Society and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay.

Mr. George Riddle received cordial commendation for his intelligent reading of the text.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, that noble fragment of the great tone-maker's work, was played as the other offering of the evening and proved a genuine treat. Its performance is always welcome, and yesterday's presentation was more than commonly pleasing.

There will be no symphony concert next Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at the Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

—The Boston Symphony orchestra starts on its travels tonight, and plays tomorrow in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music. Mr. Comee accompanies them.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts.)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones' This overture, "Promethus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon the band with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture. "King Lear"..................Littolff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23.... ....Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat. Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.
Miss Aus Der Ohe.
a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes"........ ....Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore..........F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene..................Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.......Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet Music. "Le Cid"................Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Littolff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" by Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "Pagina d'Amore" and most exquisitely played on Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's band.

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightfully jolly picture of the sights and sounds of carnival time, and made even more enjoyable by the fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was finely rendered, as was also the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," and the fascinating ballet music from "Le Cid" by Massenet which ended the programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell were highly appreciated, the former winning great applause in the "Concerto" by Tschaikowsky, the latter equally welcome in the "Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saens. Both artists were repeatedly recalled to bow their acknowledgments.

These popular concerts in every way deserve the appreciation they are receiving and cannot come too often.

[illegible]

BOSTON, JAN[illegible]

Schumann's "Manfred" Music at the Symphony Concert.

It is doubtless owing to the measure of indefiniteness inseparable from musical expression that composers of "the immortals" class have ever been so fond of intensifying with their works those efforts of literary genius that attempt to deal with the expression of the restless longings of the human soul through the medium of supernaturalism. It hardly seems accidental that two such natures as Byron and Schumann should have existed at the same epoch, and that the composer should have chosen the poet's "Manfred" for musical illustration.

By their union a work has been produced, composite in its make-up, and yet beautiful in its unity of effect; a work in which the tenderest and most recondite emotions of spirituality are so ethereally conveyed, that although it is classified as "dramatic," the relegation of all theatric aid to the imagination (that is, of course, the properly receptive imagination) only adds to its impressiveness and impalpable beauty. Beauty of a romantic cast, it is true, and so far removed from the clearness of outline dear to the classic muse, that the pen shrinks from attempting to imprison any adequate realization of it within the hard-set confines of words. A memory of the delights of Schumann's musical setting of "Manfred," which has twice before been produced in Boston—in 1884 and 1886—doubtless contributed largely to draw the immense audiences that assembled for the 12th concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, as well as the preceding rehearsal Friday afternoon, at both of which occasions the "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature.

In its production were enlisted Mr. George Riddle, reader; vocal soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large contingent of the members of the Cecilia. It would hardly be possible for the superb training of the Symphony orchestra and the sympathetic, sensitive nature of Mr. Nikisch to manifest themselves to greater advantage than was done in their performance of the symphonic and melodramatic setting of this lyric in dramatic form. The overture and the entr' actes were played with a soulful perfection that mated well with the exquisite care and delicacy bestowed upon the passages designed to accentuate the reading of the poet's lines. Of the latter task Mr. Riddle acquitted himself most admirably, and his own intelligent conception and discriminating touch, seconded by a crystalline clearness of enunciation, carried along without apparent effort, were a delight to the hearer and an aid to his appreciation. If it is well to cull any particular example from so much generel excellence, the palm must be given to the exquisite pathos with which Mr. Riddle spoke Manfred's despairing invocation to the phantom of Astarte, beginning with

> ——Speak to me!
> For I have called on thee in the still night, and the not less exquisite beauty of the melodrama, executed by the orchestra in a manner that heightened the sad intensity of the lines to the point of setting the eyes a-brimming. Marvellously fine, too, in both these respects, was Manfred's haughty allocution to the demon spirits, just before his death:

> I do defy ye—though I feel my soul
> Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye.

The vocal soloists contributed their share of the performance very competently, and the chorus manifested gratifying power and precision; it sang the requiem at the close of the poem with noble unity, typical of the exalted calm of a high once troubled spirit, that has at last found its rest.

Should it be held that a monotony of praise pervades this comment upon the "Manfred" performance of last evening—a performance that must remain notable even in the annals of Boston symphony productions—it will, perhaps, be granted also that in this cynical age it is at times harder to utter the truth when it is complimentary than when it is otherwise. It is a pity—let it be said in passing—that this consideration is not oftener present in the minds of those who for the petty satisfaction of saying something ostensibly "smart," treat flippantly the outcome of protracted and conscientious effort.

The performance of that lovely fragment —Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor (No. 8)—with which last night's concert was begun, was in full accord with the melancholy charm that this tone-poem exhales; delicacy, sympathy and comprehension marked the execution of every passage. In one sense, the regret that this work was never completed is tempered by its bewitching charm as it is. And ambitious musicians had better let it alone. No sculptor has ever lived to conceive limbs the addition of which would not detract from the beauty of the armless marble goddess of the Grecian isle.

Mme. Nordica's grand operatic concert at Music Hall on the evening of Thursday, the 28th inst., will make a most interesting event. Mme. Nordica appears for the last time this season in this country, and she will be heard in some of the most brilliant numbers of her operatic repertoire. Mme. Scalchi, Sig. Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome and an orchestra of 50 musicians will assist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The thousands of faithful attendants at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts were treated to a change at the twelfth in its series such as has not been their good (or ill) fortune to experience since that somewhat depressing performance of "Fidelio," which marked the close of last season. This time Schumann's "Manfred" was presented; and to put the audience into the right mood for listening to that tale of woe, Schubert's unfinished symphony was brought into play.

"Manfred," as a concert piece is on the whole, ineffective and disappointing; and it is probable that, produced on the modern stage, with all the scenic illusions that the stage mechanics of the day are enabled to create, it would be hardly less so. The reasons are obvious. One is that Byron's dramatic poem furnishes no basis for acting; indeed its author is on record as having boasted that, while setting no great store by the work, he at least had written something that could not be acted. A feeling of contempt that he at that time nourished for the theatre was engendered by the sometime previous failure of a play of his at Drury Lane. Another and far more important reason is that Schumann's music is not dramatic. Manfred's mournful soliloquies might become endurable if they were relieved by descriptive music, rich in harmonic effects and graphic in scoring. But, as it stands, there are few measures that act as a stimulus to the imagination; and,as for the vocal numbers, they are ill-designed to display the noblest qualities of the voice, or to arouse the dramatic instincts of the singer. It is to be doubted then, if the most enticing or awe-inspiring scenic display would serve to materially increase general interest in the work. As a concert piece, "Manfred" would reach the acme of its effectiveness in a hall about half as large as Music Hall. In such a place the voice of the reader would not be lost in space, and the delicate outlines of the musical setting would be fully apparent.

Schumann's music, if it is not dramatic, is for the most part beautiful and thoroughly Schumannesque. This is true of the overture, which, however, is less effective than the "Genoveva" overture; and the tender beauty of the entr' acte never fails to appeal strongly to the heart of the sensitive listener. The descriptive music throughout is also worthy of Schumann, that accompanying the appearance of the Witch, and Manfred's address being especially charming. The vocal portion is much less satisfying; for besides being essentially undramatic, it is lyrically unimpressive.

The performance as a whole was excellent. Mr. George Riddle read the text with his well known finish and breadth of style, keeping pace with the music with an ease that was at once artistic and admirable. Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich and Meyn sang their short solos in an expressive manner, and Messrs. Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay gave a smooth performance of the Incantation scene. The chorus, made up from the Cecilia, was also effective in its several numbers, the Requiem being delicately as well as broadly delivered. Little, if any, fault can be found with the work of the orchestra; on the contrary, both in the Schumann music and the smyphony it was well up to the standard of this organization.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The accomplished members of the Kneisel Quartet are nothing if not generous. They never spare themselves in time or trouble, when the interests of art and their patrons are concerned; and their programmes, in length as well as in quality, prove the strength of their determination to give the friendly attendants of their concerts the full worth of their money. There is never any question as to the quality of these programmes, but there sometimes is as to their length. Two hours of solid quartet playing is a little too much, even for the cultured Bostonian; and when another quarter is added, as was the case last Monday evening, at the third concert in the series, a word of protest seems necessary. Really, Herr Franz, your kindness of heart, as evinced in sandwiching a tid-bit in the shape of a Beethoven quartet (and an opus 130 at that) between a Dittersdorff quartet and a Lvendsen octet, is too great to be fully appreciated.

The Dittersdorff, given for the first time at these concerts, is delightful music. Notwithstanding its strong resemblance in style to Haydn's, it bears many marks of originality in the general cast of its themes, and its harmonic effects. It is Haydn, yet it is not Haydn. The dainty allegro, the odd minuet, the decidedly uncommon finale all possess a characteristic which we do not associate with Haydn's music. The quartet was played in an exquisitely finished manner, and was the most truly enjoyable number of the evening.

In the octet, written for four violins, two violins, and two celli, Messrs Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz assisted. The work is constructed on an elaborate plan, and is certainly interesting. Much of the music is brilliant and effective, and it also contains passages of a genuinely tender and passionate nature. But in spite of these touches of sincere feeling there is an air of artificiality about it, an apparent straining after effect, which detracts from its strength as a whole.

Of the four movements the allegro scherzando, with its alternate moods of gayety and seriousness, is the most spontaneous in character and attractive to the listener. The opening of the andante is expressive, and is richly harmonized; while the fanciful and brilliant finale is well designed to bring about an effective close. The playing was individually strong, and the ensemble was generally fine, though there were occasional instances of uncertainty in this latter respect.

Of the performance of the Beethoven quartet little can be said but words of praise. A large audience was present, and applause was frequent and hearty.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first Young People's popular concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon. A highly entertaining programme was presented. which, without doubt, would have been enjoyed by an audience limited in size only by the capacity of the hall, if the violent storm of the day had not intervened. There were five orchestral numbers, four of which were played for the first time in Boston. Litolff's overture to "King Lear" was evidently written at a time when its composer's mind was pretty thoroughly saturated with Berlioz, Wagner and the theatre. It is a brilliant and effective concert piece, and is interesting in that it displays an easy command of the modern orchestra, and a charming dexterity in making use of other people's ideas. But even with all these resources to draw upon, the composer succeeded only in producing a conventional and, in most respects, commonplace work, which characteristics, its gorgeous instrumentation fails to conceal.

In the middle of the programme three short pieces by American composers were grouped together: "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; "Pagina D'Amore," by F. van der Stucken; and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird. All of these young men are admittedly the possessors of talent in no slight degree.

Of the three, Arthur Bird ranks first; but although in his "Carnival Scene" is to be found great variety of orchestral treatment, it is not the equal of his fascinating "Scene Orientale," in thematic material or in completeness of musical expression. The Danse has points of attractiveness in its rhythmic and instrumental effects; and Mr. van der Stucken's sensuous and boldly orchestrated song is certainly an effective concert piece.

Two of the most popular soloists now before the public were also heard at this concert. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe gave a generally strong, musician-like performance of Tschaikowsky's first concerto in B flat minor. She was not at her best in the first movement, her technical work being somewhat labored and unfinished. The andante, too, although played with much taste, suffered from a too great delicacy of touch, the player's pianissimo frequently being scarcely heard at all. Her handling of the finale, however, was characterized by buoyancy, fire and rhythmical clearness, and at its close she was enthusiastically and deservedly recalled. Miss Aus der Ohe is a pianist of brains as well as of keen sensibilities. She has made marked gains in delicacy of touch since last season, when it was to be feared that she was fast eradicating the womanly qualities of her playing, in her apparent ambition to play "like a man."

Miss Maud Powell, like Miss Aus der Ohe, not only evinces fine technical skill, but the nature of a musician in all that she does. Her performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso" was exceedingly artistic and brilliant. For some reason her tone was not as pure as is usually the case, it being somewhat veiled in quality. Perhaps it was due to the damp atmosphere. She, too, was recalled until there appeared to be no longer a hope that she would grant an encore. The closing number was the gorgeous ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." The work of the orchestra was full of verve, and Mr. Nikisch's strongly dramatic instincts imparted an effect to every number that was little short of dazzling. The broad, frescolike style of his tone-painting, however, was a little too pronounced even for Music Hall, a very considerable amount of coarseness of execution being apparent throughout.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1892.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

Schumann's Music to Byron's "Manfred" Finely Played.

Last evening's symphony concert, the twelfth of the series, was attended by a notably large audience who greatly enjoyed the best performance of Byron's "Manfred" that has ever been given here. The weirdly beautiful and appropriate music which Schumann has given Byron's exquisite poem received intelligent, expressive and sympathetic interpretation. Seldom has Mr. Nikisch's band been more satisfying, The overture was magnificently played, and particularly good was the orchestra's effect throughout the "third act."

Excellent support was contributed by a large and splendidly trained chorus from the Cecilia Society and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay.

Mr. George Riddle received cordial commendation for his intelligent reading of the text.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, that noble fragment of the great tone-maker's work, was played as the other offering of the evening and proved a genuine treat. Its performance is always welcome, and yesterday's presentation was more than commonly pleasing.

There will be no symphony concert next Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at the Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

—The Boston Symphony orchestra starts on its travels tonight, and plays tomorrow in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music. Mr. Comee accompanies them.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts.)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones' This overture, "Promethus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon the band with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture. "King Lear"..................Littolff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23.... ....Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat. Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.
Miss Aus Der Ohe.
a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes"........ ....Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore..........F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene..................Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.......Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet Music. "Le Cid"................Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Littolff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" by Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "Pagina d'Amore" and most exquisitely played on Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's band.

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightfully jolly picture of the sights and sounds of carnival time, and made even more enjoyable by the fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was finely rendered, as was also the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," and the fascinating ballet music from "Le Cid" by Massenet which ended the programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell were highly appreciated, the former winning great applause in the "Concerto" by Tschaikowsky, the latter equally welcome in the "Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saens. Both artists were repeatedly recalled to bow their acknowledgments.

These popular concerts in every way deserve the appreciation they are receiving and cannot come too often.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 10, 1892.

Schumann's "Manfred" Music at the Symphony Concert.

It is doubtless owing to the measure of indefiniteness inseparable from musical expression that composers of "the immortals" class have ever been so fond of intensifying with their works those efforts of literary genius that attempt to deal with the expression of the restless longings of the human soul through the medium of supernaturalism. It hardly seems accidental that two such natures as Byron and Schumann should have existed at the same epoch, and that the composer should have chosen the poet's "Manfred" for musical illustration.

By their union a work has been produced, composite in its make-up, and yet beautiful in its unity of effect; a work in which the tenderest and most recondite emotions of spirituality are so ethereally conveyed, that although it is classified as "dramatic," the relegation of all theatric aid to the imagination (that is, of course, the properly receptive imagination) only adds to its impressiveness and impalpable beauty. Beauty of a romantic cast, it is true, and so far removed from the clearness of outline dear to the classic muse, that the pen shrinks from attempting to imprison any adequate realization of it within the hard-set confines of words. A memory of the delights of Schumann's musical setting of "Manfred," which has twice before been produced in Boston—in 1884 and 1886—doubtless contributed largely to draw the immense audiences that assembled for the 12th concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, as well as the preceding rehearsal Friday afternoon, at both of which occasions the "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature.

In its production were enlisted Mr. George Riddle, reader; vocal soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large contingent of the members of the Cecilia. It would hardly be possible for the superb training of the Symphony orchestra and the sympathetic, sensitive nature of Mr. Nikisch to manifest themselves to greater advantage than was done in their performance of the symphonic and melodramatic setting of this lyric in dramatic form. The overture and the entr' actes were played with a soulful perfection that mated well with the exquisite care and delicacy bestowed upon the passages designed to accentuate the reading of the poet's lines. Of the latter task Mr. Riddle acquitted himself most admirably, and his own intelligent conception and discriminating touch, seconded by a crystalline clearness of enunciation, carried along without apparent effort, were a delight to the hearer and an aid to his appreciation. If it is well to cull any particular example from so much generel excellence, the palm must be given to the exquisite pathos with which Mr. Riddle spoke Manfred's despairing invocation to the phantom of Astarte, beginning with

> ——Speak to me!
> For I have called on thee in the still night, and the not less exquisite beauty of the melodrama, executed by the orchestra in a manner that heightened the sad intensity of the lines to the point of setting the eyes a-brimming. Marvellously fine, too, in both these respects, was Manfred's haughty allocution to the demon spirits, just before his death:

> I do defy ye—though I feel my soul
> Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye.

The vocal soloists contributed their share of the performance very competently, and the chorus manifested gratifying power and precision; it sang the requiem at the close of the poem with noble unity, typical of the exalted calm of a high once troubled spirit, that has at last found its rest.

Should it be held that a monotony of praise pervades this comment upon the "Manfred" performance of last evening—a performance that must remain notable even in the annals of Boston symphony productions—it will, perhaps, be granted also that in this cynical age it is at times harder to utter the truth when it is complimentary than when it is otherwise. It is a pity—let it be said in passing—that this consideration is not oftener present in the minds of those who for the petty satisfaction of saying something ostensibly "smart," treat flippantly the outcome of protracted and conscientious effort.

The performance of that lovely fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor (No. 8)—with which last night's concert was begun, was in full accord with the melancholy charm that this tone-poem exhales; delicacy, sympathy and comprehension marked the execution of every passage. In one sense, the regret that this work was never completed is tempered by its bewitching charm as it is. And ambitious musicians had better let it alone. No sculptor has ever lived to conceive limbs the addition of which would not detract from the beauty of the armless marble goddess of the Grecian isle.

Mme. Nordica's grand operatic concert at Music Hall on the evening of Thursday, the 28th inst., will make a most interesting event. Mme. Nordica appears for the last time this season in this country, and she will be heard in some of the most brilliant numbers of her operatic repertoire. Mme. Scalchi, Sig. Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome and an orchestra of 50 musicians will assist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia,

Monday Evening, January 11, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the remaining four concerts, and single tickets now on sale at 1119 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, January 14, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

Congregational Church, - Corner Tenth and G Streets,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE MUSIC COMMITTEE.

Wednesday Evening, January 13, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at J. F. ELLIS & Co.'s, 937 Penna. Avenue.

[93]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Brooklyn.

Friday Afternoon, January 15, at 3 o'clock.
Saturday Evening, January 16, at 8 o'clock.

Under the auspices of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

••• Season of 1891-92. •••

JANUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Jan. 10, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Jan. 11, at 7 A.M. Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Jan. 12, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 13, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrolton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Jan. 14, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall. at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Jan. 14, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, Jan. 15, at 7 A.M.

GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Jan. 16, at 8 P.M.

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

Arrive Boston Sunday, Jan. 17, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, January 9, 1892.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1892.

Schumann's "Manfred" at the Symphony Concert.

An unusually large audience assembled at Music Hall, last Saturday night, to enjoy the attractive programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature of the occasion. Twice before it has been given here, in 1884 and 1886, but this was the best performance. The beautiful music that Schumann has given Byron's exquisite but rather gloomy poem is appropriate in every particular, and the expressive and sympathetic interpretation given it by Herr Nikisch, rendered the presence of the supporting artists, with the exception of Mr. George Riddle, almost superflous. The solo parts were small but well done by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs, Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardiner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large number of members of the Cecilia Club, who gave the numbers with taste and precision. The requiem at the close of the poem was finely shaded.

Mr. Riddle's finished powers, his clear enunciation and his voice, whose quality can be described by no better word than "velvety," were admirably shown in his rendition of the poet's lines.

The performance of that exquisite fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, No. 8—was a fitting prelude to the melancholy charm which pervades "Manfred." It has truly been said that "it stands quite apart from all other compositions of Schubert or any other master." It was written in 1822, six years before the death of its composer. Why it was never finished cannot now be told. For forty-five years it was buried in oblivion and then suddenly leapt into fame. It offers great opportunities for fine effects, delicate shading and clear perception of the composer's meaning, and all these marked its rendition on Saturday night.

There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be in Philadelphia tonight, in New York Tuesday; Washington, Wednesday; Baltimore, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday and Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: "A Faust Overture," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Chopin; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the soloist.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, JAN. 11, 1892.

SARAH IS GONE.

Divine and Only Bernhardt Has Left Boston Again.

The divine Sarah shook the mud of Boston from her tiny feet on the platform of the New York & New England depot last night and hied herself to her cosy special car "Coronet," which stood in the depot.

The car was attached to the second section of the Washington express, which was rapidly filling with passengers.

The train was one of the finest ever run out of this depot, and carried a combination of talented artists that worthily represented both the new and the old world, for in addition to Sarah Bernhardt and her excellent company there were also the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra on board the train.

The first section was made up of two baggage coaches, a combination smoker and passenger and the sleepers "Afton," "Esdros" and "Thalia." The second section was made up of "Oberon," "Orion," "Ismene" and the "Coronet."

There was a host of friends to bid adieu to the fair diva, and for upwards of half an hour she held quite a reception in the "Ismene." It was 7:13 o'clock before the first section pulled out of the depot, and 15 minutes later the section containing the fair artist passed out of the station.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1-9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert on Monday Night.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Monday evening Mrs. Nikisch will sing with orchestra Liszt's song "Mignon," and songs by Strauss, Schumann and Brahms, with pianoforte accompaniment to be played by her husband, who is an admirable accompanist.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the performance of which was admirable in interpretation and playing, save for some lapses in precision of attack in the second movement, and an occasional untunefulness in the brass wind. The rest of the programme was taken up with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Beyond the noble overture, the Entr'Acte and the "Witch of the Alps" music there is little of interest in the score. It is a thrice-told tale to assert that Schumann had but little of the dramatic spirit. If proof were needed at this late date of his almost exceptional lack of such spirt, the melodramatic music of this work would furnish it in abundance. It rarely echoes the sentiments of language it is intended to emphasize, is monotonously dull and at times painfully wearisome. The vocal solos are weak and ineffective and the choruses labored and uninteresting. Why the work should have been given in its entirety surpasses understanding. It was finely read and played from beginning to end and the performances of overture and entr' acte were among the best work that the orchestra has done this season. The music, if it interested the vast audience, excited no enthusiasm, the applause it evoked being very slight. In fact, all of the applause was bestowed on Mr. George Riddle, who read the poem in a masterly manner, with a large and expressive dignity and a keenly intelligent appreciation of every shade of sentiment that the text suggests. Mr. Riddle has given no reading here in which the best qualities of his art and his skill as an exponent of it were more brilliantly displayed. His success was as thorough as it was deserved. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. They had but little to do. It was not exacting, and was satisfactorily done. The chorus of members of the Cecilia fulfilled their slight tasks in a wholly creditable manner. The programme for the next concert is: Wagner's "Faust" overture, Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F-minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert in Union Hall on Monday evening. The opening selection was a quartet in E-flat by Karl von Dittersdorff, a prolific composer who once enjoyed great fame, but who is now forgotten even in his own country, except for his opera, "The Apothecary." This quartet was well worth the reviving, for it was delightful in the hearing, and refreshing for the seeming spontaneity of its inspiration. It is essentially Haydnesque in effect, is charming in its themes and graceful and distinguished in style generally. It is a relief to listen to this old music, for it is pure music, in which the composer does not make elaborate and wearisome attempts to display what he knows at the expense of what he feels—that is, when he does feel. This work was beautifully read and played. Then came the stupendous quartet in B flat, op. 130, which, despite its many fine and impressive moments, has long stretches wherein the meaning of the thoughts the composer has set down is almost incomprehensible. It was undoubtedly music of the future when Beethoven wrote it, and it appears to be still music of a future when it shall be thoroughly understood. Even in this day when vagueness and laboring for new methods of musical expression have become almost a cult with composers, the meaning of much of this quartet continues to be elusive. It is immensely difficult, but it was played with perfect smoothness and with a clearness that left nothing to be desired. The concert ended with an octet by Svensden. It is a long work, and somewhat tiresome; though this latter quality might disappear if the octet were heard by itself, instead of after a work that makes such a strain upon the attention as does the Beethoven quartet. The scherzo is perhaps the most "taking" movement. It is strongly original, and especially admirable and ingenious in the variety and freshness of its effects. Again the players, assisted this time by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz, illustrated the finest qualities of ensemble playing. The next concert will take place Jan. 25, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler assisting

The first in this season's series of "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell assisting as soloists. The performances began with an overture to "King Lear," by Litolff. As a concert overture without a title it would pass muster as a spirited, well-written and effectively instrumented work, and perhaps notable for its clearness and freedom from trite commonplaces. As an overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, however, it becomes blatant, unsympathetic and vulgar; with nothing of the woes of Lear except his mad bellowings in the storm, and almost ignoring the tender sweetness of the patient and loving Cordelia. It was played with immense fervor and effectiveness. Then came the first piano concerto of Tschaikowski, which was played by Miss Aus der Ohe. The concerto is full of beauties and it loses nothing by frequent hearing. The solo part was given with a force and a largeness quite masculine, and in a broad finished and able style that calls for the warmest admiration. Technically it was a fine display of the artist's capabilities. The fire of the performance was well tempered by discretion, and the more delicate moments in the work were interpreted with a charming grace and a delightful freedom from affectation of sentiment. The hearty applause and the two recalls that rewarded the artist were wholly deserved. After this followed a "Dance and a March of Gnomes," by Mr. Reginald de Koven, the composer of "Robin Hood." It is prettily and effectively scored, and is pleasing in effect, though it is characterized by no special originality, and is somewhat monotonous in its reiteration of its principal rhythms. As a reminiscence of a similar movement in the "Peer Ginty" of Grieg, it has special claim to consideration. Then came a "Pagina d'Amore" by M. Van der Stucken, and less original in its leading theme than it is in its dwelling on extreme dissonances. It is richly scored, in the Wagnerian vein, and the love it typifies is of the stormy and insatiable order peculiar to the composer of "Tristan and Isolde. Another novelty was a "Carnival Scene" by Mr. Arthur Bird. Here, again, the instrumentation is ingenious, but there is nothing else in the work except an occasional lapse into rhythm. Miss Powell played the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint Saëns with thorough artistic sincerity of style, and with a fulness of tone, ease and largeness of bowing and finish of technique that gave a fine distinction to her playing. She was vigorously applauded and frequently recalled, and though it would have been pleasing to hear her again, she is to be thanked for having declined to gratify the greedy demon of encore. The concert ended with Massenet's brilliant ballet music from "Le Cid," which was read and played delightfully.

Miss Aagot Lunde, a new comer from Norway, and said to be a contralto of fine skill, will give a concert in Union Hall on the evening of Jan. 19, assisted by Mr. Wulf Fries, Mrs. Louis Maas, Mad. Katinka Paul

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING [illegible]

The Symphony Concert.

The large audience and the rapt attention that was continuously displayed proved the concert of Saturday a popular success, and if a few flaws may be picked here or there, it must still be remembered that as a whole, the execution of the numbers showed an advance over the blatant vein that has frequently marred recent performances. The unfinished symphony by Schubert was generally well shaded and given in a conservative manner that was as welcome as it was unexpected, and made a few irregularties in the second movement at least condonable, although the exaggeration of the pauses and ritenuto effects was out of place in so simple a work as this—a violet among symphonies.

The quiet melancholy of Schubert's symphony made an excellent introduction to the profounder gloom of Schumann's "Manfred," and the historical link that Schumann drew much inspiration from Schubert and in his later days believed that the ghost of the latter was haunting him, imploring him to complete this very symphony, made the juxtaposition especially apt. One can readily imagine how much the character of the Anglicized Faust (as "Manfred" may fairly be called) appealed to the introspective Schumann; it is said that he wept when he first read the poem. The use of melodrame (spoken dialogue accompanied by music), first employed by Rousseau in 1773, is an effective touch if perfectly carried out by the reader.

Mr. George Riddle certainly read with an intelligence and poetic feeling that swayed every auditor, but he did not unite the text to the musical expression as did Mr. H. M. Ticknor in a previous performance. Beautiful as was his rendering of the few sentences of the spirit of Astarte, the words were given with so little regard for the accompaniment that often they fell with the gloomy instrumentation which pictured Manfred, and not with the tender phrases of muted violins which portrayed the spirit of his beloved Thes dainty measure, also on muted violins, of the incantation to the witch of the Alps, presented an audacious innovation; the reading was not given with the music, as intended by Schumann, but postponed until after it! This was probably done in the hope that the music, the prettiest in the entire work, might win applause, but if so it failed of its object, for the audience seemed to enter into the spirit of the work and demand continuity rather than sporadic successes; but the most graceful effect of the composition was sacrificed by omitting the words.

The overture was fairly well played. It could have had more of subtlety in its pictures of the struggles of Manfred again fate, and more of unity in the many syncopated passages, but the contrast between the proud and dark nature, and the tender and forgiving one was well drawn. The overture is as subtle and soulful as anything that Schumann has ever written. The orchestral work in the passages of melodrame was of varying shades of merit, but even when it was excellent, the palpable disjunction of reader and accompaniment caused many a blemish, as, for example, in the lines:—

> O God, if it be thus,
> And thou art not a madness and a mockery,
> I yet might be most happy,

at the end of which the figure of Astarte vanishes with an expressive diminished seventh chord, just as Manfred cries:—

> I will clasp thee, and we again will be—;

just at this important point there was a sufficient aberration to destroy the meaning of the music almost totally.

But it is impossible to wholly impair the beauty of this work, and the choruses were given with much steadiness by the members of the Cecilia, the solos by such singers as Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay, and the entr'acte was played by by the orchestra with absolute perfection. The scenes in the Hall of Ahrimanes, with the exception noted, were splendidly given orchestra and chorus, and the vehemence of the phrases "Prostrate thyself" and "Destroy the worm," so much akin to the Turbæ of more classical and sacred music, was commendable.

Schumann, like Wagner and Rossini, uses the English horn to represent the shepherd's, or Alpine, horn, and the distant sounds of the instrument form a splendid background to the hero's attempt at suicide, but the tones could have been a little louder, for at times the phrases became unintelligible in the hall. The double canon which forms the final requiem was well shaded; it is a good piece of composition, but is none the less a sin against dramatic unity to introduce a requiem, which has no more right in "Manfred" than a Mass would have in a Mohammedan mosque, but Schumann evidently sacrificed something to attain a dramatic ending.

In summing up the concert one must acknowledge the great difficulties attendant on a performance of "Manfred"; the reader must be a practical musician, the conductor must balance against his declamation in a manner more changeful than that required against a singer's musical expression, and the continuity must be preserved in many rapidly shifting emotions. When one considers all these stumbling blocks placed in the path (they have been surmounted, however), it seems like hyper-criticism to demand an almost unattainable ideal, and it is much fairer to dwell on what has been surmounted; judged in such a manner one can repeat that the performance of Saturday was one to be remembered with much pleasure, and a great advance over many of the preceding concerts.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1891–92.

JANUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Jan. 10, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Jan. 11, at 7 A.M. Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Jan. 12, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.
Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 13, at 9 A.M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.
CARROLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7 05 P.M.
Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrolton Hotel.
Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Jan. 14, at noon.
Concert at Academy Concert Hall, at 8 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Jan. 14, at 12.15, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.
Arrive New York Friday, Jan. 15, at 7 A.M.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Jan. 16, at 8 P.M.
Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.
Arrive Boston Sunday, Jan. 17, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, January 9, 1892.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1892.

Schumann's "Manfred" at the Symphony Concert.

An unusually large audience assembled at Music Hall, last Saturday night, to enjoy the attractive programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature of the occasion. Twice before it has been given here, in 1884 and 1886, but this was the best performance. The beautiful music that Schumann has given Byron's exquisite but rather gloomy poem is appropriate in every particular, and the expressive and sympathetic interpretation given it by Herr Nikisch, rendered the presence of the supporting artists, with the exception of Mr. George Riddle, almost superflous. The solo parts were small but well done by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardiner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large number of members of the Cecilia Club, who gave the numbers with taste and precision. The requiem at the close of the poem was finely shaded.

Mr. Riddle's finished powers, his clear enunciation and his voice, whose quality can be described by no better word than "velvety," were admirably shown in his rendition of the poet's lines.

The performance of that exquisite fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, No. 8—was a fitting prelude to the melancholy charm which pervades "Manfred." It has truly been said that "it stands quite apart from all other compositions of Schubert or any other master." It was written in 1822, six years before the death of its composer. Why it was never finished cannot now be told. For forty-five years it was buried in oblivion and then suddenly leapt into fame. It offers great opportunities for fine effects, delicate shading and clear perception of the composer's meaning, and all these marked its rendition on Saturday night.

There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be in Philadelphia tonight, in New York Tuesday; Washington, Wednesday; Baltimore, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday and Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: "A Faust Overture," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Chopin; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the soloist.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, JAN. 11, 1892.

SARAH IS GONE.

Divine and Only Bernhardt Has Left Boston Again.

The divine Sarah shook the mud of Boston from her tiny feet on the platform of the New York & New England depot last night and hied herself to her cosy special car "Coronet," which stood in the depot.

The car was attached to the second section of the Washington express, which was rapidly filling with passengers.

The train was one of the finest ever run out of this depot, and carried a combination of talented artists that worthily represented both the new and the old world, for in addition to Sarah Bernhardt and her excellent company there were also the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra on board the train.

The first section was made up of two baggage coaches, a combination smoker and passenger and the sleepers "Afton," "Esdros" and "Thalia." The second section was made up of "Oberon," "Orion," "Iamene" and the "Coronet."

There was a host of friends to bid adieu to the fair diva, and for upwards of half an hour she held quite a reception in the "Iamene." It was 7.13 o'clock before the first section pulled out of the depot, and 18 minutes later the section containing the fair artist passed out of the station.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert on Monday Night.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Monday evening Mrs. Nikisch will sing with orchestra Liszt's song "Mignon," and songs by Strauss, Schumann and Brahms, with pianoforte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, who is an admirable accompanist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the performance of which was admirable in interpretation and playing, save for some lapses in precision of attack in the second movement, and an occasional untunefulness in the brass wind. The rest of the programme was taken up with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Beyond the noble overture, the Entr'Acte and the "Witch of the Alps" music there is little of interest is the score. It is a thrice-told tale to assert that Schumann had but little of the dramatic spirit. If proof were needed at this late date of his almost exceptional lack of such spirt, the melodramatic music of this work would furnish it in abundance. It rarely echoes the sentiments of language it is intended to emphasize, is monotonously dull and at times painfully wearisome. The vocal solos are weak and ineffective and the choruses labored and uninteresting. Why the work should have been given in its entirety surpasses understanding. It was finely read and played from beginning to end and the performances of overture and entr' acte were among the best work that the orchestra has done this season. The music, if it interested the vast audience, excited no enthusiasm, the applause it evoked being very slight. In fact, all of the applause was bestowed on Mr. George Riddle, who read the poem in a masterly manner, with a large and expressive dignity and a keenly intelligent appreciation of every shade of sentiment that the text suggests. Mr. Riddle has given no reading here in which the best qualities of his art and his skill as an exponent of it were more brilliantly displayed. His success was as thorough as it was deserved. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. They had but little to do. It was not exacting, and was satisfactorily done. The chorus of members of the Cecilia fulfilled their slight tasks in a wholly creditable manner. The programme for the next concert is: Wagner's "Faust" overture, Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F-minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert in Union Hall on Monday evening. The opening selection was a quartet in E-flat by Karl von Dittersdorff, a prolific composer who once enjoyed great fame, but who is now forgotten even in his own country, except for his opera, "The Apothecary." This quartet was well worth the reviving, for it was delightful in the hearing, and refreshing for the seeming spontaneity of its inspiration. It is essentially Haydnesque in effect, is charming in its themes and graceful and distinguished in style generally. It is a relief to listen to this old music, for it is pure music, in which the composer does not make elaborate and wearisome attempts to display what he knows at the expense of what he feels—that is, when he does feel. This work was beautifully read and played. Then came the stupendous quartet in B flat, op. 130, which, despite its many fine and impressive moments, has long stretches wherein the meaning of the thoughts the composer has set down is almost incomprehensible. It was undoubtedly music of the future when Beethoven wrote it, and it appears to be still music of a future when it shall be thoroughly understood. Even in this day when vagueness and laboring for new methods of musical expression have become almost a cult with composers, the meaning of much of this quartet continues to be elusive. It is immensely difficult, but it was played with perfect smoothness and with a clearness that left nothing to be desired. The concert ended with an octet by Svensden. It is a long work, and somewhat tiresome; though this latter quality might disappear if the octet were heard by itself, instead of after a work that makes such a strain upon the attention as does the Beethoven quartet. The scherzo is perhaps the most "taking" movement. It is strongly original, and especially admirable and ingenious in the variety and freshness of its effects. Again the players, assisted this time by Messrs. Loeffler, Kraft, Novacek and Schulz, illustrated the finest qualities of ensemble playing. The next concert will take place Jan. 25, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler assisting

The first in this season's series of "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Miss Maud Powell assisting as soloists. The performances began with an overture to "King Lear," by Litolff. As a concert overture without a title it would pass muster as a spirited, well-written and effectively instrumented work, and perhaps notable for its clearness and freedom from trite commonplaces. As an overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, however, it becomes blatant, unsympathetic and vulgar; with nothing of the woes of Lear except his mad bellowings in the storm, and almost ignoring the tender sweetness of the patient and loving Cordelia. It was played with immense fervor and effectiveness. Then came the first piano concerto of Tschaikowski, which was played by Miss Aus der Ohe. The concerto is full of beauties and it loses nothing by frequent hearing. The solo part was given with a force and a largeness quite masculine, and in a broad finished and able style that calls for the warmest admiration. Technically it was a fine display of the artist's capabilities. The fire of the performance was well tempered by discretion, and the more delicate moments in the work were interpreted with a charming grace and a delightful freedom from affectation of sentiment. The hearty applause and the two recalls that rewarded the artist were wholly deserved. After this followed a "Dance and a March of Gnomes," by Mr. Reginald de Koven, the composer of "Robin Hood." It is prettily and effectively scored, and is pleasing in effect, though it is characterized by no special originality, and is somewhat monotonous in its reiteration of its principal rhythms. As a reminiscence of a similar movement in the "Peer Ginty" of Grieg, it has special claim to consideration. Then came a "Pagina d'Amore" by M. Van der Stucken, and less original in its leading theme than it is in its dwelling on extreme dissonances. It is richly scored, in the Wagnerian vein, and the love it typifies is of the stormy and insatiable order peculiar to the composer of "Tristan and Isolde. Another novelty was a "Carnival Scene" by Mr. Arthur Bird. Here, again, the instrumentation is ingenious, but there is nothing else in the work except an occasional lapse into rhythm. Miss Powell played the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint Saëns with thorough artistic sincerity of style, and with a fulness of tone, ease and largeness of bowing and finish of technique that gave a fine distinction to her playing. She was vigorously applauded and frequently recalled, and though it would have been pleasing to hear her again, she is to be thanked for having declined to gratify the greedy demon of encore. The concert ended with Massenet's brilliant ballet music from "Le Cid," which was read and played delightfully.

Miss Aagot Lunde, a new comer from Norway, and said to be a contralto of fine skill, will give a concert in Union Hall on the evening of Jan. 19, assisted by Mr. Wult Fries, Mrs. [illegible] Mad. Katinka Paul-

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING JAN. 11, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The large audience and the rapt attention that was continuously displayed proved the concert of Saturday a popular success, and if a few flaws may be picked here or there, it must still be remembered that as a whole, the execution of the numbers showed an advance over the blatant vein that has frequently marred recent performances. The unfinished symphony by Schubert was generally well shaded and given in a conservative manner that was as welcome as it was unexpected, and made a few irregularties in the second movement at least condonable, although the exaggeration of the pauses and ritenuto effects was out of place in so simple a work as this—a violet among symphonies.

The quiet melancholy of Schubert's symphony made an excellent introduction to the profounder gloom of Schumann's "Manfred," and the historical link that Schumann drew much inspiration from Schubert and in his later days believed that the ghost of the latter was haunting him, imploring him to complete this very symphony, made the juxtaposition especially apt. One can readily imagine how much the character of the Anglicized Faust (as "Manfred" may fairly be called) appealed to the introspective Schumann; it is said that he wept when he first read the poem. The use of melodrame (spoken dialogue accompanied by music), first employed by Rousseau in 1773, is an effective touch if perfectly carried out by the reader.

Mr. George Riddle certainly read with an intelligence and poetic feeling that swayed every auditor, but he did not unite the text to the musical expression as did Mr. H. M. Ticknor in a previous performance. Beautiful as was his rendering of the few sentences of the spirit of Astarte, the words were given with so little regard for the accompaniment that often they fell with the gloomy instrumentation which pictured Manfred, and not with the tender phrases of muted violins which portrayed the spirit of his beloved Thes dainty measure, also on muted violins, of the incantation to the witch of the Alps, presented an audacious innovation; the reading was not given with the music, as intended by Schumann, but postponed until after it! This was probably done in the hope that the music, the prettiest in the entire work, might win applause, but if so it failed of its object, for the audience seemed to enter into the spirit of the work and demand continuity rather than sporadic successes; but the most graceful effect of the composition was sacrificed by omitting the words.

The overture was fairly well played. It could have had more of subtlety in its pictures of the struggles of Manfred again fate, and more of unity in the many syncopated passages, but the contrast between the proud and dark nature, and the tender and forgiving one was well drawn. The overture is as subtle and soulful as anything that Schumann has ever written. The orchestral work in the passages of melodrame was of varying shades of merit, but even when it was excellent, the palpable disjunction of reader and accompaniment caused many a blemish, as, for example, in the lines:—

> O God, if it be thus,
> And thou art not a madness and a mockery,
> I yet might be most happy,

at the end of which the figure of Astarte vanishes with an expressive diminished seventh chord, just as Manfred cries:—

> I will clasp thee, and we again will be—;

just at this important point there was a sufficient aberration to destroy the meaning of the music almost totally.

But it is impossible to wholly impair the beauty of this work, and the choruses were given with much steadiness by the members of the Cecilia, the solos by such singers as Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay, and the entr'acte was played by by the orchestra with absolute perfection. The scenes in the Hall of Ahrimanes, with the exception noted, were splendidly given orchestra and chorus, and the vehemence of the phrases "Prostrate thyself" and "Destroy the worm," so much akin to the Turbæ of more classical and sacred music, was commendable.

Schumann, like Wagner and Rossini, uses the English horn to represent the shepherd's, or Alpine, horn, and the distant sounds of the instrument form a splendid background to the hero's attempt at suicide, but the tones could have been a little louder, for at times the phrases became unintelligible in the hall. The double canon which forms the final requiem was well shaded; it is a good piece of composition, but is none the less a sin against dramatic unity to introduce a requiem, which has no more right in "Manfred" than a Mass would have in a Mohammedan mosque, but Schumann evidently sacrificed something to attain a dramatic ending.

In summing up the concert one must acknowledge the great difficulties attendant on a performance of "Manfred"; the reader must be a practical musician, the conductor must balance against his declamation in a manner more changeful than that required against a singer's musical expression, and the continuity must be preserved in many rapidly shifting emotions. When one considers all these stumbling-blocks placed in the path (they have been surmounted, however), it seems like hyper-criticism to demand an almost unattainable ideal, and it is much fairer to dwell on what has been surmounted; judged in such a manner one can repeat that the performance of Saturday was one to be remembered with much pleasure, and a great advance over many of the preceding concerts.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible]

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1892.

"MANFRED."

An Admirable Performance of Schumann's Work.

A Discussion of Its Dramatic Value.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony in B minor and Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." The arrangement of the poem was read by Mr. George Riddle. The singers were Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay. The chorus was taken from the Cecilia Society. There was a very large audience.

Byron did not write "Manfred" for the theatre. In a letter to Murray, the publisher, he says: "I have made it impossible that it should be put upon the stage, having the greatest contempt for the theatre ever since my affair with Drury Lane." In another letter he speaks of having composed it with a horror of the stage, and with the intention of making even the thought of dramatic presentation impracticable. It is, indeed, eminently unfit for the theatre; not on account of its dismal subject, but there is no action, there are no incidents, there are no characters of flesh-and-blood interest. It has been called a species of "Faust." Manfred is, perhaps, a twin brother of Faust, but the drama, as a German critic keenly observes, is without Gretchen, without Valentin and Mephisto, without an Easter walk, without Auerbach's cellar, without Dame Martha's garden. There is the Walpurgis-night spirit in each, "but of the 'two souls' that dwell in the breast of Faust only one is found in the body of Manfred, a spirit dissatisfied, indulging in subtle inquiries, metaphysical." Furthermore, Manfred does not yield to the devil; "he conquers him by the might of the human spirit." As a poem, however, "Manfred" made a profound impression in Germany, and it is still seen, at intervals, upon the German stage.

Schumann was a passionate admirer of Byron, and it is not surprising that he tried to show in music the impressions made upon his mind by the English poet. He wrote a chorus and an aria for an opera, the subject of which was taken from "The Corsair;" but he abandoned his purpose, and the numbers were not published. He set three of the "Hebrew Melodies" to music. His perturbed spirit found special pleasure in "Manfred," and he once said that he never devoted himself to any composition with such lavish love and power as to his music to Byron's dramatic work. Wasielewski tells us that when reading the poem aloud in Dusseldorf his voice suddenly faltered, he burst into tears, and he was so overcome that he could read no farther.

Schumann's "Manfred" music may be considered as stage music or as absolute music—that is, as music pure and simple, untrammeled by conditions, without reference to theatrical purpose. As stage music it is a failure. It is devoid of the elements that make such music effective. The object of melodramatic music is to accentuate a situation, to put a character in bolder relief, to intensify an emotion upon the stage. To do this successfully the composer must unite keen dramatic instincts with the power of expression. The genius of Schumann was essentially undramatic. He proved this fact in many ways—in his opera, which was a failure; in "Paradise and the Peri," where "the idea of dramatic form is often sacrificed to subjective caprice;" in a song like "Belshazzer," where he loses the whole effect by fretting over the detail; and, not to mention other instances, in "Manfred." His nature was lyric, and "only when personified does the lyric become dramatic." He had not the faculty of musical characterization. Crowds or individuals did not appeal to him dramatically, and instead of presenting the scenes in which they moved so that the music identified those scenes, he merely gave way to a series of "lyrical outbursts." Sneer as he might at Auber and Meyerbeer he never could have written the music that characterizes Fenella or Marcel.

Take his "Manfred." Whatever may be said about the merits of the overture as a strictly musical composition, as a theatre overture to prepare the hearer for a play, it is too subjective, too intimate. The theatrical perspective is disregarded, and as a prelude to a play or opera it must be placed below the overtures of Weber, for example, or the overture to "Coriolanus" or "Egmont" or even "Midsummer Night's Dream." I say "even 'Midsummer Night's Dream,'" for Mendelssohn, too, would have failed upon the stage if the fragment of his unfinished opera may be justly taken as an exhibition of his powers as an opera composer. Without discussing the question of whether Schumann's arrangement of the text of Byron's poem is satisfactory—and it might be argued that here, too, he showed his lack of dramatic feeling—let us pass on to the incidental music. The first three numbers are devoted to spiritual manifestations. In the first, four spirits sing in turn a few measures, characterless, unmelodious, uninteresting. One spirit is an alto, another a soprano and so on. Finally they sing together. That is all. Their lines well declaimed upon the stage, with the accessories of costume and scenery, would be more effective. And, pray, does the music, beautiful as it is, that accompanies the appearance of the female figure, fit in any way [illegible] agony and doubt of Manfred, as he gazes [illegible] falls senseless? Or is the incantation [illegible] four bass voices an adequate supplement [illegible] horror of the words? A few measures [illegible] at random from the first pages of the [illegible] in the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" [illegible] more blood-curdling suggestion than is [illegible] this whole number. Or is the "Hymn [illegible] Spirits" filled with the demoniac fury of [illegible]? It is certainly written in de[illegible] of the laws of vocal composition. No one [illegible] to this if an effect were thereby [illegible]

[illegible] in the poem rejects the rites of the Church. The closing words are spoken by the Abbot: "His soul hath ta'en its earthless flight—whither? I dread to think—but he is gone." In a word, there is no hope. What fitness is there in the requiem with its "eternal rest" and "light perpetual?" The instrumental melodramatic music is sometimes delightful per se—as in the calling of the Alp witch and in the address to Astarte—but it can seldom be called characteristic, or suggestive of the text. As purely melodramatic music, "Manfred" is inferior to Beethoven's "Egmont," Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," for it lacks dramatic truth.

Objection has been raised against its use in the concert hall on the ground that the music does not bring vividly the play before the audience. There is also another objection that has been made against all melodramatic music of such pretension, and that is this: The text suffers by the musical interruption, and the music is neglected in the desire to hear the text. But if "Manfred" is banished from the theatre and the concert hall, where is its place? One ingenious writer claims that as the symphonic poem was unknown in Schumann's time, he put the impressions produced by Byron's poem into incidental music; and perhaps this is as satisfactory a summing up as any—that "Manfred" is a fine poetic rendering in music of Schuman's impressions.

The performance of the orchestra was very satisfactory, although at the opening of the overture and in a few passages of the melodramatic music the attack was ragged, as were the final measures before Act III. The "Calling of the Alp witch" was given with unusual delicacy and precision. The solo singers were adequate, although the unison passages of the "Incantation" were slightly marred by Mr. Meyn's singular habit of singing the two equal and final notes of a measure as though the first were dotted and the second of necessarily lesser value. In the "Hymn of the Spirits" the chorus was feeble; the Requiem was sung with due effect.

The applause of the evening, however, was given to Mr. Riddle, and deservedly; for he succeeded admirably in an arduous task. There might be a question as to his use of the "ascending scale"; possibly the last word of the vanishing astarte should be uttered as a reproach; but in view of the breadth and dignity and discrimination of his performance, these and similar questions savor of hypercriticism.

The concert opened with an excellent interpretation of the "Unfinished" Symphony. It is interesting to note in this connection that the symphony was finished in 1891 by an earnest German named August Ludwig. His offense is aggravated by the fact that he has written a pamphlet in which he congratulates the world upon the accomplishment of his labor and the consequent satisfying of a long felt want. Incidentally he speaks of his own music in terms of warm approbation.

PHILIP HALE.

S Evening Journal

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 8, 18

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Large Audience Enjoys a Rich Musical Treat.

As was expected, the Nordica concert at the Opera House last evening attracted a large and cultivated audience. The chief interest, of course, centred in Mme. Nordica, but the assisting artists were all first class and were heartily appreciated. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in E flat........Carl von Dittersdorf
Allegro—Andante—Menuetto—Finale.
Kneisel Quartette.
Aria—"Eri tu" (Masked Ball)...........Verdi
Mr. Dome.
Soli for Violoncello.
(a) Sarabande ....Bach
(b) Tarentelle........................Cossman
Mr. Schroeder.
Aria—"Una voce" (Barber of Seville).Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Andante from Quartette in D Major, Tschaikowsky
Kneisel Quartette.
Song—"Les Filles de Cadiz"...........Delibes
Mme. Nordica.
Solo for violin—Rhapsodie Hongroise.. Hauser
Mr. Kneisel.
Song—"Star of the Evening." (Tannhaeuser)..............................Wagner
Mr. Dome.
(a) Cavatina from Quartette B flat.. Beethoven
(b) Menuet..........................Boccherini
Kneisel Quartette.
Polacca—"Esmeralda"....A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Presto from Quartette D major........Haydn
Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel quartette has been somewhat changed since its last appearance in this city, Mr. Alwin Schroeder having taken the place of Mr. Hekking as violoncellist. He proved to be a fine artist both in quartette work and solo playing, and the quartette sustained the high rank it has achieved in former concerts.

The andante of the quartette by Dittersdorf called forth a hearty burst of applause for its excellent shading, and later on, the favorite andante by Tschaikowsky was exquisitely played. In this latter, the pizzicato accompaniment by the violoncello was so skillfully and sympathetically played as to merit special mention. Previous to this Mr. Schroeder had won the close attention and appreciation of the audience in the Sarabande and Tarentelle and he was recalled twice.

Mme. Nordica possesses the same glorious voice as of yore, when we were at the conservatory together. Thrilling in its power it also has great flexibility and a sympathetic quality which moves the hearer at will to emotions of joy or plaintiveness, as the sentiment changes. Added to this is an indescribable charm of personal appearance interesting in itself. She generously rendered several selections other than those on the programme, among them "Robin Adair," which was sung with tender feeling.

Mr. Dome was well received and responded to an encore after his second se-

---

Evening Journal.

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 5, 1892.

NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

MME. NORDICA.

Sketch of the Soloist of Thursday Night's Concert.

A grand concert is to be given in the Opera House on Thursday evening, Mme. Lillian Nordica assisted by Mr. Z. Dome, baritone, of Covent Garden, London; Mr. Franz Kneisel, solo violinist and concert-meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncella virtuoso of the symphony orchestra; Mr. Max Zach, accompanist, and the celebrated Kneisel quartette. The life story of the prima donna is here narrated:

Lillian Norton—the name of Nordica is a nom de theatre—was born in Maine, where her family, claiming to be among the descendants of the early English settlers, had been established for many generations. While she was yet an infant her parents removed to Boston, the capital city of the distinguished band of colonists to which they belonged, and there the musical capabilities of the future prima donna manifested themselves. In due course she entered the conservatoire there, and had the good fortune to be placed under John O'Neil, an excellent and conscientious teacher.

MADAME NORDICA.

He set his face against a system of training which would fit the pupil for an early exhibition of immature powers. He had the wisdom to check the anxieties of those who were in favor of inviting the public to share with them the pleasure they experienced in the sweet and simple vocal powers of the gifted child. The advantage of this course was proved subsequently in the brilliant success achieved in after time, when the vocal organs had undergone well-directed development.

During her early professional engagements, she visited London in conjunction with Gilmore's band. At the concerts given by the band at the Crystal Palace, the beauty of her voice, and the personal charm of the manner of the young vocalist, greatly helped in securing the attraction of the performances in which she took part. An experienced critic who heard her at the time advised her to enter upon a further course of study with a competent Italian master.

This advice she acted upon, courageously abandoning the prospects held out in the career she was then pursuing, she commenced her studies with the famous vocal trainer, San Giovanni, in the winter of 1879, and after a short course of careful study, the renowned Italian maestro consented to her making a trial essay on the operatic stage at Brescia, as Violetta in Verdi's opera, "La Traviata," an opera which she had later the privilege of studying with the composer. For her debut at Brescia, her master had Italianized her name to Nordica, and the success achieved by her on that occasion justified her in retaining a title which has been identified with a continuously successful career. At Milan and at Genoa she found the public ready to give her hearty welcome for the beauty of her voice and the simplicity and natural charm of her vocalization.

In 1881 she was engaged to sing in the Russian capital, and during two successive seasons she appeared there. The favorable reception accorded to her did not cause her to lessen her enthuiasm for her profession, nor her desire to extend her knowledge of the work in which she was engaged. She learned no less than 10 operas, and made her appearance in all successfully, keeping up her study of vocal technique with her Italian master during the whole period. She seemed to have reached the height of popularity when she appeared in Paris as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." Her reading was recognized as artistic by those who had expressed an opinion that no more perfect realization of the part could be attained by any artist, however gifted, after

The individuality of her interpretation was compared favorably with that of the great artist whom she followed, and her engagement for seven months during the season of 1883 was a proof of the favors he had won from the most exacting and often hypercritical audiences.

At the end of the season, to the great regret of her numerous admirers, she retired from the stage on the occasion of her marriage with Mr. Gower, whose inventions in connection with the telephone have made his name universally known. Shortly after the marriage Mr. Gower went on an aeronautic expedition, from which he never returned, and the widest sympathy was felt and expressed for the young widow thus thrown upon her own resources.

By the French law of testamentary disposition, in the absence of legal proof of death the widow was compelled to wait until seven years elapsed before she could enjoy the share of her husband's property to which she was entitled. This period has only recently been fulfilled, and Madame Nordica is, it is understood, at length in possession of a fortune other than that of her own making.

When all moral doubt of the sad fate of her husband was set at rest, Madame Nordica, with a courage which commanded admiration as well as sympathy, resumed her public career in 1887, when she made her first appearance on the operatic stage in London under the direction of Mr. Mapleson.

The following year she was engaged by Mr. Augustus Harris, and she has continued in his Italian Opera Company each season. The beauty of her voice, the charm of her singing, the attraction of her personal appearance and the nameless numberless qualities which have endeared her to the public, are only a few of the many graces which she possesses as a woman and as an artist. In the concert-room, as upon the stage, she has won a high position by the sweetness and freshness of her voice, and she possesses all the needful requirements to be successful as an oratorio singer as she has been in opera.

SENTINEL, Fitchburg, Mass.

Date 1/8

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ~~Boston Symphony orchestra~~, of which F. R. Comee, formerly of this city, is assistant manager, starts from Boston, Jan. 10, on its January trip. During next week the orchestra will give concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

This orchestra, under Conductor Arthur Nikisch, is winning golden compliments on their trips to the large cities. Below we give a few of the press notices received in the cities above named the first week in November:

"Among the three or four foremost orchestras of the world."—[N. Y. World.

"The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."—[Sun.

"The finest body of strings ever heard in this country."—[Herald.

"Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."—[Recorder.

"As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal."—[Evening Post.

"In the foreground of renown in America."—[Philadelphia Press.

"A prospect of the most brilliant season in its history."—[Inquirer.

"The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."—[Record.

"The rival of any force of the kind in the world."—[Brooklyn Eagle.

"Enthusiastically received by the whole audience."—[Baltimore American.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/7

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to the Academy of Music next Monday evening to give the third concert in its present series. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch has made a programme presenting only the modern composers. The concert will open with the clever overture to Lalo's striking opera "Le Roi D'Ys" and will close with Goldmark's remarkable and brilliant colored "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. The solo numbers will be especially notable. The instrumental soloist will be the accomplished 'cellist, Mr. Schroeder. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is already very favorably known here, will contribute two numbers, one of which will be Liszt's "Mignon," with orchestra. The sale of seats is being held at 1119 Chestnut Street, and a brilliant audience is already assured.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa

D 1/11

—The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC on Monday evening next will include a performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The brilliant overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi D'Ys," will also be given. The soloists will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano One of Mrs. Nikisch's songs will be Liszt's "Mignon," with orchestral accompaniment.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1892.

"MANFRED."

An Admirable Performance of Schumann's Work.

A Discussion of Its Dramatic Value.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony in B minor and Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." The arrangement of the poem was read by Mr. George Riddle. The singers were Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay. The chorus was taken from the Cecilia Society. There was a very large audience.

Byron did not write "Manfred" for the theatre. In a letter to Murray, the publisher, he says: "I have made it impossible that it should be put upon the stage, having the greatest contempt for the theatre ever since my affair with Drury Lane." In another letter he speaks of having composed it with a horror of the stage, and with the intention of making even the thought of dramatic presentation impracticable. It is, indeed, eminently unfit for the theatre; not on account of its dismal subject, but there is no action, there are no incidents, there are no characters of flesh-and-blood interest. It has been called a species of "Faust." Manfred is, perhaps, a twin brother of Faust, but the drama, as a German critic keenly observes, is without Gretchen, without Valentin and Mephisto, without an Easter walk, without Auerbach's cellar, without Dame Martha's garden. There is the Walpurgis-night spirit in each; "but of the 'two souls' that dwell in the breast of Faust only one is found in the body of Manfred, a spirit dissatisfied, indulging in subtle inquiries, metaphysical." Furthermore, Manfred does not yield to the devil; "he conquers him by the might of the human spirit." As a poem, however, "Manfred" made a profound impression in Germany, and it is still seen, at intervals, upon the German stage.

Schumann was a passionate admirer of Byron, and it is not surprising that he tried to show in music the impressions made upon his mind by the English poet. He wrote a chorus and an aria for an opera, the subject of which was taken from "The Corsair;" but he abandoned his purpose, and the numbers were not published. He set three of the "Hebrew Melodies" to music. His perturbed spirit found special pleasure in "Manfred," and he once said that he never devoted himself to any composition with such lavish love and power as to his music to Byron's dramatic work. Wasielewski tells us that when reading the poem aloud in Dusseldorf his voice suddenly faltered, he burst into tears, and he was so overcome that he could read no farther.

Schumann's "Manfred" music may be considered as stage music or as absolute music—that is, as music pure and simple, untrammeled by conditions, without reference to theatrical purpose. As stage music it is a failure. It is devoid of the elements that make such music effective. The object of melodramatic music is to accentuate a situation, to put a character in bolder relief, to intensify an emotion upon the stage. To do this successfully the composer must unite keen dramatic instincts with the power of expression. The genius of Schumann was essentially undramatic. He proved this fact in many ways—in his opera, which was a failure; in "Paradise and the Peri," where "the idea of dramatic form is often sacrificed to subjective caprice;" in a song like "Belshazzer," where he loses the whole effect by fretting over the detail; and, not to mention other instances, in "Manfred." His nature was lyric, and "only when personified does the lyric become dramatic." He had not the faculty of musical characterization. Crowds or individuals did not appeal to him dramatically, and instead of presenting the scenes in which they moved so that the music identified those scenes, he merely gave way to a series of "lyrical outbursts." Sneer as he might at Auber and Meyerbeer he never could have written the music that characterizes Fenella or Marcel.

Take his "Manfred." Whatever may be said about the merits of the overture as a strictly musical composition, as a theatre overture to prepare the hearer for a play, it is too subjective, too intimate. The theatrical perspective is disregarded, and as a prelude to a play or opera it must be placed below the overtures of Weber, for example, or the overture to "Coriolanus" or "Egmont" or even "Midsummer Night's Dream." I say "even 'Midsummer Night's Dream,'" for Mendelssohn, too, would have failed upon the stage if the fragment of his unfinished opera may be justly taken as an exhibition of his powers as an opera composer. Without discussing the question of whether Schumann's arrangement of the text of Byron's poem is satisfactory—and it might be argued that here, too, he showed his lack of dramatic feeling—let us pass on to the incidental music. The first three numbers are devoted to spiritual manifestations. In the first, four spirits sing in turn a few measures, characterless, unmelodious, uninteresting. One spirit is an alto, another a soprano and so on. Finally they sing together. That is all. Their lines well declaimed upon the stage, with the accessories of costume and scenery, would be more effective. And, pray, does the music, beautiful as it is, that accompanies the appearance of the female figure, fit in any way the agony and doubt of Manfred, as he gazes and falls senseless? Or is the incantation with four bass voices an adequate supplement to the horror of the words? A few measures taken at random from the first pages of the scene in the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" contain more blood-curdling suggestion than is found in this whole number. Or is the "Hymn of the Spirits" filled with the demoniac fury of Satanic adoration? It is certainly written in defiance of the laws of vocal composition. No one would object to this if an effect were thereby [illegible] and at the sacrifice of dramatic truth. Manfred in the poem rejects the rites of the Church. The closing words are spoken by the Abbot: "His soul hath ta'en its earthless flight—whither? I dread to think—but he is gone." In a word, there is no hope. What fitness is there in the requiem with its "eternal rest" and "light perpetual?" The instrumental melodramatic music is sometimes delightful per se—as in the calling of the Alp witch and in the address to Astarte—but it can seldom be called characteristic, or suggestive of the text. As purely melodramatic music, "Manfred" is inferior to Beethoven's "Egmont," Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," for it lacks dramatic truth.

Objection has been raised against its use in the concert hall on the ground that the music does not bring vividly the play before the audience. There is also another objection that has been made against all melodramatic music of such pretension, and that is this: The text suffers by the musical interruption, and the music is neglected in the desire to hear the text. But if "Manfred" is banished from the theatre and the concert hall, where is its place? One ingenious writer claims that as the symphonic poem was unknown in Schumann's time, he put the impressions produced by Byron's poem into incidental music; and perhaps this is as satisfactory a summing up as any—that "Manfred" is a fine poetic rendering in music of Schuman's impressions.

The performance of the orchestra was very satisfactory, although at the opening of the overture and in a few passages of the melodramatic music the attack was ragged, as were the final measures before Act III. The "Calling of the Alp witch" was given with unusual delicacy and precision. The solo singers were adequate, although the unison passages of the "Incantation" were slightly marred by Mr. Meyn's singular habit of singing the two equal and final notes of a measure as though the first were dotted and the second of necessarily lesser value. In the "Hymn of the Spirits" the chorus was feeble; the Requiem was sung with due effect.

The applause of the evening, however, was given to Mr. Riddle, and deservedly; for he succeeded admirably in an arduous task. There might be a question as to his use of the "ascending scale"; possibly the last word of the vanishing astarte should be uttered as a reproach; but in view of the breadth and dignity and discrimination of his performance, these and similar questions savor of hypercriticism.

The concert opened with an excellent interpretation of the "Unfinished" Symphony. It is interesting to note in this connection that the symphony was finished in 1891 by an earnest German named August Ludwig. His offense is aggravated by the fact that he has written a pamphlet in which he congratulates the world upon the accomplishment of his labor and the consequent satisfying of a long felt want. Incidentally he speaks of his own music in terms of warm approbation.

PHILIP HALE.

Evening Journal

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 8, 18

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Large Audience Enjoys a Rich Musical Treat.

As was expected, the Nordica concert at the Opera House last evening attracted a large and cultivated audience. The chief interest, of course, centred in Mme. Nordica, but the assisting artists were all first class and were heartily appreciated. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in E flat.......Carl von Dittersdorf
Allegro—Andante—Menuetto—Finale.
Kneisel Quartette.
Aria—"Eri tu" (Masked Ball)..........Verdi
Mr. Dome.
Soli for Violoncello.
(a) Sarabande ....Bach
(b) Tarentelle....................Cossman
Mr. Schroeder.
Aria—"Una voce" (Barber of Seville).Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Andante from Quartette in D Major, Tschaikowsky
Kneisel Quartette.
Song—"Les Filles de Cadiz"..........Delibes
Mme. Nordica.
Solo for violin—Rhapsodie Hongroise.. Hauser
Mr. Kneisel.
Song—"Star of the Evening." (Tannhaeuser)......................Wagner
Mr. Dome.
(a) Cavatina from Quartette B flat.. Beethoven
(b) Menuet........................Boccherini
Kneisel Quartette.
Polacca—"Esmeralda"....A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Presto from Quartette D major........Haydn
Kneisel Quartette.

The Kneisel quartette has been somewhat changed since its last appearance in this city, Mr. Alwin Schroeder having taken the place of Mr. Hekking as violoncellist. He proved to be a fine artist both in quartette work and solo playing, and the quartette sustained the high rank it has achieved in former concerts.

The andante of the quartette by Dittersdorf called forth a hearty burst of applause for its excellent shading, and later on, the favorite andante by Tschaikowsky was exquisitely played. In this latter, the pizzicato accompaniment by the violoncello was so skillfully and sympathetically played as to merit special mention. Previous to this Mr. Schroeder had won the close attention and appreciation of the audience in the Sarabande and Tarentelle and he was recalled twice.

Mme. Nordica possesses the same glorious voice as of yore, when we were at the conservatory together. Thrilling in its power it also has great flexibility and a sympathetic quality which moves the hearer at will to emotions of joy or plaintiveness, as the sentiment changes. Added to this is an indescribable charm of personal appearance interesting in itself. She generously rendered several selections other than those on the programme, among them "Robin Adair," which was sung with tender feeling.

Mr. Dome was well received and responded to an encore after his second se-

---

Evening Journal.

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 5, 1892.

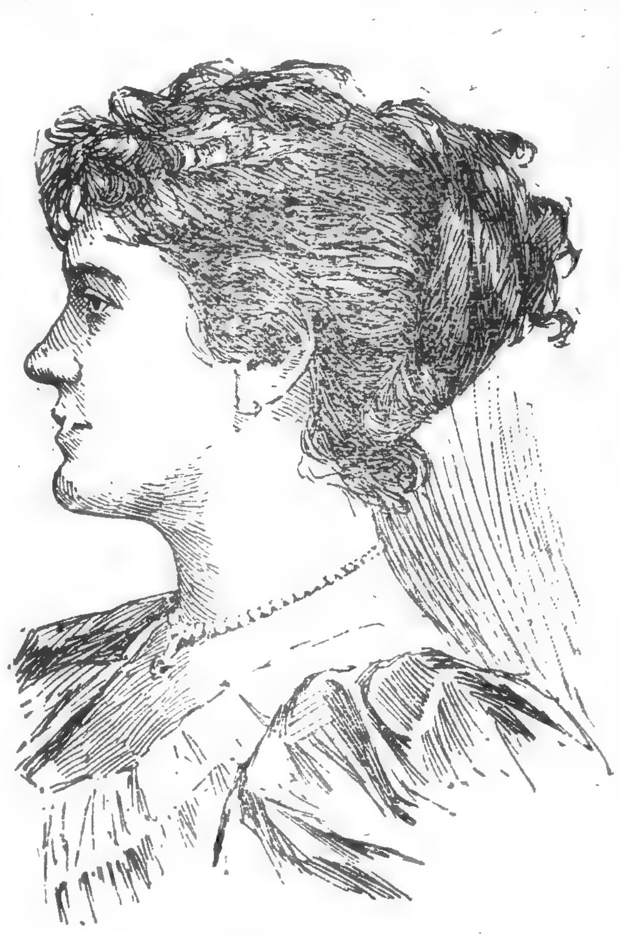
NEW BEDFORD EVENING JOURNAL.

MME. NORDICA.

Sketch of the Soloist of Thursday Night's Concert.

A grand concert is to be given in the Opera House on Thursday evening, Mme. Lillian Nordica assisted by Mr. Z. Dome, baritone, of Covent Garden, London; Mr. Franz Kneisel, solo violinist and concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncella virtuoso of the symphony orchestra; Mr. Max Zach, accompanist, and the celebrated Kneisel quartette. The life story of the prima donna is here narrated:

Lillian Norton—the name of Nordica is a nom de theatre—was born in Maine, where her family, claiming to be among the descendants of the early English settlers, had been established for many generations. While she was yet an infant her parents removed to Boston, the capital city of the distinguished band of colonists to which they belonged, and there the musical capabilities of the future prima donna manifested themselves. In due course she entered the conservatoire there, and had the good fortune to be placed under John O'Neil, an excellent and conscientious teacher.



MADAME NORDICA.

He set his face against a system of training which would fit the pupil for an early exhibition of immature powers. He had the wisdom to check the anxieties of those who were in favor of inviting the public to share with them the pleasure they experienced in the sweet and simple vocal powers of the gifted child. The advantage of this course was proved subsequently in the brilliant success achieved in after time, when the vocal organs had undergone well-directed development.

During her early professional engagements, she visited London in conjunction with Gilmore's band. At the concerts given by the band at the Crystal Palace, the beauty of her voice, and the personal charm of the manner of the young vocalist, greatly helped in securing the attraction of the performances in which she took part. An experienced critic who heard her at the time advised her to enter upon a further course of study with a competent Italian master.

This advice she acted upon, courageously abandoning the prospects held out in the career she was then pursuing, she commenced her studies with the famous vocal trainer, San Giovanni, in the winter of 1879, and after a short course of careful study, the renowned Italian maestro consented to her making a trial essay on the operatic stage at Brescia, as Violetta in Verdi's opera, "La Traviata," an opera which she had later the privilege of studying with the composer. For her debut at Brescia, her master had Italianized her name to Nordica, and the success achieved by her on that occasion justified her in retaining a title which has been identified with a continuously successful career. At Milan and at Genoa she found the public ready to give her hearty welcome for the beauty of her voice and the simplicity and natural charm of her vocalization.

In 1881 she was engaged to sing in the Russian capital, and during two successive seasons she appeared there. The favorable reception accorded to her did not cause her to lessen her enthuiasm for her profession, nor her desire to extend her knowledge of the work in which she was engaged. She learned no less than 10 operas, and made her appearance in all successfully, keeping up her study of vocal technique with her Italian master during the whole period. She seemed to have reached the height of popularity when she appeared in Paris as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust." Her reading was recognized as artistic by those who had expressed an opinion that no more perfect realization of the part could be attained by any artist, however gifted, after Christine Nilsson.

The individuality of her interpretation was compared favorably with that of the great artist whom she followed, and her engagement for seven months during the season of 1883 was a proof of the favors he had won from the most exacting and often hypercritical audiences.

At the end of the season, to the great regret of her numerous admirers, she retired from the stage on the occasion of her marriage with Mr. Gower, whose inventions in connection with the telephone have made his name universally known. Shortly after the marriage Mr. Gower went on an aeronautic expedition, from which he never returned, and the widest sympathy was felt and expressed for the young widow thus thrown upon her own resources.

By the French law of testamentary disposition, in the absence of legal proof of death the widow was compelled to wait until seven years elapsed before she could enjoy the share of her husband's property to which she was entitled. This period has only recently been fulfilled, and Madame Nordica is, it is understood, at length in possession of a fortune other than that of her own making.

When all moral doubt of the sad fate of her husband was set at rest, Madame Nordica, with a courage which commanded admiration as well as sympathy, resumed her public career in 1887, when she made her first appearance on the operatic stage in London under the direction of Mr. Mapleson.

The following year she was engaged by Mr. Augustus Harris, and she has continued in his Italian Opera Company each season. The beauty of her voice, the charm of her singing, the attraction of her personal appearance and the nameless numberless qualities which have endeared her to the public, are only a few of the many graces which she possesses as a woman and as an artist. In the concert-room, as upon the stage, she has won a high position by the sweetness and freshness of her voice, and she possesses all the needful requirements to be successful as an oratorio singer as she has been in opera.

SENTINEL, Fitchburg, Mass.

Date ....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, of which F. R. Comee, formerly of this city, is assistant manager, starts from Boston, Jan. 10, on its January trip. During next week the orchestra will give concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

This orchestra, under Conductor Arthur Nikisch, is winning golden compliments on their trips to the large cities. Below we give a few of the press notices received in the cities above named the first week in November:

"Among the three or four foremost orchestras of the world."—[N. Y. World.

"The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water."—[Sun.

"The finest body of strings ever heard in this country."—[Herald.

"Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble."—[Recorder.

"As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior, perhaps no equal."—[Evening Post.

"In the foreground of renown in America."—[Philadelphia Press.

"A prospect of the most brilliant season in its history."—[Inquirer.

"The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."—[Record.

"The rival of any force of the kind in the world."—[Brooklyn Eagle.

"Enthusiastically received by the whole audience."—[Baltimore American.

[illegible] PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ....

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to the Academy of Music next Monday evening to give the third concert in its present series. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch has made a programme presenting only the modern composers. The concert will open with the clever overture to Lalo's striking opera "Le Roi D'Ys" and will close with Goldmark's remarkable and brilliant colored "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. The solo numbers will be especially notable. The instrumental soloist will be the accomplished 'cellist, Mr. Schroeder. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is already very favorably known here, will contribute two numbers, one of which will be Liszt's "Mignon," with orchestra. The sale of seats is being held at 1119 Chestnut Street, and a brilliant audience is already assured.

[illegible], Pa

—The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC on Monday evening next will include a performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The brilliant overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi D'Ys," will also be given. The soloists will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano One of Mrs. Nikisch's songs will be Liszt's "Mignon," with orchestral accompaniment.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

BANGOR,
. . OPERA HOUSE . . Tuesday Evening, January 19,
AT EIGHT.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1892.

Music Hall has rung with the harmonies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the past week, the stated concert of Saturday last being followed by the first of the 'Young People's Populars' on Wednesday afternoon. At the former, Goldmark's 'Prometheus' overture—in which, however, one recognizes little of Eschylus and misses much of Goldmark's individuality—was played with brilliancy; the familiar and pleasing Symphony is D major, by Brahms, and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' were given a sympathetic treatment; and a movement from a concerto for violin and viola by Mozart was presented for the first time. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kniesel played the solo parts, introducing a tremendous cadenza with which Hellemsberger has sought to embellish the work. At the concert this evening, there will be given Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's 'Manfred' music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

At the Wednesday concert there was a liberal variety—popular, perhaps, because all by modern composers and therefore distinguished from the technically classical—bnt not all of equally pleasing character. The Tschaikowsky concerto, in which Miss Aus der Ohe played with her accustomed excellence of technique and lack of what we call 'soul' for want of a better word, hardly escaped tediousness. But there was lightness and grace in the strictly orchestral selections, and Miss Powell played Saint Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccioso' deliciously.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet, in Union Hall, Monday evening, was made up of novelties both interesting and pleasing, which were played with the spotless excellence that marks every performance of this marvellous instrumental combination. The Quartet has the assistance of Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz in playing an octet for strings by Svenson. The fourth concert of this notable series will be given Jan. 25, with Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Leisler as pianist.

Brooklyn
Eagle 1/10

Arthur Nikisch and his splendid orchestra have begun a series of afternoon concerts in Boston for young people, similar to those given by Theodore Thomas at Steinway hall a few years ago. His first programme, played last Wednesday, embraced Littolff's "King Lear" overture, Tschaikowsky's piano concerto, Saint-Saens' rondo caprice for violin, Massenet's ballet music from "The Cid," and three American pieces played for the first time: Reginald De Koven's "Dance and March of Gnomes," Frank Van Der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" and Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene."

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital of song and piano music at Chickering hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 20th instant. On this occasion the Russian lad, Alexander Fiedemann, who was brought here to be educated by Mr. Brodsky, will make his debut.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa
1-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE PROGRAMME of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a pleasing and refined artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully. The accompaniment to Liszt's "Mignon" will be played by the full orchestra.

[illegible], JANUARY [illegible], 1892.

Music Hall. Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Schumann: Music to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115.

Mr. George Riddle, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and a chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

Few things are pleasanter to the sincere music lover than to see a vast audience assembled for a really high and noble artistic purpose. Last Saturday evening the Music Hall was filled to overflowing by an audience that had come evidently to hear a worthy performance of a great work by Schumann; it was not attracted by the name of any world-famous performer, but by the programme itself. This was as it should be. And the reward was not wanting, for few concerts we can remember have been more noteworthy at once for splendor of subject-matter and triumphant performance.

The way in which the first movement of the Schubert Symphony was played can only be called superb. The playing did full justice to the romantic spirit of the music, without for a moment violating that classic symmetry and regularity of formal beauty which Schubert and the great composers of his day prized so highly. In the mere matter of tempo it was masterly; Mr. Nikisch's beat was ever sensitive to the emotional character of the phrase immediately in hand, now hurrying, now retarding a little, but ever and anon returning to the regular, typical rhythmic swing of the movement. Here was, in one sense, the ne plus ultra of musical performance: a sensitive, elastic, but, as a whole, regular tempo. And note especially what it was that made it fine: its variety, its occasional departures from metronomic exactness, never seemed premeditated, but actuated solely by a spontaneous, sensitive response to the immediate demands of the music: what did seem premeditated was its constant return to regularity, its adhering in the main to a definite plan. Of the second movement we care less to speak; not that the performance was less fine, for it was admirable, but that the movement itself is in every way inferior to the first.

The main business of the evening, however, was the "Manfred;" that was the magnum opus. Let us say, to begin with, that we were particularly glad to see no attempt made at anything like scenic effect in the arrangement of the singing forces. The solo-singers (spirits and apparitions) were simply drawn up in a line at the front of the stage on one side of Mr. Nikisch, while Mr. Riddle stood at his reader's desk, on the other. It has always been our opinion that, when a dramatic composition is given off the stage, as concert-music, it ought to be given purely, simply and strictly as concert-music: that no attempt should be made to appeal to the imagination, or assist the imagination, through the eye. Such an attempt is sure to be foiled by its necessary incompleteness. When a singer stands up in ordinary concert fashion, your attention is riveted upon what he is singing; but when he sings at the back of the stage, in order to give a suggestion of an apparition from the spirit world, singing from a distance, you are at once reminded of the very unspiritual aspect of his evening suit and white tie. A dramatic work, given as concert-music, must needs suffer some loss; let then this loss be compensated for by the better grouping of the singers for purely musical effect which belongs to the concert stage.

The wonderful overture to "Manfred" was wonderfully played; it was one of the finest performances that we have ever heard from our orchestra. It was a complete revelation of all the tragic depth and beauty of the music. The lovely Entr'acte, on the other hand, seemed to us to go a little heavily. The greatest thing in the whole work, however (always excepting the overture), is the melodrama music that accompanies Manfred's apostrophe to Astarte. We know of nothing in all music that attains to a higher poetic level, or gives greater poignancy of expression to such a depth of tragic emotion; it is almost too much to bear, but its finest artistic merit is that it never absolutely reaches the unbearable point. And how admirably Mr. Riddle read the passage! His reading throughout was excellent, but here he rose to a well nigh incomparable beauty of expressiveness. The solo-singers and chorus did grandly. There must have been many persons in the audience who felt, as they left the hall, that the concert was to be reckoned among the profoundest and most elevating artistic experiences of their lives.

The next programme (Jan. 23) is a Wagner, "Eine Faust-Ouverture;" Chopin, concerto No. 2, in F minor, op. 21; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 12, 1892.

IN THE QUAKER CITY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Give Their Third Concert This Season.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Jan 11.—The third of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in the Academy of Music tonight, before an audience which completely filled the edifice, and was larger and more demonstrative than ever before.

The programme was a most interesting one, and was enhanced by the soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The programme was as follows:

Lalo .... Overture, Le Roi d'Ys
Liszt .... Song, Mignon
Wagner .... Prelude to Parsifal
Soli for 'cello.
a Tartini .... Adagio
b Schubert .... Moment Musical
c Cossmann .... Tarentelle
Songs with Piano.
a Bungert .... Amore e Luce
b Richard Strauss .... Staendchen
c Schumann .... Fruehlingsnacht
Goldmark ..... Symphony, Rustic Wedding Op. 26
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale, Allegretto molto.

The orchestra leaves for New York tomorrow morning.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. [illegible]

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts.)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones' This overture, "Promethus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon the band with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture. "King Lear" .... Littolff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23 .... Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat. Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.
Miss Aus Der Ohe.
a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" .... Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore .... F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene .... Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin .... Saint Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet Music. "Le Cid" .... Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Littolff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" [illegible] Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" [illegible] F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "[illegible] d'Amore" and most exquisitely played [illegible] Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's [illegible]

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightful [illegible] picture of the sights and sounds of [illegible] time, and made even more enjoyable [illegible] fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was [illegible] dered, as was also the "Danse et [illegible] Gnomes," and the fascinating [illegible] from "Le Cid" by Massenet which [illegible] programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell [illegible] ly appreciated, the former [illegible] applause in the "Concerto" [illegible] the latter equally welcome in [illegible] riccioso" by Saint-Saens. [illegible] peatedly recalled to bow their [illegible] ments.

These popular concerts [illegible] the appreciation they are [illegible] not come too often.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

BANGOR,
. . OPERA HOUSE . . Tuesday Evening, January 19,
AT EIGHT.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1892.

Music Hall has rung with the harmonies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the past week, the stated concert of Saturday last being followed by the first of the 'Young People's Populars' on Wednesday afternoon. At the former, Goldmark's 'Prometheus' overture—in which, however, one recognizes little of Eschylus and misses much of Goldmark's individuality—was played with brilliancy; the familiar and pleasing Symphony is D major, by Brahms, and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' were given a sympathetic treatment; and a movement from a concerto for violin and viola by Mozart was presented for the first time. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kniesel played the solo parts, introducing a tremendous cadenza with which Hellemsberger has sought to embellish the work. At the concert this evening, there will be given Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's 'Manfred' music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

At the Wednesday concert there was a liberal variety—popular, perhaps, because all by modern composers and therefore distinguished from the technically classical—bnt not all of equally pleasing character. The Tschaikowsky concerto, in which Miss Aus der Ohe played with her accustomed excellence of technique and lack of what we call 'soul' for want of a better word, hardly escaped tediousness. But there was lightness and grace in the strictly orchestral selections, and Miss Powell played Saint Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccioso' deliciously.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet, in Union Hall, Monday evening, was made up of novelties both interesting and pleasing, which were played with the spotless excellence that marks every performance of this marvellous instrumental combination. The Quartet has the assistance of Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and Schulz in playing an octet for strings by Svenson. The fourth concert of this notable series will be given Jan. 25, with Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Leisler as pianist.

Arthur Nikisch and his splendid orchestra have begun a series of afternoon concerts in Boston for young people, similar to those given by Theodore Thomas at Steinway hall a few years ago. His first programme, played last Wednesday, embraced Littolff's "King Lear" overture, Tschaikowsky's piano concerto, Saint-Saens' rondo caprice for violin, Massenet's ballet music from "The Cid," and three American pieces played for the first time: Reginald De Koven's "Dance and March of Gnomes." Frank Van Der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" and Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene."

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital of song and piano music at Chickering hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 20th instant. On this occasion the Russian lad, Alexander Fiedemann, who was brought here to be educated by Mr. Brodsky, will make his debut.

1-16

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE PROGRAMME of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a pleasing and refined artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully. The accompaniment to Liszt's "Mignon" will be played by the full orchestra.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Schumann: Music to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115.
Mr. George Riddle, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and a chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

Few things are pleasanter to the sincere music lover than to see a vast audience assembled for a really high and noble artistic purpose. Last Saturday evening the Music Hall was filled to overflowing by an audience that had come evidently to hear a worthy performance of a great work by Schrumann; it was not attracted by the name of any world-famous performer, but by the programme itself. This was as it should be. And the reward was not wanting, for few concerts we can remember have been more noteworthy at once for splendor of subject-matter and triumphant performance.

The way in which the first movement of the Schubert Symphony was played can only be called superb. The playing did full justice to the romantic spirit of the music, without for a moment violating that classic symmetry and regularity of formal beauty which Schubert and the great composers of his day prized so highly. In the mere matter of tempo it was masterly; Mr. Nikisch's beat was ever sensitive to the emotional character of the phrase immediately in hand, now hurrying, now retarding a little, but ever and anon returning to the regular, typical rhythmic swing of the movement. Here was, in one sense, the ne plus ultra of musical performance: a sensitive, elastic, but, as a whole, regular tempo. And note especially what it was that made it fine: its variety, its occasional departures from metronomic exactness, never seemed premeditated, but actuated solely by a spontaneous, sensitive response to the immediate demands of the music; what did seem premeditated was its constant return to regularity, its adhering in the main to a definite plan. Of the second movement we care less to speak; not that the performance was less fine, for it was admirable, but that the movement itself is in every way inferior to the first.

The main business of the evening, however, was the "Manfred;" that was the magnum opus. Let us say, to begin with, that we were particularly glad to see no attempt made at anything like scenic effect in the arrangement of the singing forces. The solo-singers (spirits and apparitions) were simply drawn up in a line at the front of the stage on one side of Mr. Nikisch, while Mr. Riddle stood at his reader's desk, on the other. It has always been our opinion that, when a dramatic composition is given off the stage, as concert-music, it ought to be given purely, simply and strictly as concert-music: that no attempt should be made to appeal to the imagination, or assist the imagination, through the eye. Such an attempt is sure to be foiled by its necessary incompleteness. When a singer stands up in ordinary concert fashion, your attention is riveted upon what he is singing; but when he sings at the back of the stage, in order to give a suggestion of an apparition from the spirit world, singing from a distance, you are at once reminded of the very unspiritual aspect of his evening suit and white tie. A dramatic work, given as concert-music, must needs suffer some loss; let then this loss be compensated for by the better grouping of the singers for purely musical effect which belongs to the concert stage.

The wonderful overture to "Manfred" was wonderfully played; it was one of the finest performances that we have ever heard from our orchestra. It was a complete revelation of all the tragic depth and beauty of the music. The lovely Entr'acte, on the other hand, seemed to us to go a little heavily. The greatest thing in the whole work, however (always excepting the overture), is the melodrama music that accompanies Manfred's apostrophe to Astarte. We know of nothing in all music that attains to a higher poetic level, or gives greater poignancy of expression to such a depth of tragic emotion; it is almost too much to bear, but its finest artistic merit is that it never absolutely reaches the unbearable point. And how admirably Mr. Riddle read the passage! His reading throughout was excellent, but here he rose to a well nigh incomparable beauty of expressiveness. The solo-singers and chorus did grandly. There must have been many persons in the audience who felt, as they left the hall, that the concert was to be reckoned among the profoundest and most elevating artistic experiences of their lives.

The next programme (Jan. 23) is a Wagner, "Eine Faust-Ouverture;" Chopin, concerto No. 2, in F minor, op. 21; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 12, 1892.

IN THE QUAKER CITY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Give Their Third Concert This Season.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Jan 11.—The third of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in the Academy of Music tonight, before an audience which completely filled the edifice, and was larger and more demonstrative than ever before.

The programme was a most interesting one, and was enhanced by the soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The programme was as follows:

Lalo .... Overture, Le Roi d'Ys
Liszt .... Song, Mignon
Wagner .... Prelude to Parsifal
Soli for 'cello.
a Tartini .... Adagio
b Schubert .... Moment Musical
c Cossmann .... Tarentelle
Songs with Piano.
a Bungert .... Amore e Luce
b Richard Strauss .... Staendchen
c Schumann .... Fruehlingsnacht
Goldmark .... Symphony, Rustic Wedding Op. 26
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale, Allegretto molto.

The orchestra leaves for New York tomorrow morning.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts.)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones' This overture, "Promethus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon the band with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture. "King Lear" .... Littolff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23 .... Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat. Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.
Miss Aus Der Ohe.
a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" .... Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore .... F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene .... Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin .... Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet Music. "Le Cid" .... Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Littolff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" by Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "Pagina d'Amore" and most exquisitely played on Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's band.

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightfully jolly picture of the sights and sounds of carnival time, and made even more enjoyable by the fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was finely rendered, as was also the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," and the fascinating ballet music from "Le Cid" by Massenet which ended the programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell were highly appreciated, the former winning great applause in the "Concerto" by Tschaikowsky, the latter equally welcome in the "Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saens. Both artists were repeatedly recalled to bow their acknowledgments.

These popular concerts in every way deserve the appreciation they are receiving and cannot come too often.

OPERA HOUSE,

BANGOR,

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 19, AT 8.

Grand Operatic Concert,

Only appearance of the renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Accompanied by the following Artists:

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI,
The famous Tenor.

MR. ZOLTAN DÖME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
The gifted and favorite Pianist.

MISS MAUD POWELL,
The distinguished Violiniste.

Tickets with Reserved Seats, 75c. and $1.00,

ACCORDING TO LOCATION.

Sale of seats and boxes opens at the box office, Friday, January 15.

MADAME NORDICA.

The brilliant career of this great artist is too well known to require extended notice.

Successful alike on the operatic and concert stage, since her first appearance in England the demand for her services has been so constant on the other side of the Atlantic that she has been heard but little in her native land.

During her present tour, which closes on February 1, she has more than justified the expectations raised by her foreign successes. After her engagement at the Worcester Festival, she appeared in the principal cities with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was honored in being chosen as soloist for the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston. More recently she distinguished herself by assuming the difficult role of Valentine, in the "Huguenots," at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, supplying at a day's notice the place of Mme. Albani, and with such success that she was immediately engaged for further appearances. Mme. Nordica already ranks with the world's great artists, and this opportunity of hearing her cannot fail to be appreciated by every lover of music.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1892.

Music Hall has rung with the harmonies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the past week, the [illegible] concert of Saturday last being followed by the [illegible] of the 'Young People's Populars' on Wednesday afternoon. At the former, Goldmark's 'Prometheus' overture—in which, however, one recognizes little of Eschylus and misses much of Goldmark's individuality—was played with brilliancy; the familiar and pleasing Symphony is D major, by Brahms, and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' were given a sympathetic treatment; and a movement from a concerto for violin and viola by Mozart was presented for the first time. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel played the solo parts, introducing a tremendous cadenza with which Hellemsberger has sought to embellish the work. At the concert this evening, there will be [illegible] Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's 'Manfred' music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

At the Wednesday concert there was a liberal variety [illegible], perhaps, because all by modern composers and therefore distinguished from the technically classical—but not all of equally pleasing character. The Tschaikowsky concerto, in which Miss Aus der Ohe played with her accustomed excellence of technique and lack of what we call 'soul' for want of a better word, hardly [illegible] tediousness. But there was lightness and grace in the strictly orchestral selections, and Miss Powell [illegible] Saint Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccioso' deliciously.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet, in Union [illegible] Monday evening, was made up of novelties both [illegible] and pleasing, which were played with the [illegible] excellence that marks every performance of this [illegible] instrumental combination. The Quartet has the assistance of Messrs. Loeffler, Krafft, Novacek and [illegible] playing an octet for strings by Svenson. The fourth concert of this notable series will be given Jan. 25, with Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Leisler as pianist.

Brooklyn
Eagle 1/10

Arthur Nikisch and his splendid orchestra have begun a series of afternoon concerts in Boston for young people, similar to those given by Theodore Thomas at Steinway hall a few years ago. His first programme, played last Wednesday, embraced Littolff's "King Lear" overture, Tschaikowsky's piano concerto, Saint-Saens' rondo caprice for violin, Massenet's ballet music from "The Cid," and three American pieces played for the first time: Reginald De Koven's "Dance and March of Gnomes." Frank Van Der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" and Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene."

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital of song and piano music at Chickering hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 20th instant. On this occasion the Russian lad, Alexander Fiedemann, who was brought here to be educated by Mr. Brodsky, will make his debut.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa
1-16

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE PROGRAMME of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"	Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon"	Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal"	Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio	Tartini
b Moment Musicale	Schubert
c Tarentelle	Cossmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade	R. Strauss
b Nussbaum	Schumann
c "Des Liebsten Schwur"	Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding"	Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a pleasing and refined artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully. The accompaniment to Liszt's "Mignon" will be played by the full orchestra.

Music Ha
The programme of in the Music Hall las Schubert: Unfinished
Schumann: Music to
Mr. George Riddle, M
L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhe
Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. L
Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent
the Cecilia assisted.
Few things are pleas sic lover than to see a for a really high and Last Saturday evenin filled to overflowing b come evidently to he of a great work by Sch tracted by the name o former, but by the pro as it should be. And t ing, for few concerts been more noteworth subject-matter and tri
The way in which th
Schubert Symphony called superb. The pla the romantic spirit of t moment violating tha regularity of formal and the great compos highly. In the mere masterly; Mr. Nikisch' to the emotional chara diately in hand, now h little, but ever and anon typical rhythmic swing was, in one sense, the performance: a sensi whole, regular tempo
what it was that ma occasional departures ness, never seemed pre solely by a spontaneo
the immediate demand seem premeditated wa regularity, its adherin nite plan. Of the sec less to speak; not th less fine, for it was movement itself is in first.
The main business o was the "Manfred;" th
Let us say, to begin wit larly glad to see no atte like scenic effect in singing forces. The apparitions) were simpl
the front of the stage or while Mr. Riddle stood the other. It has alwa when a dramatic co
the stage, as concert given purely, simp concert-music: that made to appeal to assist the imagination an attempt is sure to incompletness. When ordinary concert fash riveted upon what he sings at the back of t a suggestion of an ap world, singing from a reminded of the very evening suit and white given as concert-music loss; let then this los the better grouping musical effect which stage.
The wonderful over wonderfully played;
performances that w our orchestra. It was all the tragic depth
The lovely Entr'acte, o to us to go a little heav
in the whole work, ho the overture), is the accompanies Manfred
We know of nothing in a higher poetic level, o of expression to such a it is almost too finest artistic meri absolutely reaches the how admirably Mr. Ri
His reading throughou
he rose to a well nigh expressiveness. The so grandly. There must in the audience who fe that the concert was to profoundest and most ences of their lives.
The next programme
"Eine Faust-Ouverture
2, in F minor, op. 21;
No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroic
A. Beach will be the pi

Boston D

TUESDAY, J

IN THE Q

Boston Symphony
Third Conce
PHILADELPHIA, Pe
of this season's conce
phony orchestra wa of Music tonight, be completely filled th and more demonstra
The programme w
one, and was enhanc
Arthur Nikisch and
The programme was Lalo.......
Liszt.......
Wagner.......
Soli f
a Tartini....... b Schubert....... c Cossmann.......
Songs w a Bungert....... b Richard Strauss....... c Schumann.......
Goldmark.......Symph Wedding March, with Bridal Song—Allegre
In the Garden—And Dance—Finale, Allegr
The orchestra
tomorrow morning.

[96]

[illegible] "Mignon" .... Liszt
[illegible] .... Wagner
[illegible] cello:
[illegible] .... Tartini
[illegible] .... Schubert
[illegible] .... Cassmann
[illegible] Piano:
[illegible] .... R. Strauss
[illegible] .... Schumann
[illegible] Schwur" .... Brahms
[illegible] "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

[illegible] can say that this arrangement is [illegible] The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, [illegible] and Mrs. Arthur Nickisch, whose [illegible] no doubt, remains a pleasant [illegible] of those who heard it. She is [illegible] artist, and her husband, Conductor [illegible] plays her accompaniments delightfully.

Providence
Journal 1/10

At last night's Symphony concert in [illegible] Schubert's unfinished symphony, [illegible] followed by a reading of "Manfred," by [illegible] Riddle, with Schumann's music, [illegible] by a competent list of soloists and [illegible] from the Cecilia, with the orchestra, all under the direction of Mr. [illegible]. It is rather a peculiar combination for a Symphony concert, but novelty [illegible] the thing sought after, apparently by [illegible] of organizations.

[illegible] Lillian Nordica will close her tour [illegible] country at the Music Hall, Boston, on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia [illegible], Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, baritone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-10

The Third Concert of the Season by the Boston Orchestra.

Few announcements give such pleasure in this community, especially to music lovers, as those of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third of these attractive entertainments for this season will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. In making up this programme, which is exceedingly interesting, Mr. Nikisch has selected representative numbers from the works of four of the greatest of modern composers. The solo numbers will be rendered by Mrs. Nikisch and Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Nikisch will receive a hearty welcome from those who remember her artistic work in previous seasons. Mr. Schroeder is the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, and he will be heard as soloist for the first time in this city. The programme in full is as follows:—

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello ....
Songs with piano ....
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" ... Goldmark

The Adamowski Quartet.

At Hazeltines' Galleries to-morrow afternoon will occur the third subscription concert of the Adamowski Quartet Club, the programme to be as follows: Quartet in D major No. 21, Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Die Meerfrau, J. Hoffman; (b) Der Nussbaum, Schumann; (c) Standchen, Schubert; spinning song, for string quartet, Hollander; songs with piano; (a) Nachtlied, Heitsch; (b) Princess, Hinrichs Des Liebsten Schwur, Brahms; quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38, Rheinberger. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch. At the fourth concert, February 9, the soloist will be Mrs. Julie L. Wyman.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, when the programme will include the pretty and picturesque "Country Wedding" symphony, the "Parsifal" Vorspiel, Lulo's overture "Le Roy d' Yo" and solos for voice and for violoncello. The soloists will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who will sing some songs with piano forte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, and Mr. Alvin Schroeder, a 'cello player of high distinction. Mrs. Nikisch will also sing Liszt's famous "Mignon" song with the orchestra.

Clipping No.

Clipping from .... Telegraph
Philadelphia Pa

Date 1-9

[illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] to take place at the Academy of [illegible] next Monday evening is as follows: [illegible] Le Roi D'ys, Lalo; Song with Orchestra, Mignon, Liszt; Prelude, Parsifal, [illegible] Soli for Violoncello; Songs with [illegible] Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. [illegible] can say that this arrangement [illegible]. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin [illegible] the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur [illegible]

Date 1-

[illegible] received Evangeline, and [illegible] and to sing the favorite song seven times.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Monday evening Mrs. Nikisch will sing with orchestra Liszt's song Mignon, and songs by Strauss, Schumann and Brahms, with pianoforte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, who is an admirable accompanist.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-11

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will be at the piano, and they will have the assistance of Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought here, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-10

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will be at the piano, and they will have the assistance in carrying out their programme of Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 1/10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] give such pleasure in this community, especially among music-lovers, as those of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first concert given last month served to awaken the memories of the brilliant occasions of former seasons and to create anticipations for the future which will find their earliest realization in the second concert to be given on Wednesday evening next at the Congregational Church. Mr. Nikisch has chosen a sterling and varied programme drawn from the works of both the earlier and later composers. The opening symphony reveals the brilliant tone-colorist, Goldmark, in one of his happiest moods. Though not following the strict form of such compositions, his "Rustic Wedding" symphony is full of characteristic effects produced by scholarly means yet full of individual genius. Bach's famous suite consisting of prelude, adagio, and gavotte, gives an opportunity to witness the percision and tone of the strings of the orchestra led by Mr. Kneisel. Lovers of Wagner are to be charmed with the prelude to "Parsifal." The closing number will be von Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. This wealth of orchestral music is to be supplemented by solo numbers, in which Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will contribute two numbers, the first, Liszt's "Mignon," and the second a brace of songs. It should not be forgotton, first, that the size of the Congregational Church is limited, and second, that there has been a lage subscription sale for the series. Putting these facts together, the certainty of a large audience and the necessity of prompt application at Ellis' for the remaining seats become evident.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-11

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy To-night.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music this evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nickisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet will give the third in its current season of chamber concerts at the Hazeltine Galleries to-day at 2.30 P. M., when the following programme will be rendered:

Quartet in D major No 21 .... Mozart
Songs with piano.
(a) Die Meefrau .... J. Hoffman
(b) Der Nussbaum .... Schumann
(c) Standchen .... Schubert
Spinning song, for string quartet .... Hollander
Songs with piano.
(a) Nachtlied .... Heitsch
(b) Princess .... Hinrichs
Des Liebsten Schwur .... Brahms
Quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38 .... Rheinberger

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist and Mr. Nikisch, besides playing her accompaniments, will lead in the piano quartet. This is the concert originally announced for to-morrow.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

. . MUSIC HALL . .

LEWISTON,
Thursday Evening, January 21,
AT EIGHT.

Clipping from ....
Advertiser, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/11

The concert of the Boston Symphomy Orchestra to-morrow night in Chickering Hall promises to be an extremely interesting one. The programme embraces the overture to "Freischuetz," Macdowell's suite in A minor, which created a furor in Boston when it was played there some weeks ago; Tschaikowsky's "Fantaizie de Concert," for piano and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-11

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Philharmonic Society have about completed arrangements for the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Academy of Music. The soloist for these occasions will be Miss Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. Arthur Nikish will be the conductor as usual.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-13

MUSICAL WORLD.

The Nordica Concert.

A singer whose reputation in both oratorio, opera and concert is equally as great, is hard to find. In Mme. Lillian Nordica, however, these three are combined, and London, New York and Boston alike testify to her great work and sterling qualities as a musician. By birth and education a New England girl, known to many in this section, and a classmate even, of several of our citizens. She is an artiste the musical world is justly proud of, and a fashionable and intelligent audience will undoubtedly greet her at Music Hall next Thursday. The star will be assisted by Companini, the great tenor; Zoltan Dome, a baritone from Covent Garden, London, and that magnificent pianist Adele aus der Ohe, whose playing when here several years ago with the Emma Juch Company aroused such great enthusiasm. The enterprise of the Y. M. C. A. in securing such a grand company should be rewarded by a crowded [illegible]

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Concert That Was a Delight to Thousands Present.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Chickering Hall in a concert which, for dignity and beauty, has never been surpassed in the history of this excellent organization. Mr. Nikosch is a conductor whose work exemplifies the story of the iron hand in the velvet glove. His handling is of the lightest and most graceful, but under it all it is evident that he has his orchestra in the most absolute control and discipline. The accuracy and smoothness of the work is marvelous, the strings being particularly brilliant and forceful. The programme tested the capabilities of the orchestra in every way, and there were really no weak spots.

The Freischuetz overture was excellently rendered, though without any particular brilliancy. This was all reserved for the McDowell suite in A minor, which was given with a nerve and power that reflected great credit on the musicians. The inevitable Tschaikowsky selection served to introduce Mme. Rive-King, whose brilliant, vivid playing seemed, if anything, more in keeping with the Russian composer's ideas than ever before.

The Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony was as delicately and appreciatively rendered as it deserved. The bridal song in particular was a most artistic piece of work. The next concert will be given Tuesday, February 9.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-9

The programme of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music next Monday evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... La
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nickisch, whose singing last season, no doubt, remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

Providence Journal 1/10

At last night's Symphony concert in Boston, Schubert's unfinished symphony, was followed by a reading of "Manfred," by George Riddle, with Schumann's music, sung by a competent list of soloists and a chorus from the Cecilia, with the orchestra, all under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. It is rather a peculiar combination for a Symphony concert, but novelty is the thing sought after, apparently by the best of organizations.

Miss Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at the Music Hall, Boston, on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, when a concert will be given by her, Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. Italo Campanini, Mr. Z. Dome, baritone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-10

The Third Concert of the Season by the Boston Orchestra.

Few announcements give such pleasure in this community, especially to music lovers, as those of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third of these attractive entertainments for this season will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. In making up this programme, which is exceedingly interesting, Mr. Nikisch has selected representative numbers from the works of four of the greatest of modern composers. The solo numbers will be rendered by Mrs. Nikisch and Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Nikisch will receive a hearty welcome from those who remember her artistic work in previous seasons. Mr. Schroeder is the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, and he will be heard as soloist for the first time in this city. The programme in full is as follows:—

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello ....
Songs with piano ....
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" ... Goldmark

The Adamowski Quartet.

At Hazeltines' Galleries to-morrow afternoon will occur the third subscription concert of the Adamowski Quartet Club, the programme to be as follows: Quartet in D major No. 21, Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Die Meerfrau, J. Hoffman; (b) Der Nussbaum, Schumann; (c) Standchen, Schubert; spinning song, for string quartet, Hollander; songs with piano; (a) Nachtlied, Heitsch; (b) Princess, Hinrichs Des Liedstein Schwur, Brahms; quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38, Rheinberger.

The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch. At the fourth concert, February 9, the soloist will be Mrs. Julie L. Wyman.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, when the programme will include the pretty and picturesque "Country Wedding" symphony, the "Parsifal" Vorspiel, Lulo's overture "Le Roy d' Yo" and solos for voice and for violoncello. The soloists will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who will sing some songs with piano forte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, and Mr. Alvin Schroeder, a 'cello player of high distinction. Mrs. Nikisch will also sing Liszt's famous "Mignon" song with the orchestra.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Eve. Telegraph Philadelphia Pa

Date 1-9

[illegible] Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music next Monday evening is as follows: Overture, Le Roi D'ys, Lalo; Song with Orchestra, Mignen, Liszt; Prelude, Parsifal, Wagner; Soli for Violoncello; Songs with Piano; Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. No one can say that this arraugement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, a charming singer.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-9

Evange and and to sing the favorite song seven times.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Monday evening Mrs. Nikisch will sing with orchestra Liszt's song Mignon, and songs by Strauss, Schumann and Brahms, with pianoforte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, who is an admirable accompanist.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-11

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will be at the piano, and they will have the assistance of Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought here, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-10

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will be at the piano, and they will have the assistance in carrying out their programme of Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 1/10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] give such pleasure in this community, especially among music-lovers, as those of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first concert given last month served to awaken the memories of the brilliant occasions of former seasons and to create anticipations for the future which will find their earliest realization in the second concert to be given on Wednesday evening next at the Congregational Church. Mr. Nikisch has chosen a sterling and varied programme drawn from the works of both the earlier and later composers. The opening symphony reveals the brilliant tone-colorist, Goldmark. in one of his happiest moods. Though not following the strict form of such compositions, his "Rustic Wedding" symphony is full of characteristic effects produced by scholarly means yet full of individual genius. Bach's famous suite consisting of prelude, adagio, and gavotte, gives an opportunity to witness the percision and tone of the strings of the orchestra led by Mr. Kneisel. Lovers of Wagner are to be charmed with the prelude to "Parsifal." The closing number will be von Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. This wealth of orchestral music is to be supplemented by solo numbers, in which Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will contribute two numbers, the first, Liszt's "Mignon," and the second a brace of songs. It should not be forgotton, first, that the size of the Congregational Church is limited, and second, that there has been a lage subscription sale for the series. Putting these facts together, the certainty of a large audience and the [illegible] of prompt application at Ellis' for the remaining seats become evident.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-11

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy To-night.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music this evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nickisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet will give the third in its current season of chamber concerts at the Hazeltine Galleries to-day at 2.30 P. M., when the following programme will be rendered:

Quartet in D major No 21 .... Mozart
Songs with piano.
(a) Die Meefrau .... J. Hoffman
(b) Der Nussbaum .... Schumann
(c) Standchen .... Schubert
Spinning song, for string quartet .... Hollander
Songs with piano.
(a) Nachtlied .... Heitsch
(b) Princess .... Hinrichs
Des Liebsten Schwur .... Brahms
Quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38 .... Rheinberger

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist and Mr. Nikisch, besides playing her accompaniments, will lead in the piano quartet. This is the concert originally announced for to-morrow.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . .
Season of 1891-92.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

. . MUSIC HALL . .

LEWISTON,
Thursday Evening, January 21,
AT EIGHT.

---

ipping from

ate 1/11

The concert of the Boston Symphomy Orchestra to-morrow night in Chickering Hall promises to be an extremely interesting one. The programme embraces the overturo to "Freischuetz," Macdowell's suite in A minor, which created a furor in Boston when it was played there some weeks ago; Tschaikowsky's "Fantaizie de Concert," for piano and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-11

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Philharmonic Society have about completed arrangements for the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Academy of Music. The soloist for these occasions will be Miss Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. Arthur Nikisa will be the conductor as usual.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-13

MUSICAL WORLD.

The Nordica Concert.

A singer whose reputation in both oratorio, opera and concert is equally as great, is hard to find. In Mme. Lillian Nordica, however, these three are combined. and London, New York and Boston alike testify to her great work and sterling qualities as a musician. By birth and education a New England girl, known to many in this section, and a classmate even, of several of our citizens. She is an artiste the musical world is justly proud of, and a fashionable and intelligent audience will undoubtedly greet her at Music Hall next Thursday. The star will be assisted by Companini, the great tenor; Zoltan Dome, a baritone from Covent Garden, London, and that magnificent pianist Adele aus der Ohe, whose playing when here several years ago with the Emma Juch Company aroused such great enthusiasm. The enterprise of the Y. M. C. A. in securing such a grand company should be rewarded by a crowded

---

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Concert That Was a Delight to Thousands Present.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Chickering Hall in a concert which, for dignity and beauty, has never been surpassed in the history of this excellent organization. Mr. Nikosch is a conductor whose work exemplifies the story of the iron hand in the velvet glove. His handling is of the lightest and most graceful, but under it all it is evident that he has his orchestra in the most absolute control and discipline. The accuracy and smoothness of the work is marvelous, the strings being particularly brilliant and forceful. The programme tested the capabilities of the orchestra in every way, and there were really no weak spots.

The Freischuetz overture was excellently rendered, though without any particular brilliancy. This was all reserved for the McDowell suite in A minor, which was given with a nerve and power that reflected great credit on the musicians. The inevitable Tschaikowsky selection served to introduce Mme. Rive-King, whose brilliant, vivid playing seemed, if anything, more in keeping with the Russian composer's ideas than ever before.

The Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony was as delicately and appreciatively rendered as it deserved. The bridal song in particular was a most artistic piece of work. The next concert will be given Tuesday, February 9.

MUSIC HALL,

LEWISTON,

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 21, AT 8.

UNDER AUSPICES OF Y. M. C. A.

Grand Operatic Concert,

Only appearance of the renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Accompanied by the following Artists:

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI,
The greatest living Tenor.

MR. ZOLTAN DÖME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.

MR. LEON KEACH,
Accompanist,

AND

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
The gifted and favorite Pianist.

Tickets with Reserved Seats, 75c. and $1.00,

ACCORDING TO LOCATION.

Sale of seats and boxes opens at the box office, Tuesdav, January 19, at 9 A.M.

MADAME NORDICA.

The brilliant career of this great artist) a native of Farmington, Maine) is too well known to require extended notice.

Successful alike on the operatic and concert stage, since her first appearance in England the demand for her services has been so constant on the other side of the Atlantic that she has been heard but little in her native land.

During her present tour, which closes on February 1, she has more than justified the expectations raised by her foreign successes. After her engagement at the Worcester Festival, she appeared in the principal cities with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was honored in being chosen as soloist for the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston. More recently she distinguished herself by assuming the difficult role of Valentine, in the "Huguenots," at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, supplying at a day's notice the place of Mme. Albani, and with such success that she was immediately engaged for her further appearance at what will undoubtedly be the most important event of the operatic season, it being the first appearance in America of the foremost operatic Baritone of the present day, La Salle, the eminent French artist, who will appear in "L'Africaine," together with the De Rezeke Brothers, and the strongest cast of the season. Mme. Nordica already ranks with the world's great artists, and this opportunity of hearing her cannot fail to be appreciated by every lover of music.

The Adamowski Quartet.

At Hazeltines' Galleries to-morrow afternoon will occur the third subscription concert of the Adamowski Quartet Club, the programme to be as follows: Quartet in D major No. 21, Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Die Meerfrau, J. Hoffman; (b) Der Nussbaum, Schumann; (c) Standchen, Schubert; spinning song, for string quartet, Hollander; songs with piano; (a) Nachtlied, Heitsch; (b) Princess, Hinrichs Des Liebsten Schwur, Brahms; quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38, Rheinberger. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch. At the fourth concert, February 9, the soloist will be Mrs. Julie L. Wyman.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, [illegible] its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, when the programme will include the pretty and picturesque "Country Wedding" symphony, the "Parsifal" Vorspiel, Lulo's overture "Le Roy d' Yo" and solos for voice and violoncello. The soloists will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who will sing some songs with piano forte accompaniment, to be played by her husband, and Mr. Alvin Schroeder, a 'cello player of high distinction. Mrs. Nikisch will also sing Liszt's famous "Mignon" song with the orchestra.

Clipping from Telegraph
Philadelphia Pa
Date 1-9

[illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] to take place at the Academy of Music next Monday evening is as follows: [illegible] Roi D'ys, Lalo; Song with Orchestra, [illegible] Liszt; Prelude, Parsifal, [illegible] Soli for Violoncello; Songs with [illegible] Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. [illegible] say that this arrangement [illegible] The soloists will be Mr. Alvin [illegible] violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur [illegible] singer.

---

songs. It should not be forgotton, first, that the size of the Congregational Church is limited, and second, that there has been a lage subscription sale for the series. Putting these facts together, the certainty of a large audience and the necessity of prompt application at Ellis' for the remaining seats become evident.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-11

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy To-night.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Concert to take place at the Academy of Music this evening is as follows:

Overture, "Le Roi D'ys" .... Lalo
Song with Orchestra, "Mignon" .... Liszt
Prelude, "Parsifal" .... Wagner
Soli for Violoncello:
a Adagio .... Tartini
b Moment Musicale .... Schubert
c Tarentelle .... Cassmann
Songs with Piano:
a Serenade .... R. Strauss
b Nussbaum .... Schumann
c "Des Liebesten Schwur" .... Brahms
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" .... Goldmark

At least no one can say that this arrangement is too heavy. The soloists will be Mr. Alvin Schroder, the violoncellist, and Mrs. Arthur Nickisch, whose singing last season no doubt remains a pleasant memory in the minds of those who heard it. She is a charming artist, and her husband, Conductor Nikisch, plays her accompaniments delightfully.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet will give the third in its current season of chamber concerts at the Hazeltine Galleries to-day at 2.30 P. M., when the following programme will be rendered:

Quartet in D major No 21 .... Mozart
Songs with piano.
(a) Die Meefrau .... J. Hoffman
(b) Der Nussbaum .... Schumann
(c) Standchen .... Schubert
Spinning song, for string quartet .... Hollander
Songs with piano.
(a) Nachtlied .... Heitsch
(b) Princess .... Hinrichs
Des Liebsten Schwur .... Brahms
Quartet for piano and strings, in E flat, op. 38 .... Rheinberger

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist and Mr. Nikisch, besides playing her accompaniments, will lead in the piano quartet. This is the concert originally announced for to-morrow.

Clipping from Advertiser, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/11

The concert of the Boston Symphomy Orchestra to-morrow night in Chickering Hall promises to be an extremely interesting one. The programme embraces the overture to "Freischuetz," Macdowell's suite in A minor, which created a furor in Boston when it was played there some weeks ago; Tschaikowsky's "Fantaizie de Concert," for piano and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-11

The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Philharmonic Society have about completed arrangements for the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Academy of Music. The soloist for these occasions will be Miss Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. Arthur Nikisa will be the conductor as usual.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-13

MUSICAL WORLD.

The Nordica Concert.

A singer whose reputation in both oratorio, opera and concert is equally as great, is hard to find. In Mme. Lillian Nordica, however, these three are combined. and London, New York and Boston alike testify to her great work and sterling qualities as a musician. By birth and education a New England girl, known to many in this section, and a classmate even, of several of our citizens. She is an artiste the musical world is justly proud of, and a fashionable and intelligent audience will undoubtedly greet her at Music Hall next Thursday. The star will be assisted by Companini, the great tenor; Zoltan Doine, a baritone from Covent Garden, London, and that magnificent pianist Adele aus der Ohe, whose playing when here several years ago with the Emma Juch Company aroused such

---

PRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Concert That Was a Delight to Thousands Present.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Chickering Hall in a concert which, for dignity and beauty, has never been surpassed in the history of this excellent organization. Mr. Nikosch is a conductor whose work exemplifies the story of the iron hand in the velvet glove. His handling is of the lightest and most graceful, but under it all it is evident that he has his orchestra in the most absolute control and discipline. The accuracy and smoothness of the work is marvelous, the strings being particularly brilliant and forceful. The programme tested the capabilities of the orchestra in every way, and there were really no weak spots.

The Freischuetz overture was excellently rendered, though without any particular brilliancy. This was all reserved for the McDowell suite in A minor, which was given with a nerve and power that reflected great credit on the musicians. The inevitable Tschaikowsky selection served to introduce Mme. Rive-King, whose brilliant, vivid playing seemed, if anything, more in keeping with the Russian composer's ideas than ever before.

The Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" symphony was as delicately and appreciatively rendered as it deserved. The bridal song in particular was a most artistic piece of work. The next concert will be given Tuesday, February 9.

NORTH AMERICAN. PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1892.

OF MUSICAL INTEREST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

There was a great crowd of people at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the season. It is not the fault of the orchestra that the concert was less than usually enjoyable and noteworthy. The programme was not a good one. It contained some interesting features, but it lacked the breadth, the distinction, the dignity befitting the occasion. It comprised nothing of positive intrinsic value, and one felt disappointed at not hearing so noble an orchestra more worthily employed. The overture was that by Lalo to "Le Roy d'Ys," an overwrought sentimental affair, too desultory and diffuse to be impressive, and too vague and obscure to be readily intelligible; while for symphony there was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" suite, a bright, vivid, picturesque composition, poetically conceived, skilfully scored and always interesting, but not acceptable as the "piece de resistance" in a Boston symphony concert. The other orchestral number was the prelude to "Parsifal," music which in a concert-room is heard at a disadvantage for which no beauty of performance can compensate. It was superbly played last night in a way that finely illustrated Mr. Nikisch's special faculty for the elucidation of details and for the perfect balancing of tones, and yet a little more force and passion in the climaxes would not have been amiss. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mrs. Nikisch, who is a singer of evident intelligence, with an agreeable mezzo-soprano voice and much charm of manner, was heard in Liszt's lovely song "Kannst du das Land," with its eloquent orchestral accompaniment, and in some songs with piano by Bungert, Strauss and Schumann, all of which she rendered in a sympathetic and praiseworthy way. But Mrs. Nikisch is one of those singers who are able to please but never quite succeed in satisfying. Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, really won the success of the evening with a deliciously tender playing of Schubert's "Moment Musical" in F sharp minor, and by his brilliant execution of Cossmann's "Tarantelle." He was peremptorily encored.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

There was a large and fashionable audience at the Haseltine Galleries yesterday afternoon to hear the third of the chamber concerts of the Adamowski Quartet. The programme included Mozart's bright and tuneful quartet in D major, No. 21, and Rheinberger's piano quartet in E flat, op. 38. Both were admirably played. An attractive feature of the concert was Mrs. Nikisch's singing of songs by Schumann, Schubert and others.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 12, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of those large and musical audiences that fill the Academy of Music as a matter of course when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes along attended last night's concert, the third of the season's series, and found a great deal to enjoy in it. Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, brilliant and showy, made an effective opening, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony (op. 26) was given in conclusion, while in between came as the only other orchestral number the prelude to "Parsifal."

Notwithstanding Wagner's well-known aversion to having excerpts from his large works given in concerts, there are many that are among the most welcome in that relation, but the Parsifal prelude is not one of them. In Goldmark's work the orchestra showed at its best, and this means much. In fine technical contrasts, piquant and bizarre effects, and absolute polish in displaying them, Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have not been excelled. Hence they were at home in Goldmark, who is very ingenious in his manipulation of the orchestra for the production of novel colors (some of them gaudy rather than gorgeous) and general piquancy of effect. Mr. Nikisch conducted as usual, virtually without notes, during the evening, and his men played as if by heart.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. With the orchestra she sang Liszt's "Mignon," and with piano three short songs. She missed something of the dramatic requirements of the larger song, but was quite happy in the shorter ones, especially where she laid away book and sheet music, and gave herself entirely to the "Staendchen," by Richard Strauss, and Schumann's "Fruehlings Nacht," in which she showed herself a genuine Liedersinger. It should be added that the accompaniments by her husband were charming examples of that branch of art, and a delight to listen to on their own account.

Alwin Schroeder, a 'cellist of the orchestra, played three 'cello solos (an adagio by Tartini, Schubert's "Moment Musicale," and a tarantelle by Cossmann. To a lovely tone, rich, fine and full, Mr. Schroeder adds a technical ability matched by few 'cellists who have appeared here. His work stamped him an artist, a fact that the audience promptly appreciated by compelling him to repeat one of his solos and add a fourth by way of encore.

The fourth concert of the series will be on February 8th.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER— JANUARY 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third Appearance of the Boston Orchestra This Season.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music with the following programme:

Lalo..................Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys"
Liszt..........................Song, "Mignon"
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Wagner...............Prelude to "Parsifal"

SOLI FOR 'CELLO.

a Tartini.................................Adagio
b Schubert....................Moment Musical
c Cossmann...........................Tarantelle
Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a Bungert......................"Amore e Luce"
b Richard Strauss..............."Staendchen"
c Schumann..............."Fruehlingsnacht"
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Goldmark, Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26

Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale, Allegro molto.

This was a rather remarkable program. There was a wide range of compositions, and, at first, it seemed a trifle dull, but the latter half made more than amends. As can be easily gleaned from the numbers, it was largely a modern program, most of the compositions being less than twenty years old.

The overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" loses much of its force from being given apart from the opera, although it has been entirely rewritten for concert purposes. The fabled city of "Ys" has served poets and musicians for many themes. The overture intends to crowd all the incidents of the destruction of the city into a single orchestral number, which is really too much. Lalo is a composer who has fought his way to appreciation through great obstacles, and he is now one of the leaders of the modern school of French instrumental composers. He seeks to charm solely through superficial effects and uses all the tricks of his trade to produce them.

The opera is a tragedy in which a whole city is sunk beneath the waves through the magic of a lover of the daughter of the King of "Ys." When this is understood the work becomes intelligible, but, though it abounds in beauty, it fails to fully satisfy for the reason above stated. The Frenchmen of the present day can better give light, shade and color in instrumental compositions than any composers in the world, but they lack the deeper qualities of the German school. There is no leit motif; all depends on transient effects.

Of a totally different character was the prelude to "Parsifal." The Holy Grail has furnished many times more ideas to poets and musicians than Lalo's theme and with greater success. "Parsifal" was the concluding work of Wagner, and the only one in which a purely religious theme was undertaken. Even this was claimed by Wagner's opponents to be more tinged with heathenism than Christianity and the objection was not without force, for he made humatarianism the salvation of the race rather than the vicarious atonement. Still it was on a higher plane than his critics allowed. Here we have introduced a leit motif, with all that the term implies, and this composition must stand as his crowning work rather than the laborious series of "The Ring," wherein mediæval fable was thrust upon the nineteenth century without any compensation for modern development in metaphysics.

The Goldmark Wedding Symphony, though scarcely deserving the name, is a delightful composition, full of fire and melody, and closed a delightful concert, in which the orchestra fully sustained its reputation.

As to the soloists, Mrs. Nikisch is a pleasing singer, though not a great one. Her short songs received and deserved more appreciation than the sombre song of "Mignon."

Mr. Schroeder is a delightful 'cellist and, artistically considered, his work was the best of the evening. Two encores were demanded. The 'cello is the greatest of all single part instruments, and Mr. Schroeder is one of the world's best performers.

The Adamowski concert in the afternoon was a success, though the change of date deterred many from attending.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/13

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Society was given at Chickering Hall last night, and added to the reasons for the profound esteem with which the musical public regards that organization. It is always a pleasant episode during a very varied period to listen to Mr. Nikisch's band, and last night this pleasure was heightened by the exceedingly interesting programme which he had arranged.

It is doubtful if, even after the hundreds of times the "Freischuetz" overture has been played here, any New Yorker can recall an occasion when it was better given than last night. Thus was found an introduction of such inviting excellence that the audience was not disposed to be hypercritical over the suite in A minor by E. A. MacDowell, which, when it was given at the last Worcester festival, created considerable varying comment.

Mr. MacDowell's work is written with an estimable knowledge of the requirements of the modern orchestra, but it does not seem to have been inspired by any other force than that of occasion. The first movement, entitled, "In a Haunted Forest," chooses gnomes and satyrs for the makers of the music rather than dryads and pixies. The motives were not commensurate with the objects of the composer. Perhaps the pleasantest incident in it was "The Shepherdess' Song," which was a bit of delightfully melodious writing.

Considerable curiosity was manifested in following Tschaikowsky's noble fantasie de concert for the piano and band, the soloist being the always artistic Mme. Rivé-King. Of the soloists' work there is little to say save that it was equal to and thoroughly sustained her reputation. The orchestral work in the introduction was a bit too sonorous to permit the pianoforte to accentuate the music, but in the second movement the delicious quality of Mme. Rivé-King's playing was thoroughly manifest.

Of Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," much has been said on the other side of the Atlantic, and most of this has been in its favor. Its interpretation last night showed it to be a work full of melody and with Eastern motives predominant. In its allegretto and andante movements, termed respectively "The Bridal Song" and "In the Garden," there was a number of reminiscences of [illegible] act of the same composer's "Die Königen von Sab[illegible] finale [illegible] a charming bit of dance [illegible], carefully and [illegible]ably written.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 1/13

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The interest that the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have for the New-York musical public was again signified last evening, at their third concert, by the numbers and character of the audience in Chickering Hall, and the attention and approval which it gave to the evening's music. There was a more than common attractiveness in the announcement of the programme, which was fashioned of works in the most modern spirit—a spirit with which Mr. Nikisch is in closest sympathy; while he consulted once more an inclination he has frequently shown in devising his New-York programmes, by presenting for the first time new works that have a claim to serious consideration. Of such there were two heard last evening—Mr. E. A. MacDowell's suite, op. 42, and Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56. It is a gratification to the pride in American art to record the fact that the young American's work proved by far more interesting and worthy from a musical point of view than the Russian veteran's. The suite was first performed at the Worcester Music Festival last September, when its originality, freshness and geniality were heartily recognized. It comprises four movements, each devoted to picturing some poetical conceit of forest life. The music is conceived in a most melodious vein, the rhythmic structure being especially captivating, while the composer has shown the greatest ingenuity and knowledge in the application of orchestral color and picturesque device. Especially is this true of the last movement, in which a most dainty fancy is coupled with a command of unique effects of instrumentation. There is some evidence, to be sure, of the influence of Mr. MacDowell's master, Joachim Raff, in the general trend of thought and in the harmonic cast of the music; but on the whole, the work is a most creditable contribution to American art. It was performed with exquisite perfection by the orchestra, and every significant bit of color and orchestral device was made to tell to its utmost.

Of Tschaikowsky's fantasia much less of praise can be said. It was played with much brilliancy by Mme. Rive-King, but offered little scope to the artist for anything more than bravura passages of inordinate length and little musical significance, most of what the composer had to say, which was little, being given to the orchestra. Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, read in a wonderfully impressive and dramatic manner, and Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony, played with delightful freedom and a wealth of rich color, made up the rest of the programme.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—TUESDAY, JANUARY 12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

Arthur Nikisch offered a particularly good programme at the Academy of Music last evening. The numbers were excellently graded from the heavy overture to the delicate and easily comprehended symphony. A very finicky person might have found something weak in the choice of a smooth and classic solo for the 'cello to follow the somewhat tumultuous "Parsifal" prelude; but the impression of weakness lasted only a moment, and at worst was the least possible break in the harmony of a carefully selected programme.

The orchestra was in fine condition. Mr. Nikisch's conception of his music was rendered with wonderful nicety. The crescendos in the sustained notes in the first part of the overture were marvelously smooth. Indeed all the delicate modulations of the climax with which the overture opens were played exquisitely.

Madame Nikisch's first song was "Kennst du das Land," from "Mignon." She sang dramatically and very much better than when she was last in this city. She sang, however, with evident effort. Perhaps she was at her best in the "Aurore e Luce," though she gave Shumann's nacht" with much spirit.

Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, showed his versalitity in his solo numbers. He played the adagio smoothly. Of Schubert's beautiful "Moment Musical" he caught the spirit well. But his best piece was decidedly the whimsical "Tarantelle." The quaintness of this evoked smiles and hearty applause from the audience, and Mr. Schroeder played again.

Following is the programme:—

Lalo............................Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".
Liszt...Song, "Mignon",
Wagner...............................Prelude to "Parsifal",

Soli for 'Cello.

a Tartini...Adagio
b Schubert............................Moment Musical
c Cossmann...Tarantelle

Songs with Piano.

a Bungert...................................."Amore e Luce"
b Richard Strauss.............................."Staendchen"
c Schumann.............................."Fruehlingsnacht"
Goldmark...Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1/12

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

In another column will be found an advertisement of special interest to all lovers of music, in reference to the proposed concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is now two years since this magnificent organization visited the city and the expense attending such concerts is so great, and the increasing demands made by New York, Brooklyn and other large cities for this orchestra are such as to make it unlikely that they would ever appear here again. The thanks of citizens are due Manager Ellis for his efforts in offering the best that the country affords.

There is no reason why this concert should not excel any yet given here by this company. Mr. Nikiesch, who when the orchestra last played here had but just arrived in America, is now thoroughly acquainted with his band and they have learned to know his methods. He has remonstrated his willingness to render compositions of merit, without regard to the nationality of the composers. At a recent Boston concert he played three new selections written by Americans. His predecessor, Mr. Gericke, would have fainted at such an act. The soloist of the evening will be the celebrated Chicago contralto, Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, a singer whose excellence is fully guaranteed by the management.

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1892

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew the usual large audience to the Academy of Music. It was an excellent concert, the programme being entirely of modern music, with which Mr. Nikisch proved himself altogether in sympathy. He has never given here a better piece of execution than that of Lalo's overture to "Le Roy d'Ys," a brilliant example of both the poetry and the power of the Parisian school, which was played with real fervor and an unusual richness of tone, as well as with the utmost refinement of sentiment. The execution of the "Parsifal" prelude was also admirable, though the excerpt is not a satisfactory concert piece, and in Goldmark's familiar symphony, the "Country Wedding," with its minute elaboration of picturesque and descriptive detail, the dainty skill of the orchestra was beautifully displayed. Four movements only were played, which is all that a symphony is expected to have, the serenade being omitted. The soloists were Mrs. Nikisch, who sang tastefully Liszt's dismal "Mignon," which many great artists have failed to make interesting, and some German songs with piano accompaniment that suited her better, and Mr. Schroeder, the 'cello soloist of the orchestra, who has a full, rich tone and an excellent technique, firm and fluent as well as exact, and whose performance was warmly received.

The Adamowski Concert.

The third concert of Mr. Adamowski's present series was given at Haseltine's Galleries yesterday afternoon and proved of particular interest. The instrumental numbers were the Mozart quartet in D major, No. 21; Hollander's spinning song, and a new Rheinberger quartet for piano and strings, the piano being taken by Mr. Nikisch. All these were given with the utmost finish and charm, the first movement of the Rheinberger quartet being received with particular attention. The opus does not, however, possess much permanent interest. Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist and sang very acceptably selections from Schumann, Schubert, Hinrichs and others.

The Musical Courier

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY, 13 1892.

Alwin Schroeder.

THE good old proverb, "Like father like son," finds no truer application than in the case of Alwin Schroeder, whose picture graces THE MUSICAL COURIER'S front page of this issue. He has a European reputation as one of the foremost virtuosi on the violoncello, and it was gained in concert tournées as well as at the first desk of the famous Gewandhaus orchestra.

Born in 1855, as the son of the music director at Neuhaldenslrben, near Magdeburg, the father's talent and enthusiasm for the divine art were transmitted to him as well as to his three elder brothers. From his father also he received his first piano lessons at the age of seven, and violin lessons from his brother Hermann, who is the author of several pedagogic works on that instrument. At the age of eleven he was quite able to take his father's part on the viola in the well-known Schroeder family quartet, in which two of his brothers played violin and the other violoncello, and he continued his studies on the violin under Professor de Ahna at Berlin, and on the piano under Court Pianist J. B. Andrée at Ballenstedt.

In 1872 the Schroeder Quartet dissolved, as Karl Schroeder, the violoncellist, went to Leipsic, and later on became court conductor at Sondershausen and founder of the conservatory at that city, both of which positions he still fills with honor and success. It was at that period that Alwin first took up the study of the violoncello, and with his special talent for that instrument he soon made such progress that his brother Karl happily counselled him to give up the violin and exchange it for the violoncello. In 1875 he was able to play 'cello in the Liebig orchestra, and in 1880, when Karl Schroeder went from Leipsic to Sondershausen, his brother Alwin took his various positions and occupations in the former city. For eleven years he worked there faithfully, as first violoncellist in the opera and Gewandhaus orchestra, as highly esteemed teacher of his instrument at the Royal Conservatory, and as member of the Hilf (formerly Petri) String Quartet.

If it will be remembered that it was only at the age of twenty that Alwin Schroeder actually became a violoncellist, and that only a few years later he was able to command a technic quite on a par with that possessed by his most famous colleagues, this fact must be counted as a most marvelous achievement and one that can be explained only on the score of his extraordinary gift and an iron persistency in studying. The success which has attended him everywhere in Europe, and which has now followed him to this country, is therefore a richly deserved one, and it is with pride that the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers among its members as first violoncellist a man who is as modest in his behavior as he is sterling as an artist.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, January 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will be at the piano, and they will have the assistance in carrying out their program of Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

Clipping from Tribune Cambridge Ma

Date 1-9

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Sand[redacted]e on T[redacted]ing of last week, before the usual large and interested audience. The programme was: Wagner, A Faust overture, C. M. Loeffler, Suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and pastorale, Dumka. Finale, Goldmark, "Rustic Wedding." Wedding March with variations; bridal song; Serenade; In the Garden; Dance.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

In "A Faust Overture," originally intended to form the first movement of a Faust symphony, Wagner seems to have played upon the entire gamut of human passions. One can easily imagine the morbid, despairing soliloquies of Faust in the low mutterings of the strings, and the plaintive cries from the flutes and oboes. The introduction, "molto sostenuto," contains the principal theme, given out by the violins, which is afterward developed to a superb climax in the "allegro molto," which suddenly diminishes when a mournful answer from the upper wind instruments is heard. Wagner has been very sparing in his use of the "brass," but the trombones make a magnificent entrance, accompanied by the whole orchestra fortissimo. With the appearance of the second subject, a ray of light illumines the dark background of the tragedy for the first time, and we seem to catch a fleeting glimpse of Marguerite, which brings the movement to a peaceful, tranquil close. Mr. Nikisch's masterly grasp of the subject was never more effectively shown than in his treatment of this wonderful overture, his intense absorption in the music communicating itself to the orchestra, which performed wonders in virtuosity under his inspiring command. Mr. Loeffler's suite, which was received with great favor in Boston at the Music Hall concert of November 21, gains decidedly on a second hearing. The themes are Russian, always pleasing and melodious, while the musical ideas are freely and naturally developed, with no unwise straining after effects, or attempts to be noisy at the expense of good taste. Indeed the whole composition is the very essence of refinement, and the modest violin part, beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, makes no effort at feats of execution. The omission of the "Rune" made the work of about the right length, and Mr. Loeffler was enthusiastically recalled at the close of the performance. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Goldmark's beautiful "Rustic Wedding," one of the finest works of this favorite composer. The opening movement, "The Wedding March," played by the 'celloes and basses, is followed by a series of thirteen variations, each of which represents some characteristic phase of peasant life. The different instruments are introduced with much ingenuity, the fourth variation in the minor having a beautiful melody for the violins. The tenth variation also has a rapid movement for the first violin, brilliantly executed by Mr. Kneisel, while the twelfth was especially noticeable for the beautiful oboe playing of Mr. Santet, accompanied by the flutes and clarinets. The Bridal Song, in which the oboe also has the theme, is most melodious, and was played with much tenderness and delicacy. The Serenade has a duet for oboes, likewise pleasing and melodious, which is afterwards worked up by the orchestra. The fourth movement, "In the Garden," has the loveliest theme in the entire symphony. It is given out by the clarinets, answered by the oboes, and accompanied by the strings. Goldmark has always been noted for his wealth of orchestral coloring, but this movement is a spontaneous, passionate outburst of song, which has the stamp of real genius. The finale is a dance, which is full of spirit and character, and was played by Mr. Nikisch with immense dash and abandon.

One of its most attractive features was the recurrence of the lovely theme of the preceding movement. The whole concert was a brilliant success, and the next, to take place on Thursday evening, January 21, is eagerly anticipated by all music lovers in Cambridge.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JAN. 15, 1892.

APPLAUDED NIKISCH.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights a Baltimore Audience.

BALTIMORE, Md., Jan. 14.—This is the third time that the Boston symphony orchestra had appeared here this season, and, judging from the increase in the size of the audiences, they are becoming more popular every time. The Academy Concert Hall was well filled tonight with a representative audience. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the soloist, received a grand ovation upon her entrance.

The programme was as follows:

[illegible] overture........................Wagner
[illegible]........................Liszt
[illegible] "Manfred"........................Schumann

Songs with Piano.

[illegible] e Luce"........................Bungert
[illegible]........................Richard Strauss
[illegible]"........................Schumann
[illegible] 7........................Beethoven
[illegible]; Vivace.
[illegible] meno presto; Tempo primo

[illegible] left for New York tonight [illegible] concert and will play in [illegible] afternoon and Saturday

---

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date 1/13

THE BEST IN THE COUNTRY.

KNEISEL STRING QUARTET TO BE HEARD AT ASSOCIATION HALL.

The enterprise and good judgment of the members of the Woman's Club has never been more clearly shown than in the provisions they have made this season for the edification of themselves and their friends. The Kneisel String Quartet, Mrs. Gen. Custer and Sir Edwin Arnold are a trio to be proud of. The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Association Hall, Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 27, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as soprano soloist, and her distinguished husband, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as accompanist. Of soloist and accompanist little need be said. Mr. Nikisch has that very exceptional gift, the ability to play a really beautiful piano accompaniment, and his wife has been abundantly praised for her vocal accomplishments.

The Kneisel String Quartet was without a rival in the country till Walter Damrosch imported Adolph Brodsky to be concert master of his New York Symphony Orchestra, the only permanent orchestra in the metropolis. Mr. Brodsky is a wonderful leader, but it remains to be proved whether his new quartet is fairly a rival of Franz Kneisel's remarkable organization, which is always sure of a warm welcome in New York as well as in Boston. Otto Roth is second violin, L. Svecenski takes the viola and Alwin Schroeder the violoncello.

Mr. Kneisel is the most finished violinist in the country, and since the retirement of Fritz Giese there has been no 'cello player in public who has proved himself so complete a master of the instrument as Alwin Schroeder, the new leader of the 'celloes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Roth, also, is a violin soloist of excellent repute, and Mr. Svecenski, the viola, is leader of the second violins in the Symphony Orchestra.

In Boston no musical organization has a higher standing—it might be questioned whether any enjoys so high a reputation. The catholicity of Kneisel's programs is shown by two of the pieces to be played at the Worcester concert: Haydn's beautiful quartet in D and a quintet for strings and piano by Christian Sinding, the Norwegian. The latter had never been heard in this country till the Kneisels played it in Boston, quite lately. It was first brought out in Copenhagen, in 1887, and subsequently in Leipsig. In every respect it is a refreshing and delicious work.

Tickets may now be had of members of the club, or Jan. 20 and afterwards of C. L. Gorham & Co.

EVENING POST, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-13

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Neither the bad weather nor the rival attractions which abounded diminished the size of the audience which welcomed Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra last evening, and the hall was as crowded as it is usually when these Bostonians visit us. Cosmopolitanism was the stamp of the programme. First came the German Weber's "Freyschütz" overture, which was played with admirable shading. This was followed by a suite by the American MacDowell, a Fantasie de Concert by the Russian Tchaikowsky, and the Hungarian Goldmark's Rustic Wedding Symphony, which proved a welcome revival. The Tchaikowsky fantasie was played in a rather dry and artificial manner by Mme Rivé-King, nor is it in itself a composition of special merit. More interest was felt in Mr. MacDowell's suite, opus 42, not only as being the work of one of our foremost composers, but because the subject—forest life—is one which seems specially adapted to inspire romantic minds to their best creative efforts. The four parts are headed "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess's Song," and "Forest Spirits." They are all commendably short, and are fascinating not only as programme-music, but as music pure and simple, which is the only real test of merit. The orchestra was in one of its best moods, and everybody seemed to enjoy the concert. Mr. Nikisch recently conducted Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony in Boston. Why does he not repeat that—or, better still, the Dramatic—in New York?

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

THIRD PUBLIC REHEARSAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn's Academy.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 15.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third public rehearsal this afternoon, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, in the Academy of Music.

Many New York faces were seen in the audience, which was a large and representative one.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in B-flat...............Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace
Larghetto.
Scherzo, molto vivace.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Pinano concerto in D minor..........Rubinstein
Moderato.
Moderato assai.
Allegro assai.
Preludium, Adagio and Gavotte............Bach
(For string orchestra. Arranged by Bachrich.)
Overture, Euryanthe.........................Weber

This programme will be repeated tomorrow evening, and at the close of the concert the orchestra will return to Boston over the Long Island & Eastern States line.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the most agreeable concerts of the season was enjoyed by the audience that assembled at Chickering Hall last evening to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The overture to "Der Freischutz," a suite for orchestra by that talented young Hungarian composer, E. A. McDowell; Tschaikowsky's "Fantaisie de Concert," op. 56, for pianoforte and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony constituted the programme. Von Weber's overture was delightfully played.

The performance was in fine sympathy with the spirit of the work, and no more felicitous, romantic and delicate suggestion of its romantic charm could be desired.

Mr. McDowell's suite for orchestra was heard at the Worcester Musical Festival last September. It is a superior work from every point of view, and its interpretation by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra well set forth its varied excellences. Tschaikowsky's fantaisie exhibits certain marked characteristics of its composer, which are not the most agreeable. Its occasional roughness is not compensated for by any special originality of ideas, and its brilliancy is its chief attraction. Mrs. Julia Rive-King played the solo part very effectively.

Goldmark's symphony with an inviting title has been for some years past a favorite in the concert room. It is an extremely agreeable composition and its merits were admirably set forth by the Boston orchestra. The work of the organization throughout the evening was up to the standard of its previous performances, and to say that this was accomplished is high praise.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-14

The Philharmonic Concerts.

The concerts already given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have revealed to music lovers of this community the delights which its performances offer, and have won for the organization and its gifted conductor a high place in public favor. The third concert of the series will be given at the Academy of Music next Saturday evening, with the usual public rehearsal to-morrow afternoon. An attractive programme is announced, opening with the Schumann Symphony in B flat. In the interpretation of this delightful work, Mr. Nikisch is said to be particularly happy. The critic of the New York "Evening Post," commenting on a recent performance, says of him: "As a Schumann conductor Mr. Nikisch has no superior—perhaps no equal." The other orchestral numbers are the Prelude Adagio and Gavotte for String Orchestra, by Bach, and the overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler will be the soloist, and will play with orchestra the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor. Tickets for both performances are now on sale at Chandler's.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1/14

At Boston Symphony.

At the Boston Symphony concert at Washington, last night, Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, received one of the greatest ovations ever given an artist in Washington.

---

pping Recorder,

~~Graphic~~ New York,

te 1-13

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night and was well attended. Leader Nikisch and his musicians were in excellent form, and the audience was treated to some superb orchestral playing.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 1-15

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on Wednesday afternoon of next week. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will play the accompaniments, and Master Fiedemann will contribute some violin music.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892

At the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society Paderewski, who was the soloist, gave these words of praise: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not excepting the orchestra of the conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the conservatoire, but as a whole the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the conservatoire."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Schumann's "Manfred," with its array of solo voices and choir, and its melodramatic exposition of many parts of Byron's poem, is always an attraction to the concert-room, although it was intended for the stage and perhaps has been heard to best advantage in some German theatres. It is an anomalous work; its overture is too introspective and subtle for a theatric prelude to such a highly-wrought story, and most of its incidental passages also lack the logical connection and the force which mere hack-writers oft put into their melodramatic compositions. Upon the announcement of it for last week, the twelfth Symphony concert and its rehearsal were largely attended and there was much warm applause. The orchestra played exquisitely, the delicate witch music, the faint voice of the distant mountain pipe, the romantic scene of Astarte's apparition and the entr'acte were given with most delicate sentiment and the finest touch throughout. The overture had a highly satisfactory treatment and the more deeply colored melodramatic passages had vigor and nerve in their delivery. The singers, both soloists and chorus, were all that could be expected, and the spoken text had the advantage of Mr. George Riddle's beautiful and polished elocution. That the timbre of his voice compels him to present Manfred as a sentimental and lamentful personage, rather than a tragic and commanding one, may be honestly regretted, but one cannot blame him for it; on the contrary, one should gladly recognize his fine intuitions, his sympathetic attitude, the skill with which he uses his means, his abstinence from any forced effects and the high plane which he attains in the scene with Astarte and at the end of the play. And it should be further said in Mr. Riddle's honor that the task is a more difficult and ungracious one than the unprofessional listener would be likely to think. An excellent rendering of Schubert's unfinished symphony preceded the "Manfred."

There will be no concert tonight, but on Saturday evening next Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who is now almost never heard in public, except for the direct benefit of some specified charity, will play Chopin's F-minor concerto, which will be preceded by Wagner's "Faust" overture and followed by the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWELFTH CONCERT.

The programme of the twelfth Symphony concert in Music hall on Saturday evening, Jan. 9, was:

Schubert. Unfinished Symphony in B minor. Allegro moderato—Andante con moto.
Schumann. The Music to Byron's "Manfred."
Reader: Mr. George Riddle.
Soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Chorus of members of the "Cecilia."

Music hall was uncomfortably filled at this concert. Why? There was nothing special to call out a multitude. The music to Byron's "Manfred" is good, noble and rich, like all Schumann's orchestral compositions, but there is nothing especially attractive about it. It would require greater genius than Schumann possessed to invest such a sad, dull text as Byron has here provided with anything like musical interest, even to the extreme lover of the art. The poem is not well adapted to an interesting musical setting. How can spirits which do not come forth, be pictured understandingly to a common audience? This music has been done before, but never with better adjuncts and surroundings than on this occasion; and yet, it has failed each time of producing any marked effect. Friends of the chorus, and perhaps the soloists as well, may have contributed to the large, increased numbers attending this concert, but we are sure it was not caused by any unusual interest in the music. Mr. George Riddle, who assumed the character of Manfred, was unexceptionably fine. With so large a hall in front of him to fill, and with so much brass, fire and brimstone in the rear to overpower, it proved rather too much for his oratorical and dramatic excellence to overcome, though he was in the main, victorious. The chorus had but little to do, acquitting itself fairly well. No doubt it could have done better, if there had been a good square beat to follow. The overture, the best part of the music, was well read by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral score throughout shows learning, if not positive genius, and when the dry, uninspired words of the text are taken into consideration, Schumann may well be congratulated on his success in setting it to music. All things considered, the orchestra did their work well, though it was far from faultless.

The unfinished Schubert symphony has been so many times, and to our mind so much better played, there is no occasion for comment. It is well to say, however, that the symphony may be considered an inspired work, from any point you look at it. It is charmingly beautiful from beginning to end, and there is nothing superior written.

JAMES M. TRACY.

[99]

Clipping from Tribune Cambridge Ma

Date 1-9

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Sand[illegible]re on Thursday evening of last week, before the usual large and interested audience. The programme was: Wagner, A Faust overture, C. M. Loeffler, Suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and pastorale, Dumka. Finale, Goldmark, "Rustic Wedding." Wedding March with variations; bridal song; Serenade; In the Garden; Dance.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

In "A Faust Overture," originally intended to form the first movement of a Faust symphony, Wagner seems to have played upon the entire gamut of human passions. One can easily imagine the morbid, despairing soliloquies of Faust in the low mutterings of the strings, and the plaintive cries from the flutes and oboes. The introduction, "molto sostenuto," contains the principal theme, given out by the violins, which is afterward developed to a superb climax in the "allegro molto," which suddenly diminishes when a mournful answer from the upper wind instruments is heard. Wagner has been very sparing in his use of the "brass," but the trombones make a magnificent entrance, accompanied by the whole orchestra fortissimo. With the appearance of the second subject, a ray of light illumines the dark background of the tragedy for the first time, and we seem to catch a fleeting glimpse of Marguerite, which brings the movement to a peaceful, tranquil close. Mr. Nikisch's masterly grasp of the subject was never more effectively shown than in his treatment of this wonderful overture, his intense absorption in the music communicating itself to the orchestra, which performed wonders in virtuosity under his inspiring command. Mr. Loeffler's suite, which was received with great favor in Boston at the Music Hall concert of November 21, gains decidedly on a second hearing. The themes are Russian, always pleasing and melodious, while the musical ideas are freely and naturally developed, with no unwise straining after effects, or attempts to be noisy at the expense of good taste. Indeed the whole composition is the very essence of refinement, and the modest violin part, beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, makes no effort at feats of execution. The omission of the "Rune" made the work of about the right length, and Mr. Loeffler was enthusiastically recalled at the close of the performance. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Goldmark's beautiful "Rustic Wedding," one of the finest works of this favorite composer. The opening movement, "The Wedding March," played by the 'celloes and basses, is followed by a series of thirteen variations, each of which represents some characteristic phase of peasant life. The different instruments are introduced with much ingenuity, the fourth variation in the minor having a beautiful melody for the violins. The tenth variation also has a rapid movement for the first violin, brilliantly executed by Mr. Kneisel, while the twelfth was especially noticeable for the beautiful oboe playing of Mr. Santet, accompanied by the flutes and clarinets. The Bridal Song, in which the oboe also has the theme, is most melodious, and was played with much tenderness and delicacy. The Serenade has a duet for oboes, likewise pleasing and melodious, which is afterwards worked up by the orchestra. The fourth movement, "In the Garden," has the loveliest theme in the entire symphony. It is given out by the clarinets, answered by the oboes, and accompanied by the strings. Goldmark has always been noted for his wealth of orchestral coloring, but this movement is a spontaneous, passionate outburst of song, which has the stamp of real genius. The finale is a dance, which is full of spirit and character, and was played by Mr. Nikisch with immense dash and abandon.

One of its most attractive features was the recurrence of the lovely theme of the preceding movement. The whole concert was a brilliant success, and the next, to take place on Thursday evening, January 21, is eagerly anticipated by all music lovers in Cambridge.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JAN. 15, 1892.

APPLAUDED NIKISCH.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights a Baltimore Audience.

BALTIMORE, Md., Jan. 14.—This is the third time that the Boston symphony orchestra had appeared here this season, and, judging from the increase in the size of the audiences, they are becoming more popular every time. The Academy Concert Hall was well filled tonight with a representative audience. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the soloist, received a grand ovation upon her entrance.

The programme was as follows:

A Faust overture............Wagner
"Mignon"............Liszt
Overture, "Manfred"............Schumann

Songs with Piano.

a "Amore e Luce"............Bungert
b "Staendchen"............Richard Strauss
c "Fruehlingsnacht"............Schumann
Symphony in A, No. 7............Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto. Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
Allegro con brio.

The orchestra left for New York tonight at the close of the concert and will play in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

[99]

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date 1/13

THE BEST IN THE COUNTRY.

KNEISEL STRING QUARTET TO BE HEARD AT ASSOCIATION HALL.

The enterprise and good judgment of the members of the Woman's Club has never been more clearly shown than in the provisions they have made this season for the edification of themselves and their friends. The Kneisel String Quartet, Mrs. Gen. Custer and Sir Edwin Arnold are a trio to be proud of. The Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Association Hall, Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 27, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as soprano soloist, and her distinguished husband, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as accompanist. Of soloist and accompanist little need be said. Mr. Nikisch has that very exceptional gift, the ability to play a really beautiful piano accompaniment, and his wife has been abundantly praised for her vocal accomplishments.

The Kneisel String Quartet was without a rival in the country till Walter Damrosch imported Adolph Brodsky to be concert master of his New York Symphony Orchestra, the only permanent orchestra in the metropolis. Mr. Brodsky is a wonderful leader, but it remains to be proved whether his new quartet is fairly a rival of Franz Kneisel's remarkable organization, which is always sure of a warm welcome in New York as well as in Boston. Otto Roth is second violin, L. Svecenski takes the viola and Alwin Schroeder the violoncello.

Mr. Kneisel is the most finished violinist in the country, and since the retirement of Fritz Giese there has been no 'cello player in public who has proved himself so complete a master of the instrument as Alwin Schroeder, the new leader of the 'cellos in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Roth, also, is a violin soloist of excellent repute, and Mr. Svecenski, the viola, is leader of the second violins in the Symphony Orchestra.

In Boston no musical organization has a higher standing—it might be questioned whether any enjoys so high a reputation. The catholicity of Kneisel's programs is shown by two of the pieces to be played at the Worcester concert: Haydn's beautiful quartet in D and a quintet for strings and piano by Christian Sinding, the Norwegian. The latter had never been heard in this country till the Kneisels played it in Boston, quite lately. It was first brought out in Copenhagen, in 1887, and subsequently in Leipsig. In every respect it is a refreshing and delicious work.

Tickets may now be had of members of the club, or Jan. 20 and afterwards of C. L. Gorham & Co.

EVENING POST, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/13

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Neither the bad weather nor the rival attractions which abounded diminished the size of the audience which welcomed Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra last evening, and the hall was as crowded as it is usually when these Bostonians visit us. Cosmopolitanism was the stamp of the programme. First came the German Weber's "Freyschütz" overture, which was played with admirable shading. This was followed by a suite by the American MacDowell, a Fantasie de Concert by the Russian Tchaikowsky, and the Hungarian Goldmark's Rustic Wedding Symphony, which proved a welcome revival. The Tchaikowsky fantasie was played in a rather dry and artificial manner by Mme Rivé-King, nor is it in itself a composition of special merit. More interest was felt in Mr. MacDowell's suite, opus 42, not only as being the work of one of our foremost composers, but because the subject—forest life—is one which seems specially adapted to inspire romantic minds to their best creative efforts. The four parts are headed "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess's Song," and "Forest Spirits." They are all commendably short, and are fascinating not only as programme-music, but as music pure and simple, which is the only real test of merit. The orchestra was in one of its best moods, and everybody seemed to enjoy the concert. Mr. Nikisch recently conducted Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony in Boston. Why does he not repeat that—or, better still, the Dramatic—in New York?

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

THIRD PUBLIC REHEARSAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn's Academy.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 15.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third public rehearsal this afternoon, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, in the Academy of Music.

Many New York faces were seen in the audience, which was a large and representative one.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in B-flat............Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace
Larghetto.
Scherzo, molto vivace.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Pinano concerto in D minor............Rubinstein
Moderato.
Moderato assai.
Allegro assai.
Præludium, Adagio and Gavotte............Bach
(For string orchestra. Arranged by Bachrich.)
Overture, Euryanthe............Weber

This programme will be repeated tomorrow evening, and at the close of the concert the orchestra will return to Boston over the Long Island & Eastern States line.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the most agreeable concerts of the season was enjoyed by the audience that assembled at Chickering Hall last evening to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The overture to "Der Freischutz," a suite for orchestra by that talented young Hungarian composer, E. A. McDowell; Tschaikowsky's "Fantaisie de Concert," op. 56, for pianoforte and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony constituted the programme. Von Weber's overture was delightfully played.

The performance was in fine sympathy with the spirit of the work, and no more felicitous, romantic and delicate suggestion of its romantic charm could be desired.

Mr. McDowell's suite for orchestra was heard at the Worcester Musical Festival last September. It is a superior work from every point of view, and its interpretation by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra well set forth its varied excellences. Tschaikowsky's fantaisie exhibits certain marked characteristics of its composer, which are not the most agreeable. Its occasional roughness is not compensated for by any special originality of ideas, and its brilliancy is its chief attraction. Mrs. Julia Rive-King played the solo part very effectively.

Goldmark's symphony with an inviting title has been for some years past a favorite in the concert room. It is an extremely agreeable composition and its merits were admirably set forth by the Boston orchestra. The work of the organization throughout the evening was up to the standard of its previous performances, and to say that this was accomplished is high praise.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1/14

The Philharmonic Concerts.

The concerts already given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have revealed to music lovers of this community the delights which its performances offer, and have won for the organization and its gifted conductor a high place in public favor. The third concert of the series will be given at the Academy of Music next Saturday evening, with the usual public rehearsal to-morrow afternoon. An attractive programme is announced, opening with the Schumann Symphony in B flat. In the interpretation of this delightful work, Mr. Nikisch is said to be particularly happy. The critic of the New York "Evening Post," commenting on a recent performance, says of him: "As a Schumann conductor Mr. Nikisch has no superior—perhaps no equal." The other orchestral numbers are the Prelude Adagio and Gavotte for String Orchestra, by Bach, and the overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler will be the soloist, and will play with orchestra the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor. Tickets for both performances are now on sale at Chandler's.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Date

At the Boston Symphony.

At the Boston Symphony concert at Washington, last night, Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, received one of the greatest ovations ever given an artist in Washington.

---

pping Recorder,

te 1/13

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night and was well attended. Leader Nikisch and his musicians were in excellent form, and the audience was treated to some superb orchestral playing.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 1-15

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall on Wodnesday afternoon of next week. Mrs. Nikisch will sing, Mr. Nikisch will play the accompaniments, and Master Fiedemann will contribute somp violin music.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892

At the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society Paderewski, who was the soloist, gave these words of praise: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not excepting the orchestra of the conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the conservatoire, but as a whole the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the conservatoire."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Schumann's "Manfred," with its array of solo voices and choir, and its melodramatic exposition of many parts of Byron's poem, is always an attraction to the concert-room, although it was intended for the stage and perhaps has been heard to best advantage in some German theatres. It is an anomalous work; its overture is too introspective and subtle for a theatric prelude to such a highly-wrought story, and most of its incidental passages also lack the logical connection and the force which mere hack-writers oft put into their melodramatic compositions. Upon the announcement of it for last week, the twelfth Symphony concert and its rehearsal were largely attended and there was much warm applause. The orchestra played exquisitely, the delicate witch music, the faint voice of the distant mountain pipe, the romantic scene of Astarte's apparition and the entr'acte were given with most delicate sentiment and the finest touch throughout. The overture had a highly satisfactory treatment and the more deeply colored melodramatic passages had vigor and nerve in their delivery. The singers, both soloists and chorus, were all that could be expected, and the spoken text had the advantage of Mr. George Riddle's beautiful and polished elocution. That the timbre of his voice compels him to present Manfred as a sentimental and lamentful personage, rather than a tragic and commanding one, may be honestly regretted, but one cannot blame him for it; on the contrary, one should gladly recognize his fine intuitions, his sympathetic attitude, the skill with which he uses his means, his abstinence from any forced effects and the high plane which he attains in the scene with Astarte and at the end of the play. And it should be further said in Mr. Riddle's honor that the task is a more difficult and ungracious one than the unprofessional listener would be likely to think. An excellent rendering of Schubert's unfinished symphony preceded the "Manfred."

There will be no concert tonight, but on Saturday evening next Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who is now almost never heard in public, except for the direct benefit of some specified charity, will play Chopin's F-minor concerto, which will be preceded by Wagner's "Faust" overture and followed by the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWELFTH CONCERT.

The programme of the twelfth Symphony concert in Music hall on Saturday evening, Jan. 9, was:

Schubert. Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Allegro moderato—Andante con moto.
Schumann. The Music to Byron's "Manfred."
Reader: Mr. George Riddle.
Soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Chorus of members of the "Cecilia."

Music hall was uncomfortably filled at this concert. Why? There was nothing special to call out a multitude. The music to Byron's "Manfred" is good, noble and rich, like all Schumann's orchestral compositions, but there is nothing especially attractive about it. It would require greater genius than Schumann possessed to invest such a sad, dull text as Byron has here provided with anything like musical interest, even to the extreme lover of the art. The poem is not well adapted to an interesting musical setting. How can spirits which do not come forth, be pictured understandingly to a common audience? This music has been done before, but never with better adjuncts and surroundings than on this occasion; and yet, it has failed each time of producing any marked effect. Friends of the chorus, and perhaps the soloists as well, may have contributed to the large, increased numbers attending this concert, but we are sure it was not caused by any unusual interest in the music. Mr. George Riddle, who assumed the character of Manfred, was unexceptionably fine. With so large a hall in front of him to fill, and with so much brass, fire and brimstone in the rear to overpower, it proved rather too much for his oratorical and dramatic excellence to overcome, though he was in the main, victorious. The chorus had but little to do, acquitting itself fairly well. No doubt it could have done better, if there had been a good square beat to follow. The overture, the best part of the music, was well read by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral score throughout shows learning, if not positive genius, and when the dry, uninspired words of the text are taken into consideration, Schumann may well be congratulated on his success in setting it to music. All things considered, the orchestra did their work well, though it was far from faultless.

The unfinished Schubert symphony has been so many times, and to our mind so much better played, there is no occasion for comment. It is well to say, however, that the symphony may be considered an inspired work, from any point you look at it. It is charmingly beautiful from beginning to end, and there is nothing superior written.

JAMES M. TRACY.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Produces a Suite by an American Composer.

In spite of the rain above and the slush below, a well filled house greeted Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra from Boston at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening.

Rarely if ever has the overture to "Der Freischutz" been given with such dramatic intensity. The Adagio (introduction) swelled up from nothingness into a volume of tone which may be regarded as unsurpassable by any body of strings in this country. And when it died down again to a pianissimo tremulo of the violins, with low tones of the clarinets and the syncopated pizzicato of the double basses, the effect was so thrilling that Berlioz would certainly have raved could he but have heard it. It was unfortunate that the intonation and precision of tone in the beautiful horn quartet was not what it should have been, otherwise the performance might have been recorded as the finest ever known. As it was Weber's masterpiece was easily the feature of the evening.

It was gratifying to hear an American orchestral work so worthily rendered as was the Suite in A-minor Op. 42, by E. A. MacDowell. This Suite is a series of sketches which would correspond to the impressionistic paintings of some of our modern artists, a treatment quite appropriate to the titles of most of the movements, which are as follows:

In a Haunted Forest (Largamente misterioso Allegro furioso; Maestoso).
Summer Idyl (Allegretto grazioso).
The Shepherdess Song (Andantino, Semplice).
Forest Spirits (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).

The first and last movements seemed to please the best of all. The mind was allowed to run (or rather fly) rioting through space with bogies and hobgoblins as they whisked through the air on chromatic slides of chords of the diminished seventh. Be it remarked in passing that this chord, so valuable when used in moderation, becomes rather worn by the end of the Tschaikowsky number which followed, containing as it did a great deal of the same kind of passage work.

The Fantasie de Concert for piano and orchestra, by the great Russian, played here for the first time by Mme. Rive-King, opens with a pleasing, well-regulated theme given by the orchestra. A melodious episode for the flute occurs, and at length the piano takes a prominent part. Much of the work is contrapuntal, and there is a long series of passages for piano alone, which, it must be confessed, are very dry, although they were very ably played by the favorite artiste Mme. Rive-King. The second and last number begins with a theme for the pianoforte solo. On its repetition a second part for violoncello solo is added, it being ingeniously developed in strict canon in the octave. Mme. King, who played the Fantasie with great bravoua was recalled and rewarded with floral offerings.

The concert concluded with a finished rendition of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The performance of a certain passage of this familiar work is worthy of special comment. The cadenza leading back to the main theme of the scene "In the Garden" ranges from the upper registers of the violins to the depths of the basses, and so gradual and imperceptible was the transition from one set of instruments to another that it sounded as if done by a single performer.

OUR BOSTON BUDGET.

AFTER a couple of postponements on account of illness, the third Kneisel Concert was given early in January, with three first performances. First there was Quartet in E-flat, by Dittersdorf, the less known contemporary of Haydn, with a Gypsy andante for the first violin, and a bagpipe drone for the other strings. Next came Beethoven's Opus 130, 13th Quartet, in B-flat, written in 1827, just before his death, by order of Prince Galatzin, who never paid for it, and containing a Tedesca dance movement and cavatina, which Beethoven specially liked. Finally there was a string octet by Svendsen, op. 3, with a picturesque allegro scherzando. Another beautiful concert.

THE first of series of Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large audience, despite the bad weather. There were several novelties, played for the first time by this orchestra, if not in our city: De Koven's March and Dance of Gnomes; Van der Stucken's Pagina d'Amore; Arthur Bird's Carnival Scene; Littolff's King Lear Overture. Massenet's lovely ballet music, from the Cid, wound up the concert. The soloists were the pianist Aus Der Ohe and the violinist Maud Powell, in Tschaikowsky's first concerto, B-flat-minor, op. 23, and the Rondo Capricioso of Saint Saens. The selections were more than popular and were finely rendered.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH will give a recital at Chickering Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing and Mr. Nikisch will play the piano accompaniments. They will be assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday, January 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the present series by this superior organization was greeted by a crowded house at the Academy of Music Monday evening. The program was not noteworthy in any special particular, although it was thoroughly enjoyable and covered quite a wide range of compositions. It opened with the overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Y's," a work, that leans heavily toward sentimentality, is not altogether intelligible and lacks impressiveness; although it is quite possible that when given in connection with the opera, the composer's meaning would be more clearly illustrated. Wagner's prelude to "Parisful" was given an impressive reading notwithstanding a lack of force and passion in the climaxes which one anticipates from Wagner. In point of tonal beauty and excellence of performance it was the chief number of the evening, notwithstanding it was followed by Goldmark's Country Wedding Symphony—a composition that is hardly entitled to a place as the leading number on a Boston Symphony program. Its brightness, freshness and peculiarly close interpretation of the subject it represents, however, makes it a general favorite among the average concert goer. Strictly speaking, it is not in the sonata form, though the composer has divided it into the conventional movements and sought to preserve the classic framework of the symphony proper, and hence cannot justly be called a symphony. It is more properly a suite or series of musical pictures intended to illustrate a sketch of a country wedding. It is, indeed, a series of charming ear-tickling fancies woven and held together by the very slightest of symphonic threads. Mr. Nikisch gave the entire five movements, notwithstanding the program announced that the third, the serenade, would be omitted. Many in the audience were evidently greatly disappointed in the work, or they would not have taken such early departure. It is hoped that at the next concert a program of greater worth will be presented.

The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mrs. Nikisch sang Liszt's "Kannot du das Land," with orchestral accompaniment and songs with piano by Bungert, Richard Strauss and Schumann. She has rather an agreeable mezzo-soprano voice and sings artistically, but not altogether satisfying.

There is a coldness or reserve about her that is not altogether pleasing. Mr. Schroeder, the violoncillist, played an Adagio by Tartini; Schubert's "Moment Musicale" (which he was forced to repeat) a Tarantella by Cossmann and as a second encore one of Popper's difficult and pleasing compositions. Mr. Schroeder has an instrument possessing a remarkable mellow tone; he plays with artistic sentiment and wonderful technical facility but without great power. His success, however, was measured by the most enthusiastic applause possible for a large and thoroughly intelligent musical audience to bestow.

* * *

Adamowski Quartette.

The usual large and fashionable audience that invariably greets the Adamowski Quartette gathered at the Haseltine Galleries, Monday afternoon to enjoy a program which consisted of the Mozart quartet in D major, No. 21; Hollander's spinning song, and a new Rheinberger quartet for piano and strings, the piano being taken by Mr. Niksch. All these were given with the utmost finish and charm, the first movement of the Rheinberger quartet being received with particular attention. The opus does not, however, possess much permanent interest. Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist and sang very acceptably selections from Schumann, Schubert, Hinrichs and others.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1892.

Madame Nordica, whose American concert tour has been wonderfully successful, will make her last appearance in Boston at Music Hall on Thursday, Jan. 28, in an operatic concert, when she will be supported by such artists as Mme. Scalchi, the distinguished contralto, Mr. Paul Kalisch, the famous operatic tenor, and Mr. Zotan Dome, baritone, from Covent Garden, London, and who makes his first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The programme will be rich in brilliant excerpts from favorite operas, and will close with the six best numbers from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." A grand orchestra of fifty, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio, will assist. The sale of seats begins to morrow morning at Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1892.

Mme. Nordica's Concert.

Mme. Nordica will make her last appearance in America at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, previous to her return to London, where she is engaged to appear in oratorio at Albert Hall and in opera at Covent Garden.

Mme. Nordica's brief tour in this country has been very successful, and has shown her to possess attractive powers and artistic merits of the highest order. She is great in oratorio, magnificent in opera and charming in concert.

This farewell concert will be made brilliant by the assistance of such artists as Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Mr. Paul Kalisch, t e famous tenor, and Mr. Z. Dome, barytone of Covent Garden, London, who will make its first appearance in Boston on this occasion.

An orchestra of [illegible]0, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio, will also assist. The first part of the programme will consist of operatic solos for the various artists and the second part of the especially taking number from the "Cavalleria Rusticana. Seats go on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

—The musical critic of the New York Times—one of the best in the country—says, apropos of the Symphony orchestra concert at Chickering Hall, Tuesday night, and its performance of the "Freischutz" overture, that "of all romantic overtures it is perhaps the most perfect of its kind, while of all strictly romantic conductors none surpasses Nikisch. Those who attended listened to a musical performance the memory of which they are likely to cherish for many a day to come.

[illegible]

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be given to-night, and the rehearsal for the programme was held at the same place yesterday afternoon. It is a delightful bill that Mr. Nikisch offers—well chosen, artistic, just of the right duration and played superbly. Schumann's First symphony is the leading and important number, and it is safe to declare that it has never been given with more dignity, more fire, more sweetness than yesterday. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it does not differ radically from the versions that have been heard in the concert room, yet it is his own and an obvious result of sympathetic study. He takes the time for the opening movement at an unusually slow rate, which gives the more effect to the brisker measures that follow and that imparts weight and gravity to the subject. It may be that Schumann intended this to be a "spring" symphony, as he hints, but the beginning is not in the vein that is commonly associated with ideas of spring; certainly, in the version that was heard yesterday there was more of mystery and tragedy than of laughter. What are serious in the idea and declarative in the treatment are congenial to Mr. Nikisch, who exalts his interpretation of the work to as grand an altitude as possible, so that it stirs as deeply as the Fifth symphony, and it discloses beauty that Beethoven does not invariably touch. Yet, it is not all in the heroic vein, for the larghetto is as lovely, the scherzo as playful and the ending allegro as enlivening as anything in music, and they inforce the impression that it is not easy to hear too much of Schumann and his symphonies. The thought, the refinement, the expression, the tone color, are the work of a poet and a master. In his piano music Schumann is once in a while restricted by the inadequacy of his medium, and again he is led by its facility to indulge in feats of technic that are caviare to the general and dry to the initiate, but in his orchestral work he is at concert pitch, and his thought always fills the measure of the means at his command. As in the case of some writers and artists who did not meet with the success that they merited during their lives, so will Schumann grow in popular esteem, and it is a question if his position is not determined to be closer to Beethoven than it is now conceded to be. He celebrates in his work the emancipation of music from the formalism that affected nearly all musicians before his time, and he shows its capacity for intellectual as well as emotional expression. The more severe but equally magnificent Bach was contrasted in the violin concerto that Bachrich has turned into a concert piece for string band, and that was played yesterday in a delightful manner. The brightness of the strings, their sonorous quality, their briskness and certainty of attack, their pliancy and variety of tone that was now like singing and anon like the roll of an organ, their wonderful unity and their feeling were illustrated in this number, while a new value was disclosed in the largo from the vivacious and grateful overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," that was the last piece on the programme. This overture, combining the characteristics of both the classic and romantic periods in music, written in a time when the arts were in transition from one to the other, is none too often heard, and it was regarded by Weber himself as the best of his overtures. The opening and the fugued movement are in the older style; the largo, delivered from muted strings, might have been written yesterday. It was played with a sustained and voice like utterance, soft, strange, almost unearthly in its beauty. The soloist of the concert is Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler from Chicago, who plays on the piano with confidence and vivacity. The grandiose D minor concerto of Rubinstein is her selection—a work in which the Russian shows himself, despite the composer's effort to clothe him in a conventional and Teutonic guise. Mrs. Zeisler is a remarkably facile player and she imparts a surprising degree of spirit to her work. The daring of her work sometimes involves her in difficulties, and a false note is heard occasionally, but then, Rubinstein plays false Her most obvious fault is in the management of the pedal, for, when making harmonic changes, as between the tonic and dominant, she occasionally leaves the pedal open, thus throwing half tone vibrations together and producing discord. This is not uncommon with amateurs, but it is not to be excused in the case of any player. In the closing allegro Mrs. Zeisler took a pace that made the musicians open their eyes and put them to some trouble to keep up, the wood wind department showing a little irregularity, but the soloist was no more to be restrained than a race horse. The time for beginning the concert this evening has been put off until 8:15, by request of some of the ticket holders. The next appearances of the orchestra, after to-night, will be on the 12th and 13th of February.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 17, 1892.

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

The farewell appearance of Mme. Nordica, before her London season, is to be made a particularly interesting occasion by Manager Charles A. Ellis, whose enterprise in this matter will be highly appreciated by the many friends and admirers of Mme. Nordica. The programme will include some choice miscellaneous numbers, followed by the principal gems of "The Cavalleria Rusticana," and Mme. Nordica will have the assistance of Mme. Scalchi, contralto; Herr Paul Kalisch, tenor; Mr. Z. Dome, bass, and an orchestra, under Sig. Sappio. Mme. Nordica is to sing the "Ah Fors e Lui," the "Polacca," from Goring Thomas' opera, "Esmeralda," and the Santuzza role. Mme. Scalchi will sing the "Habenera," from "Carmen," and the "Ah Rendimi," by Rossi, and, among the other selections, is the famous "Rigoletto" quartet. The sale of seats begins tomorrow morning.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Produces a Suite by an American Composer.

In spite of the rain above and the slush below, a well filled house greeted Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra from Boston at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening.

Rarely if ever has the overture to "Der Freischutz" been given with such dramatic intensity. The Adagio (introduction) swelled up from nothingness into a volume of tone which may be regarded as unsurpassable by any body of strings in this country. And when it died down again to a pianissimo tremulo of the violins, with low tones of the clarinets and the syncopated pizzicato of the double basses, the effect was so thrilling that Berlioz would certainly have raved could he but have heard it. It was unfortunate that the intonation and precision of tone in the beautiful horn quartet was not what it should have been, otherwise the performance might have been recorded as the finest ever known. As it was Weber's masterpiece was easily the feature of the evening.

It was gratifying to hear an American orchestral work so worthily rendered as was the Suite in A-minor Op. 42, by E. A. MacDowell. This Suite is a series of sketches which would correspond to the impressionistic paintings of some of our modern artists, a treatment quite appropriate to the titles of most of the movements, which are as follows:

In a Haunted Forest (Largamente misterioso Allegro furioso; Maestoso).
Summer Idyl (Allegretto grazioso).
The Shepherdess Song (Andantino, Semplice).
Forest Spirits (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).

The first and last movements seemed to please the best of all. The mind was allowed to run (or rather fly) rioting through space with bogies and hobgoblins as they whisked through the air on chromatic slides of chords of the diminished seventh. Be it remarked in passing that this chord, so valuable when used in moderation, becomes rather worn by the end of the Tschaikowsky number which followed, containing as it did a great deal of the same kind of passage work.

The Fantasie de Concert for piano and orchestra, by the great Russian, played here for the first time by Mme. Rive-King, opens with a pleasing, well-regulated theme given by the orchestra. A melodious episode for the flute occurs, and at length the piano takes a prominent part. Much of the work is contrapuntal, and there is a long series of passages for piano alone, which, it must be confessed, are very dry, although they were very ably played by the favorite artiste Mme. Rive-King. The second and last number begins with a theme for the pianoforte solo. On its repetition a second part for violoncello solo is added, it being ingeniously developed in strict canon in the octave. Mme. King, who played the Fantasie with great bravoua was recalled and rewarded with floral offerings.

The concert concluded with a finished rendition of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The performance of a certain passage of this familiar work is worthy of special comment. The cadenza leading back to the main theme of the scene "In the Garden" ranges from the upper registers of the violins to the depths of the basses, and so gradual and imperceptible was the transition from one set of instruments to another that it sounded as if done by a single performer.

OUR BOSTON BUDGET.

AFTER a couple of postponements on account of illness, the third Kneisel Concert was given early in January, with three first performances. First there was Quartet in E-flat, by Dittersdorf, the less known contemporary of Haydn, with a Gypsy andante for the first violin, and a bagpipe drone for the other strings. Next came Beethoven's Opus 130, 13th Quartet, in B-flat, written in 1827, just before his death, by order of Prince Galatzin, who never paid for it, and containing a Tedesca dance movement and cavatina, which Beethoven specially liked. Finally there was a string octet by Svendsen, op. 3, with a picturesque allegro scherzando. Another beautiful concert.

THE first of series of Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large audience, despite the bad weather. There were several novelties, played for the first time by this orchestra, if not in our city: De Koven's March and Dance of Gnomes; Van der Stucken's Pagina d'Amore; Arthur Bird's Carnival Scene; Littolff's King Lear Overture. Massenet's lovely ballet music, from the Cid, wound up the concert. The soloists were the pianist Aus Der Ohe and the violinist Maud Powell, in Tschaikowsky's first concerto, B-flat-minor, op. 23, and the Rondo Capricioso of Saint Saens. The selections were more than popular and were finely rendered.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH will give a recital at Chickering Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing and Mr. Nikisch will play the piano accompaniments. They will be assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday, January 16, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the present series by this superior organization was greeted by a crowded house at the Academy of Music Monday evening. The program was not noteworthy in any special particular, although it was thoroughly enjoyable and covered quite a wide range of compositions. It opened with the overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Y's," a work, that leans heavily toward sentimentality, is not altogether intelligible and lacks impressiveness; although it is quite possible that when given in connection with the opera, the composer's meaning would be more clearly illustrated. Wagner's prelude to "Parisful" was given an impressive reading notwithstanding a lack of force and passion in the climaxes which one anticipates from Wagner. In point of tonal beauty and excellence of performance it was the chief number of the evening, notwithstanding it was followed by Goldmark's Country Wedding Symphony—a composition that is hardly entitled to a place as the leading number on a Boston Symphony program. Its brightness, freshness and peculiarly close interpretation of the subject it represents, however, makes it a general favorite among the average concert goer. Strictly speaking, it is not in the sonata form, though the composer has divided it into the conventional movements and sought to preserve the classic framework of the symphony proper, and hence cannot justly be called a symphony. It is more properly a suite or series of musical pictures intended to illustrate a sketch of a country wedding. It is, indeed, a series of charming ear-tickling fancies woven and held together by the very slightest of symphonic threads. Mr. Nikisch gave the entire five movements, notwithstanding the program announced that the third, the serenade, would be omitted. Many in the audience were evidently greatly disappointed in the work, or they would not have taken such early departure. It is hoped that at the next concert a program of greater worth will be presented.

The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mrs. Nikisch sang Liszt's "Kannot du das Land," with orchestral accompaniment and songs with piano by Bungert, Richard Strauss and Schumann. She has rather an agreeable mezzo-soprano voice and sings artistically, but not altogether satisfying. There is a coldness or reserve about her that is not altogether pleasing. Mr. Schroeder, the violoncillist, played an Adagio by Tartini; Schubert's "Moment Musicale" (which he was forced to repeat) a Tarantella by Cossmann and as a second encore one of Popper's difficult and pleasing compositions. Mr. Schroeder has an instrument possessing a remarkable mellow tone; he plays with artistic sentiment and wonderful technical facility but without great power. His success, however, was measured by the most enthusiastic applause possible for a large and thoroughly intelligent musical audience to bestow.

* * *

Adamowski Quartette.

The usual large and fashionable audience that invariably greets the Adamowski Quartette gathered at the Haseltine Galleries, Monday afternoon to enjoy a program which consisted of the Mozart quartet in D major, No. 21; Hollander's spinning song, and a new Rheinberger quartet for piano and strings, the piano being taken by Mr. Niksch. All these were given with the utmost finish and charm, the first movement of the Rheinberger quartet being received with particular attention. The opus does not, however, possess much permanent interest. Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist and sang very acceptably selections from Schumann, Schubert, Hinrichs and others.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1892.

Madame Nordica, whose American concert tour has been wonderfully successful, will make her last appearance in Boston at Music Hall on Thursday, Jan. 28, in an operatic concert, when she will be supported by such artists as Mme. Scalchi, the distinguished contralto, Mr. Paul Kalisch, the famous operatic tenor, and Mr. Zotan Dome, baritone, from Covent Garden, London, and who makes his first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The programme will be rich in brilliant excerpts from favorite operas, and will close with the six best numbers from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." A grand orchestra of fifty, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio, will assist. The sale of seats begins to morrow morning at Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1892.

Mme. Nordica's Concert.

Mme. Nordica will make her last appear ance in America at Music Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, previous to her return to London, where she is engaged to appear in oratorio at Albert Hall and in opera at Covent Garden.

Mme. Nordica's brief tour in this country has been very successful, and has shown her to possess attractive powers and artistic merits of the highest order. She is great in oratorio, magnificent in opera and charming in concert.

This farewell concert will be made brilliant by the assistance of such artists as Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Mr. Paul Kalisch, t e famous tenor, and Mr. Z. Dome, barytone of Covent Garden, London, who will make its first appearance in Boston on this occasion.

An orchestra of 60, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio, will also assist. The first part of the programme will consist of operatic solos for the various artists and the second part of the especially taking number from the "Cavalleria Rusticana. Seats go on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

—The musical critic of the New York Times—one of the best in the country—says, apropos of the Symphony orchestra's concert at Chickering Hall, Tuesday night, and its performance of the "Freischutz" overture, that "of all romantic overtures it is perhaps the most perfect of its kind, while of all strictly romantic conductors none surpasses Nikisch. Those who attended listened to a musical performance the memory of which they are likely to cherish for many a day to come.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be given to-night, and the rehearsal for the programme was held at the same place yesterday afternoon. It is a delightful bill that Mr. Nikisch offers—well chosen, artistic, just of the right duration and played superbly. Schumann's First symphony is the leading and important number, and it is safe to declare that it has never been given with more dignity, more fire, more sweetness than yesterday. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it does not differ radically from the versions that have been heard in the concert room, yet it is his own and an obvious result of sympathetic study. He takes the time for the opening movement at an unusually slow rate, which gives the more effect to the brisker measures that follow and that imparts weight and gravity to the subject. It may be that Schumann intended this to be a "spring" symphony, as he hints, but the beginning is not in the vein that is commonly associated with ideas of spring; certainly, in the version that was heard yesterday there was more of mystery and tragedy than of laughter. What are serious in the idea and declarative in the treatment are congenial to Mr. Nikisch, who exalts his interpretation of the work to as grand an altitude as possible, so that it stirs as deeply as the Fifth symphony, and it discloses beauty that Beethoven does not invariably touch. Yet, it is not all in the heroic vein, for the larghetto is as lovely, the scherzo as playful and the ending allegro as enlivening as anything in music, and they inforce the impression that it is not easy to hear too much of Schumann and his symphonies. The thought, the refinement, the expression, the tone color, are the work of a poet and a master. In his piano music Schumann is once in a while restricted by the inadequacy of his medium, and again he is led by its facility to indulge in feats of technic that are caviare to the general and dry to the initiate, but in his orchestral work he is at concert pitch, and his thought always fills the measure of the means at his command. As in the case of some writers and artists who did not meet with the success that they merited during their lives, so will Schumann grow in popular esteem, and it is a question if his position is not determined to be closer to Beethoven than it is now conceded to be. He celebrates in his work the emancipation of music from the formalism that affected nearly all musicians before his time, and he shows its capacity for intellectual as well as emotional expression. The more severe but equally magnificent Bach was contrasted in the violin concerto that Bachrich has turned into a concert piece for string band, and that was played yesterday in a delightful manner. The brightness of the strings, their sonorous quality, their briskness and certainty of attack, their pliancy and variety of tone that was now like singing and anon like the roll of an organ, their wonderful unity and their feeling were illustrated in this number, while a new value was disclosed in the largo from the vivacious and grateful overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," that was the last piece on the programme. This overture, combining the characteristics of both the classic and romantic periods in music, written in a time when the arts were in transition from one to the other, is none too often heard, and it was regarded by Weber himself as the best of his overtures. The opening and the fugued movement are in the older style: the largo, delivered from muted strings, might have been written yesterday. It was played with a sustained and voice like utterance, soft, strange, almost unearthly in its beauty. The soloist of the concert is Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler from Chicago, who plays on the piano with confidence and vivacity. The grandiose D minor concerto of Rubinstein is her selection—a work in which the Russian shows himself, despite the composer's effort to clothe him in a conventional and Teutonic guise. Mrs. Zeisler is a remarkably facile player and she imparts a surprising degree of spirit to her work. The daring of her work sometimes involves her in difficulties, and a false note is heard occasionally, but then, Rubinstein plays false Her most obvious fault is in the management of the pedal, for, when making harmonic changes, as between the tonic and dominant, she occasionally leaves the pedal open, thus throwing half tone vibrations together and producing discord. This is not uncommon with amateurs, but it is not to be excused in the case of any player. In the closing allegro Mrs. Zeisler took a pace that made the musicians open their eyes and put them to some trouble to keep up, the wood wind department showing a little irregularity, but the soloist was no more to be restrained than a race horse. The time for beginning the concert this evening has been put off until 8:15, by request of some of the ticket holders. The next appearances of the orchestra, after to-night, will be on the 12th and 13th of February.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 17, 1892.

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

The farewell appearance of Mme. Nordica, before her London season, is to be made a particularly interesting occasion by Manager Charles A. Ellis, whose enterprise in this matter will be highly appreciated by the many friends and admirers of Mme. Nordica. The programme will include some choice miscellaneous numbers, followed by the principal gems of "The Cavalleria Rusticana," and Mme. Nordica will have the assistance of Mme. Scalchi, contralto; Herr Paul Kalisch, tenor; Mr. Z. Dome, bass, and an orchestra, under Sig. Sappio. Mme. Nordica is to sing the "Ah Fors e Lui," the "Polacca," from Goring Thomas' opera, "Esmeralda," and the Santuzza role. Mme. Scalchi will sing the "Habenera," from "Carmen," and the "Ah Rendimi," by Rossi, and, among the other selections, is the famous "Rigoletto" quartet. The sale of seats begins tomorrow morning.

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 14, 1892.

AN EVENING OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Congregational Church.

Mr. Nikisch must have been gratified not only at the size of the audience which listened last night to the delightful programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra rendered at the Congregational Church, but at the intelligent responsiveness which rewarded, with unstinted praise, its superb work. The programme was interesting, especially on account of the prominence given to modern musical thought. A prelude, adagio, and gavotte, by Bach, was the only exception, and in this case even the meaningless platitudes of the prelude were more than compensated for by the crisp and genial rendition of the hackneyed but always entertaining gavotte. This Bach number also being for strings, afforded an opportunity for the ear to revel in the perfection and polish to which this section of Mr. Nikisch's band has been brought—a degree which has long since passed the positive and comparative, and is now superlative in the highest sense.

The concert began with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, or rather suite. Of this dainty composition four numbers were played—a wedding march, with a number of ingenious variations, a tender bridal song, an exquisite andante, "In the Garden," and a merry, piquant dance. Goldmark, judging from his richly instrumentated Sakuntala overture and his exotic, not to say erotic, "Queen of Sheba," has always been a Fortuny in music, a tone-painter who spared not his color nor hesitated at the most dashing effects. The suite which was played last night was more like a Corot picture, conceived in an atmosphere of romance, and refreshingly natural. It was executed throughout its descriptive detail with charming spirit and freedom. In contrast to it was the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," the stupendous inspirations of which received from Mr. Nikisch a reverential interpretation. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who essayed the unsatisfactory "Mignon" of Liszt, and earned a deserved ovation by the altogether captivating manner in which she rendered some German songs to the sympathetic, delicate, and intelligent accompaniment of her husband upon the piano. The audience was thoroughly representative of the official and social life in the Capital. Mrs. Harrison, with Private Secretary Halford and some friends, occupied the pew reserved for the President, who was unable to be present.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN—FRIDAY JANUARY 15, 1892.

MUSIC FOR THE CLASSIC.

The Third Welcome for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An ideal program, a superb performance and a packed house were the features of the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Concert Hall last evening. It began with the Wagner "Faust" overture, which fully exhibited the fact that the orchestra was all present in good condition. The work is quite familiar to our symphony concert patrons in Baltimore, but none the less enjoyable on that account. Schubert's overture to Byron's "Manfred" was the second orchestral number, and the last Beethoven's immortal "Seventh Symphony." To these were added the Goethe-Liszt song-poem, "Mignon," transcribed by the composer for orchestra, and sung by Mrs. Nikisch. Her tender and sympathetic voice aroused a furore of enthusiasm, which was still further increased by her beautiful rendition of three songs, with piano, by Burgert, Richard Strauss and Schuman. She was several times recalled, and finally obliged to give an encore. She will always find a warm welcome in this city. Her piano accompaniments were charmingly rendered by her distinguished husband, who exhibits his excellent taste and skill as much at the piano as he does in swaying the baton for the whole orchestra. Altogether, the concert was one of the best ever given here, and enthusiastically enjoyed by the large musical assembly.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 1-13

Boston Symphony Concert.

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Concert Hall of the Academy of Music. It was the third concert in the series and the programme, while containing nothing very new, was of sufficient variety and calibre to bring out some of the most skilful work of which this grand orchestra is capable. The numbers given were the overture to "Faust," Wagner; the overture to "Manfred," Schumann, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Of these three the grand Symphony in A, which Beethoven regarded as one of his best, met with the warmest reception. Its range tested the powers of every part of the orchestra and found everywhere an exquisite rendering. The third movement, so full of weird haunting melody, was beautifully given, the orchestration was simply perfect and was marvelous in the light and delicate shading of tones. The audience was in entire touch with the music, and Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments at the close of every movement.

Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist and was accompanied by Mr. Nikisch. She met with a hearty reception, was recalled several times and was presented with a basket of beautiful flowers. She gave Liszt's "Mignon," and, accompanied with the piano, Bungert's "Amore e Luce," Strauss' "Staendchen" and Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht."

The fourth Symphony Concert will be given Thursday evening, February 11.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

Third Symphony Concert.

There was a certain disjointed character about the programme for Mr. Damrosch's third afternoon symphony concert that contrasted with his customary excellent judgment in constructing the list of musical numbers to be set before his patrons. Two symphonies, strikingly different in their nature and style, to be sure, figured as the most important orchestral selections, but neither was presented in its entirety, and, save as equally brilliant show pieces, their relation to one another was hardly made evident. Two dance measures from Gluck's "Iphigenia," delightful as they proved on their own merits and by reason of the admirable manner in which they were performed, did not add to the lacking element of completeness in a programme which laid itself open to the reproach that a certain amount had been sacrificed in favor of the distinguished soloist of the occasion.

"Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz's original combination of melodrama, symphony, and opera, has always been a favorite with Mr. Damrosch, as it was with his father, than whom no one ever did more in this city for the fame and glory of the great French composer. Yesterday's excerpts from his most characteristic work included the most important instrumental numbers, which, unlike many, at one time, supposedly glowing tone pictures, have lost none of their brilliant coloring through the lapse of time. As a mere feat in orchestration, the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony can, in spite of all that has been composed since first it was given to the world some fifty years ago, still assert its claim as one of the most remarkable achievements in the entire field of musical literature. Its brilliancy, power, and suggestiveness still remain unsurpassed. On the whole, Mr. Damrosch's performance proved one of rare excellence, and demonstrated the oft-tried experience that a conductor never conducts anything so well as those compositions with which he is in closest sympathy. Almost as good was the orchestra's playing of the Goldmark theme and variations from the "Rustic Wedding," of which it may be said that it did not suffer by the inevitable comparison with the work on Tuesday last of Mr. Nikisch's men in this same number.

Though the performance of the various selections added distinctly to the list of successes which our prominent orchestra has already to its credit, the fact cannot be disputed that the chief interest of yesterday's very humorous audience centred in the soloist. And when it is added that that soloist was the reigning hero of the hour, Ignace Jean Paderewski, the statement will not seem surprising. The principal number was the Rubinstein D minor concerto, which he has played at the Music Hall under Mr. Damrosch before, but which it was a rare privilege to hear from him again, in view of his magnificent interpretation of this justly favorite work. While it would be unjust to place his playing of this particular concerto on a higher artistic plane than any of the other five that have been heard from him, it certainly can be said that no other performance surpasses it in completeness, fascination, and mastery. It is of itself sufficient to stamp him as one of the greatest artists that has ever been heard in this country. Besides the concerto Mr. Paderewski played Chopin's C minor nocturne, the transcription of the "Ruins of Athens" march, and as an encore Rubinstein's C major study, which are all familiar as admirable examples of his varied style. To judge by his reception and the applause he earned yesterday afternoon it would seem as if his great popularity, far from diminishing, is on the increase at every new appearance.

For the fourth symphony concert, on Feb. 6, Miss de Vere is announced as soloist.

Concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

An enthusiastic audience listened to a most admirable concert given by the Kneisel Quartet yesterday evening at the Carnegie Music Hall. This was the third appearance of this organization during the season, and it added one more success to its brilliant record. Evenness of tone, artistic shading, musical expression, and intelligence of reading characterized the playing of the entire programme, which consisted of a quartet in E flat major, by Carl Dittersdorf, the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor, and Schubert's quintet in C major, in which Mr. Leo Schulz played the second violoncello part.

The most effective number of the concert was, perhaps, the selection from Grieg, so full of charming melody and richness of color. These qualities, as well as the weird harmonies and peculiarities of rhythm with which the Norse master loves to indulge, were brought out with rare skill and delicacy of sentiment deserving of commendation. The Schubert quartet was also given with much finish and force and elicited bursts of rapturous applause.

The only band of chamber-music musicians which may rank with the Kneisel Quartet is the New York Symphony Society's offspring, conducted by Mr. Brodsky, which has achieved such a deserved name of honor for its splendid performances; but many who attended the concert of last night appreciated the fact that the Kneisel Quartet has more repose, if perhaps a less showy quality, than Brodsky's.

Clipping from World, Baltimore, Md.

Date 1-13

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

'Tis always pleasant to see a musician accompany his wife at the piano and when Frau Nikisch appears with the Boston symphony orchestra her husband usually plays the piano part. She was as captivating as ever at Thursday night's concert, and sang in a charming manner a musical bouquet of three pretty German songs, including the beautiful "Fruhlingsnacht"—one of the sweetest things Schumann ever composed. Of course she was recalled and also received a basket of flowers.

The orchestral feature of the evening was the Beethoven symphony in A, including the celebrated movement funebre, which was rendered with all the solemn stateliness and delicacy of shading which the part requires. The allegro which concluded the symphony was brought out with vigor and energy, and the movements for full orchestra were especially noticeable. The Schumann and Wagner overtures, the other orchestral numbers were thoroughly appreciated by the audience, but as has been stated in previous criticisms this orchestra has reached such a standard of perfection that its production of works not requiring all its skill and power is somewhat disappointing to those who are accustomed to enjoying its concerts. Several familiar faces were missed from the band Thursday night. Among them were two of the cornet players [illegible] the last concert.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

NIKISCH IN BROOKLYN.

Third Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So firmly established in the regard of Brooklyn music-lovers has the Boston Symphony Orchestra become that even such a storm as yesterday's had comparatively little effect upon the attendance at the third rehearsal.

While the programme was not as attractive as the previous one, and consequently did not show the organization at its best, it was rendered in a most masterly manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 1 in B flat, commonly known as the "Spring Symphony." It was in the andante and the allegro that Nikisch and his men most effectively displayed their superiority. Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte received admirable expression from the strings, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was given with characteristic finish.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist and she earned several recalls by her artistic work in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral portions of that classical composition were rendered with delicacy.

By request the concert at the Academy this evening will begin at 8.15 instead of 8 o'clock as heretofore.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Their Third Concert at Carnegie Music Hall.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place last evening at Carnegie Music Hall. To say that the performers are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to insure in advance an excellent performance. The Quartette in E Flat Major of Von Dittersdorf with its simple broad andante on Haydn lines was played with a warm breadth and a fineness of shading which left little to be desired. In the allegro, with its difficult staccato, Mr. Kneisel displayed uncommon skill.

Grieg's "Andante from the G Minor Quartet," a happy selection, with its clear tenuity of subject, was finely played. In the opening solo of bass for the 'cello Mr. Schroeder had opportunity to prove the fineness of his tone. Messrs. Roth and Svecenski shared equal honors in the dramatic interlude, and the return to the original subject was perhaps the best bit of artistic shading of the evening.

The Schubert quintet afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Schulz in fine chromatic passages. The adagio was a bit of blended art, and the trio was rendered by each and all without a flaw.

This latter won the heart of the audience. The programme was of moderate length and closed with the short presto of the quintet.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

At the rehearsal for to-night's concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, yesterday afternoon, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a spirited and thoroughly musical fashion, greatly to the pleasure of the audience. The pianist took the final allegro at an almost bewildering pace, but had splendid support from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, which really did wonders with the accompaniment. At the close of the concerto Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was recalled several times.

The concert began with a smooth and thoroughly satisfactory performance of Schumann's B flat symphony, and ended with one of the best and most brilliant performances of the "Euryanthe" overture heard here in years. The programme also contained the Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.

Date 1-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme at the Academy yesterday was [illegible] excellent, if neither novel nor highly impressive, cast. Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was given a most attentive hearing. Her performance had more force and dignity than spirituality. The orchestra was in fine condition and gave a most interesting response to Mr. Nikisch's energetic baton. The regular concert is given to-night.

At the ninth Damrosch Sunday evening concert at the Carnegie Music Hall to-morrow, "Meistersinger" and "L'Amico Fritz" will be presented, and Frerruccio B. Busoni will play some of his own music.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

A KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston, gave its third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last night and thoroughly pleased its audience, which should have been larger, with a lovely performance of Schubert's quintet in C major. This was the chief event of the evening, but a curious quartet of the last century by Carl von Dittersdorf, and the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor also gave much pleasure.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1892.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica is to make her farewell appearance in America Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at Music Hall, in a grand operatic concert. She is to be assisted by Mrs. Scalchi, Mr. Paul Kalisch and Mr. Doeme, who makes his first appearance in Boston at this concert. A grand orchestra of 50, under Mr. R. Sapi, will also assist. Operatic selections in which the artists have distinguished themselves compose the first part of the programme, and the last part consists of the most taking number from "Cavalleria Rusticana." The sale of seats will open tomorrow at the Music Hall box office.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12-16

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

43

The Kneisel Quartet gave their third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last evening, where their next and last one will also be heard. It was a change that doubtless approved itself to all their hearers. For their programme they offered a list that did not at first seem of much attractiveness. A quartet of Carl von Dittersdorf had been exhumed for this occasion and was in the nature of a novelty. The works of the minor composers of the eighteenth century, for the most part, have rested during the nineteenth as quietly as their authors. This well-nigh forgotten quartet evinced qualities of interest, however, to an audience of these days. It is written in a fresh and melodious vein, well and clearly wrought out and in the true spirit of the string quartet. There are many traits in it that seem like a foreshadowing of Mozart's work in this line, the turn of a phrase, or a harmonic sequence or a touch here and there of general effect. Almost the only archaic feature of the composition is the fact that all three of the movements are in the same tonality, and that there is no slow movement. Mr. Kneisel, therefore, introduced after the first allegro an adagio in a different key, from another of Dittendorf's quartets, with a result fortunate in the effect of relief and contrast. The last movement is distinctly in the Hungarian style—probably a reminiscence, as are similar passages in other and greater musicians' works, of the composer's stay in the court of some Hungarian dignitary—and is an interesting case of the early adoption of the spirit of a folk-song that was destined later to become so prominent in music. Schubert's great quintet in C, in which Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello, and the lovely romance from Grieg's quartet, were the other pieces on the programme. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was never heard to better advantage for its virility and fire, its exquisite and never-failing finish, the absolute blending and subordination of each voice to the general effect, and the beautiful quality of tone. It is quartet playing of the highest order, judged by any standard, and was a source of unalloyed gratification to those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING JAN. 18, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

A grand operatic concert, which will bring to a close the very successful American tour of Mme. Nordica, will be given on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at Music Hall, and this charming prima donna will be surrounded by such noted artists as Mme. Scalchi, the great contralto; Herr Kalisch, the distinguished German tenor; Mr. Döme, baritone, from Covent Garden, London, and aided by an orchestra of 50 musicians, led by Mr. Sapio. The occasion possesses a good deal of interest from the eminence of the artists, besides being the last appearance for a time of a singer who first began her illustrious musical career in this country. A brilliant programme, calculated to display the famous company of artists at their best, has been arranged, and the occasion promises to be one of unusual interest. The sale of reserved seats begins this morning at Music Hall.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17.

Madame Lillian Nordica is to make her farewell appearance in America on Thursday evening January 28 at Music Hall, in a grand operatic concert. She is to be assisted by Mme. Scalchi the popular contralto, Mr. Paul Kalisch, the tenor, and Mr. Zoltan Döme, baritone, from Covent Garden, who makes his first appearance in Boston at this concert. A grand orchestra of fifty under Mr. R. Sapio will also assist. Operatic selections in which the artists have distinguished themselves compose the first part of the programme and the last part consists of the most taking number from "Cavalleria Rusticana." The sale of seats will open tomorrow at the Music Hall Box office.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 1-17

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed the doings of its present visit to New-York at its concert last evening in Brooklyn, the third of the Philharmonic Society's series. Mr. Nikish gave another proof of his fondness for and complete appreciation of Schumann in a performance of his first symphony, beautifully shaded and instinct with buoyant life; then there was Bachrich's scoring, for strings, of three movements, by Bach, played with much richness of effect and lucidity of utterance; and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The latter was made a fitting companion piece to the "Freischutz" overture, as it was heard at the orchestra's New-York concert earlier in the week, of such an almost intoxicating brilliancy was it, and such a pregnant dramatic forcefulness. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who played Rubinstein's D-minor concerto. This selection doubtless was not meant to be the challenge to a daring comparison, but circumstances made it so in the fact that Mr. Paderewski in New-York played the same work this week, at the very same hours. That Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's interpretation of it stood the comparison so well as it did was a splendid tribute to her powers. It was fiery, impetuous, genuinely romantic and adequate upon the technical side; what it lacked was chiefly a certain dignity and largeness of feeling, and a fuller rhythmical symmetry. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's playing was highly appreciated by the audience—which had sat somewhat impassive before the stirring work of the orchestra—and she was several times recalled.

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 14, 1892.

AN EVENING OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Congregational Church.

Mr. Nikisch must have been gratified not only at the size of the audience which listened last night to the delightful programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra rendered at the Congregational Church, but at the intelligent responsiveness which rewarded, with unstinted praise, its superb work. The programme was interesting, especially on account of the prominence given to modern musical thought. A prelude, adagio, and gavotte, by Bach, was the only exception, and in this case even the meaningless platitudes of the prelude were more than compensated for by the crisp and genial rendition of the hackneyed but always entertaining gavotte. This Bach number also being for strings, afforded an opportunity for the ear to revel in the perfection and polish to which this section of Mr. Nikisch's band has been brought—a degree which has long since passed the positive and comparative, and is now superlative in the highest sense.

The concert began with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, or rather suite. Of this dainty composition four numbers were played—a wedding march, with a number of ingenious variations, a tender bridal song, an exquisite andante, "In the Garden," and a merry, piquant dance. Goldmark, judging from his richly instrumentated Sakuntala overture and his exotic, not to say erotic, "Queen of Sheba," has always been a Fortuny in music, a tone-painter who spared not his color nor hesitated at the most dashing effects. The suite which was played last night was more like a Corot picture, conceived in an atmosphere of romance, and refreshingly natural. It was executed throughout its descriptive detail with charming spirit and freedom. In contrast to it was the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," the stupendous inspirations of which received from Mr. Nikisch a reverential interpretation. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who essayed the unsatisfactory "Mignon" of Liszt, and earned a deserved ovation by the altogether captivating manner in which she rendered some German songs to the sympathetic, delicate, and intelligent accompaniment of her husband upon the piano. The audience was thoroughly representative of the official and social life in the Capital. Mrs. Harrison, with Private Secretary Halford and some friends, occupied the pew reserved for the President, who was unable to be present.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN--FRIDAY

JANUARY 15, 1892.

MUSIC FOR THE CLASSIC.

The Third Welcome for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An ideal program, a superb performance and a packed house were the features of the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Concert Hall last evening. It began with the Wagner "Faust" overture, which fully exhibited the fact that the orchestra was all present in good condition. The work is quite familiar to our symphony concert patrons in Baltimore, but none the less enjoyable on that account. Schubert's overture to Byron's "Manfred" was the second orchestral number, and the last Beethoven's immortal "Seventh Symphony." To these were added the Goethe-Liszt song-poem, "Mignon," transcribed by the composer for orchestra, and sung by Mrs. Nikisch. Her tender and sympathetic voice aroused a furore of enthusiasm, which was still further increased by her beautiful rendition of three songs, with piano, by Burgert, Richard Strauss and Schuman. She was several times recalled, and finally obliged to give an encore. She will always find a warm welcome in this city. Her piano accompaniments were charmingly rendered by her distinguished husband, who exhibits his excellent taste and skill as much at the piano as he does in swaying the baton for the whole orchestra. Altogether, the concert was one of the best ever given here, and enthusiastically enjoyed by the large musical assembly.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 1-13

Boston Symphony Concert.

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Concert Hall of the Academy of Music. It was the third concert in the series and the programme, while containing nothing very new, was of sufficient variety and calibre to bring out some of the most skilful work of which this grand orchestra is capable. The numbers given were the overture to "Faust," Wagner; the overture to "Manfred," Schumann, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Of these three the grand Symphony in A, which Beethoven regarded as one of his best, met with the warmest reception. Its range tested the powers of every part of the orchestra and found everywhere an exquisite rendering. The third movement, so full of weird haunting melody, was beautifully given, the orchestration was simply perfect and was marvelous in the light and delicate shading of tones. The audience was in entire touch with the music, and Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments at the close of every movement.

Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist and was accompanied by Mr. Nikisch. She met with a hearty reception, was recalled several times and was presented with a basket of beautiful flowers. She gave Liszt's "Mignon," and, accompanied with the piano, Bungert's "Amore e Luce," Strauss' "Staendchen" and Schumann's "Fruchlingsnacht."

The fourth Symphony Concert will be given Thursday evening, February 11.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

Third Symphony Concert.

There was a certain disjointed character about the programme for Mr. Damrosch's third afternoon symphony concert that contrasted with his customary excellent judgment in constructing the list of musical numbers to be set before his patrons. Two symphonies, strikingly different in their nature and style, to be sure, figured as the most important orchestral selections, but neither was presented in its entirety, and, save as equally brilliant show pieces, their relation to one another was hardly made evident. Two dance measures from Gluck's "Iphigenia," delightful as they proved on their own merits and by reason of the admirable manner in which they were performed, did not add to the lacking element of completeness in a programme which laid itself open to the reproach that a certain amount had been sacrificed in favor of the distinguished soloist of the occasion.

"Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz's original combination of melodrama, symphony, and opera, has always been a favorite with Mr. Damrosch, as it was with his father, than whom no one ever did more in this city for the fame and glory of the great French composer. Yesterday's excerpts from his most characteristic work included the most important instrumental numbers, which, unlike many, at one time, supposedly glowing tone pictures, have lost none of their brilliant coloring through the lapse of time. As a mere feat in orchestration, the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony can, in spite of all that has been composed since first it was given to the world some fifty years ago, still assert its claim as one of the most remarkable achievements in the entire field of musical literature. Its brilliancy, power, and suggestiveness still remain unsurpassed. On the whole, Mr. Damrosch's performance proved one of rare excellence, and demonstrated the oft-tried experience that a conductor never conducts anything so well as those compositions with which he is in closest sympathy. Almost as good was the orchestra's playing of the Goldmark theme and variations from the "Rustic Wedding," of which it may be said that it did not suffer by the inevitable comparison with the work on Tuesday last of Mr. Nikisch's men in this same number.

Though the performance of the various selections added distinctly to the list of successes which our prominent orchestra has already to its credit, the fact cannot be disputed that the chief interest of yesterday's very humorous audience centred in the soloist. And when it is added that that soloist was the reigning hero of the hour, Ignace Jean Paderewski, the statement will not seem surprising. The principal number was the Rubinstein D minor concerto, which he has played at the Music Hall under Mr. Damrosch before, but which it was a rare privilege to hear from him again, in view of his magnificent interpretation of this justly favorite work. While it would be unjust to place his playing of this particular concerto on a higher artistic plane than any of the other five that have been heard from him, it certainly can be said that no other performance surpasses it in completeness, fascination, and mastery. It is of itself sufficient to stamp him as one of the greatest artists that has ever been heard in this country. Besides the concerto Mr. Paderewski played Chopin's C minor nocturne, the transcription of the "Ruins of Athens" march, and as an encore Rubinstein's C major study, which are all familiar as admirable examples of his varied style. To judge by his reception and the applause he earned yesterday afternoon it would seem as if his great popularity, far from diminishing, is on the increase at every new appearance.

For the fourth symphony concert, on Feb. 6, Miss de Vere is announced as soloist.

Concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

An enthusiastic audience listened to a most admirable concert given by the Kneisel Quartet yesterday evening at the Carnegie Music Hall. This was the third appearance of this organization during the season, and it added one more success to its brilliant record. Evenness of tone, artistic shading, musical expression, and intelligence of reading characterized the playing of the entire programme, which consisted of a quartet in E flat major, by Carl Dittersdorf, the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor, and Schubert's quintet in C major, in which Mr. Leo Schulz played the second violoncello part.

The most effective number of the concert was, perhaps, the selection from Grieg, so full of charming melody and richness of color. These qualities, as well as the weird harmonies and peculiarities of rhythm with which the Norse master loves to indulge, were brought out with rare skill and delicacy of sentiment deserving of commendation. The Schubert quartet was also given with much finish and force and elicited bursts of rapturous applause.

The only band of chamber-music musicians which may rank with the Kneisel Quartet is the New York Symphony Society's offspring, conducted by Mr. Brodsky, which has achieved such a deserved name of honor for its splendid performances; but many who attended the concert of last night appreciated the fact that the Kneisel Quartet has more repose, if perhaps a less showy quality, than Brodsky's.

Clipping from World, Baltimore, Md.

Date 1-13

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

'Tis always pleasant to see a musician accompany his wife at the piano, and when Frau Nikisch appears with the Boston symphony orchestra her husband usually plays the piano part. She was as captivating as ever at Thursday night's concert, and sang in a charming manner a musical bouquet of three pretty German songs, including the beautiful "Fruhlingsnacht"—one of the sweetest things Schumann ever composed. Of course she was recalled and also received a basket of flowers.

The orchestral feature of the evening was the Beethoven symphony in A, including the celebrated movement funebre, which was rendered with all the solemn stateliness and delicacy of shading which the part requires. The allegro which concluded the symphony was brought out with vigor and energy, and the movements for full orchestra were especially noticeable. The Schumann and Wagner overtures, the other orchestral numbers were thoroughly appreciated by the audience, but as has been stated in previous criticisms this orchestra has reached such a standard of perfection that its production of works not requiring all its skill and power is somewhat disappointing to those who are accustomed to enjoying its concerts. Several familiar faces were missed from the band Thursday night. Among them were two of the cornet players heard here at the last concert.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

NIKISCH IN BROOKLYN.

Third Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So firmly established in the regard of Brooklyn music-lovers has the Boston Symphony Orchestra become that even such a storm as yesterday's had comparatively little effect upon the attendance at the third rehearsal.

While the programme was not as attractive as the previous one, and consequently did not show the organization at its best, it was rendered in a most masterly manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 1 in B flat, commonly known as the "Spring Symphony." It was in the andante and the allegro that Nikisch and his men most effectively displayed their superiority. Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte received admirable expression from the strings, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was given with characteristic finish.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist and she earned several recalls by her artistic work in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral portions of that classical composition were rendered with delicacy.

By request the concert at the Academy this evening will begin at 8.15 instead of 8 o'clock as heretofore.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Their Third Concert at Carnegie Music Hall.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place last evening at Carnegie Music Hall. To say that the performers are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to insure in advance an excellent performance. The Quartette in E Flat Major of Von Dittersdorf with its simple broad andante on Haydn lines was played with a warm breadth and a fineness of shading which left little to be desired. In the allegro, with its difficult staccato, Mr. Kneisel displayed uncommon skill.

Grieg's "Andante from the G Minor Quartet," a happy selection, with its clear tenuity of subject, was finely played. In the opening solo of bass for the 'cello Mr. Schroeder had opportunity to prove the fineness of his tone. Messrs. Roth and Svecenski shared equal honors in the dramatic interlude, and the return to the original subject was perhaps the best bit of artistic shading of the evening.

The Schubert quintet afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Schulz in fine chromatic passages. The adagio was a bit of blended art, and the trio was rendered by each and all without a flaw.

This latter won the heart of the audience. The programme was of moderate length and closed with the short presto of the quintet.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

At the rehearsal for to-night's concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, yesterday afternoon, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a spirited and thoroughly musical fashion, greatly to the pleasure of the audience. The pianist took the final allegro at an almost bewildering pace, but had splendid support from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, which really did wonders with the accompaniment. At the close of the concerto Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was recalled several times.

The concert began with a smooth and thoroughly satisfactory performance of Schumann's B flat symphony, and ended with one of the best and most brilliant performances of the "Euryanthe" overture heard here in years. The programme also contained the Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.

Date 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme at the Academy yesterday was of an excellent, if neither novel nor highly impressive, cast. Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was given a most attentive hearing. Her performance had more force and dignity than spirituality. The orchestra was in fine condition and gave a most interesting response to Mr. Nikisch's energetic baton. The regular concert is given to-night.

At the ninth Damrosch Sunday evening concert at the Carnegie Music Hall tomorrow, "Meistersinger" and "L'Amico Fritz" will be presented, and Frerruccio B. Busoni will play some of his own music.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 1/16

A KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston, gave its third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last night and thoroughly pleased its audience, which should have been larger, with a lovely performance of Schubert's quintet in C major. This was the chief event of the evening, but a curious quartet of the last century by Carl von Dittersdorf, and the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor also gave much pleasure.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1892.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica is to make her farewell appearance in America Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at Music Hall, in a grand operatic concert. She is to be assisted by Mrs. Scalchi, Mr. Paul Kalisch and Mr. Doeme, who makes his first appearance in Boston at this concert. A grand orchestra of 50, under Mr. R. Sapi, will also assist. Operatic selections in which the artists have distinguished themselves compose the first part of the programme, and the last part consists of the most taking number from "Cavalleria Rusticana." The sale of seats will open tomorrow at the Music Hall box office.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 12-16

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

43

The Kneisel Quartet gave their third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last evening, where their next and last one will also be heard. It was a change that doubtless approved itself to all their hearers. For their programme they offered a list that did not at first seem of much attractiveness. A quartet of Carl von Dittersdorf had been exhumed for this occasion and was in the nature of a novelty. The works of the minor composers of the eighteenth century, for the most part, have rested during the nineteenth as quietly as their authors. This well-nigh forgotten quartet evinced qualities of interest, however, to an audience of these days. It is written in a fresh and melodious vein, well and clearly wrought out and in the true spirit of the string quartet. There are many traits in it that seem like a foreshadowing of Mozart's work in this line, the turn of a phrase, or a harmonic sequence or a touch here and there of general effect. Almost the only archaic feature of the composition is the fact that all three of the movements are in the same tonality, and that there is no slow movement. Mr. Kneisel, therefore, introduced after the first allegro an adagio in a different key, from another of Dittendorf's quartets, with a result fortunate in the effect of relief and contrast. The last movement is distinctly in the Hungarian style—probably a reminiscence, as are similar passages in other and greater musicians' works, of the composer's stay in the court of some Hungarian dignitary—and is an interesting case of the early adoption of the spirit of a folk-song that was destined later to become so prominent in music. Schubert's great quintet in C, in which Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello, and the lovely romance from Grieg's quartet, were the other pieces on the programme. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was never heard to better advantage for its virility and fire, its exquisite and never-failing finish, the absolute blending and subordination of each voice to the general effect, and the beautiful quality of tone. It is quartet playing of the highest order, judged by any standard, and was a source of unalloyed gratification to those who heard it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING JAN. 18, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

A grand operatic concert, which will bring to a close the very successful American tour of Mme. Nordica, will be given on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at Music Hall, and this charming prima donna will be surrounded by such noted artists as Mme. Scalchi, the great contralto; Herr Kalisch, the distinguished German tenor; Mr. Döme, baritone, from Covent Garden, London, and aided by an orchestra of 50 musicians, led by Mr. Sapio. The occasion possesses a good deal of interest from the eminence of the artists, besides being the last appearance for a time of a singer who first began her illustrious musical career in this country. A brilliant programme, calculated to display the famous company of artists at their best, has been arranged, and the occasion promises to be one of unusual interest. The sale of reserved seats begins this morning at Music Hall.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17.

Madame Lillian Nordica is to make her farewell appearance in America on Thursday evening January 28 at Music Hall, in a grand operatic concert. She is to be assisted by Mme. Scalchi the popular contralto, Mr. Paul Kalisch, the tenor, and Mr. Zoltan Döme, baritone, from Covent Garden, who makes his first appearance in Boston at this concert. A grand orchestra of fifty under Mr. R. Sapi will also assist. Operatic selections in which the artists have distinguished themselves compose the first part of the programme and the last part consists of the most taking number from "Cavalleria Rusticana." The sale of seats will open tomorrow at the Music Hall Box office.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 1-17

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed the doings of its present visit to New-York at its concert last evening in Brooklyn, the third of the Philharmonic Society's series. Mr. Nikish gave another proof of his fondness for and complete appreciation of Schumann in a performance of his first symphony, beautifully shaded and instinct with buoyant life; then there was Bachrich's scoring, for strings, of three movements, by Bach, played with much richness of effect and lucidity of utterance; and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The latter was made a fitting companion piece to the "Freischutz" overture, as it was heard at the orchestra's New-York concert earlier in the week, of such an almost intoxicating brilliancy was it, and such a pregnant dramatic forcefulness. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who played Rubinstein's D-minor concerto. This selection doubtless was not meant to be the challenge to a daring comparison, but circumstances made it so in the fact that Mr. Paderewski in New-York played the same work this week, at the very same hours. That Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's interpretation of it stood the comparison so well as it did was a splendid tribute to her powers. It was fiery, impetuous, genuinely romantic and adequate upon the technical side; what it lacked was chiefly a certain dignity and largeness of feeling, and a fuller rhythmical symmetry. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's playing was highly appreciated by the audience—which had sat somewhat impassive before the stirring work of the orchestra—and she was several times recalled.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, January 12, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON - 1891 - 92

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-16

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston [illegible] orchestra, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be given to-night, and the rehearsal for the programme was held at the same place yesterday afternoon. It is a delightful bill that Mr. Nikisch offers—well chosen, artistic, just of the right duration and played superbly. Schumann's First symphony is the leading and important number, and it is safe to declare that it has never been given with more dignity, more fire, more sweetness than yesterday. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it does not differ radically from the versions that have been heard in the concert room, yet it is his own and an obvious result of sympathetic study. He takes the time for the opening movement at an unusually slow rate, which gives the more effect to the brisker measures that follow and that imparts weight and gravity to the subject. It may be that Schumann intended this to be a "spring" symphony, as he hints, but the beginning is not in the vein that is commonly associated with ideas of spring; certainly, in the version that was heard yesterday there was more of mystery and tragedy than of laughter. What are serious in the idea and declarative in the treatment are congenial to Mr. Nikisch, who exalts his interpretation of the work to as grand an altitude as possible, so that it stirs as deeply as the Fifth symphony, and it discloses beauty that Beethoven does not invariably touch. Yet it is not all in the heroic vein, for the larghetto is as lovely, the scherzo as playful and the ending allegro as enlivening as anything in music, and they inforce the impression that it is not easy to hear too much of Schumann and his symphonies. The thought, the refinement, the expression, the tone color, are the work of a poet and a master. In his piano music Schumann is once in a while restricted by the inadequacy of his medium, and again he is led by its facility to indulge in feats of technic that are caviare to the general and dry to the initiate, but in his orchestral work he is at concert pitch, and his thought always fills the measure of the means at his command. As in the case of some writers and artists who did not meet with the success that they merited during their lives, so will Schumann grow in popular esteem, and it is a question if his position is not determined to be closer to Beethoven than it is now conceded to be. He celebrates in his work the emancipation of music from the formalism that affected nearly all musicians before his time, and he shows its capacity for intellectual as well as emotional expression. The more severe but equally magnificent Bach was contrasted in the violin concerto that Bachrich has turned into a concert piece for string band, and that was played yesterday in a delightful manner. The brightness of the strings, their sonorous quality, their briskness and certainty of attack, their pliancy and variety of tone that was now like singing and anon like the roll of an organ, their wonderful unity and their feeling were illustrated in this number, while a new value was disclosed in the largo from the vivacious and grateful overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," that was the last piece on the programme. This overture, combining the characteristics of both the classic and romantic periods in music, written in a time when the arts were in transition from one to the other, is none too often heard, and it was regarded by Weber himself as the best of his overtures. The opening and the fugued movement are in the older style: the largo, delivered from muted strings, might have been written yesterday. It was played with a sustained and voice like utterance, soft, strange, almost unearthly in its beauty. The soloist of the concert is Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler from Chicago, who plays on the piano with confidence and vivacity. The grandiose D minor concerto of Rubinstein is her selection—a work in which the Russian shows himself, despite the composer's effort to clothe him in a conventional and Teutonic guise. Mrs. Zeisler is a remarkably facile player and she imparts a surprising degree of spirit to her work. The daring of her work sometimes involves her in difficulties, and a false note is heard occasionally, but then, Rubinstein plays false. Her most obvious fault is in the management of the pedal, for, when making harmonic changes, as between the tonic and dominant, she occasionally leaves the pedal open, thus throwing half tone vibrations together and producing discord. This is not uncommon with amateurs, but it is not to be excused in the case of any player. In the closing allegro Mrs. Zeisler took a pace that made the musicians open their eyes and put them to some trouble to keep up, the wood wind department showing a little irregularity, but the soloist was no more to be restrained than a race horse. The time for beginning the concert this evening has been put off until 8:15, by request of some of the ticket holders. The next appearances of the orchestra, after to-night, will be on the 12th and 13th of February.

CITIZEN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1-16

THE NIKISCH REHEARSAL.

An [illegible] at the Academy of Music.

The programme of the Nikisch rehearsal given yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music, included Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, andante un poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace, larghetto, scherzo molto vivace, allegro animato e grazioso; Rubenstein, piano concerto in D minor, moderato, moderato assai, allegro assai; Bach, praeludium, adagio and gavotte, for string orchestra, arranged by Baehrich; Weber, overture, "Euryanthe," soloist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. Ehrlert says "that Schumann's symphony possesses all the charm of a first creation. It is imbued with the fragrant breath of a young pine grove in which the sun plays at hide-and-seek; it embodies as much of a bridal air as if Schumann were celebrating his symphonic honeymoon." "Schumann," writes Wasielewski, "conceived and treated the symphonic form in a peculiar spirit, based on the study of masterpieces, especially those of Beethoven. The ideas are thorougly Schumannesque. Higher artistic value is bestowed on them by the fact that these ideas are expressed in the old established form. They seldow reveal the arbitrary enormities which so often occur in his earlier works." The concert might have been appropriately called a professional matinee, from the number of teachers, organists, composers and directors who were present, and who, judging by their faces, were hugely gratified; one said to another, "What a splendid symphony," and the rejoinder was "Yes, and what a splendid orchestra." A prominent professor, prominent by right of justly conferred title, declared to the writer that he had never heard such an unrivaled exposition of a colossal work before."

Mr. Nikisch is reported to have expressed himself as being highly gratified with Brooklyn audiences. Brooklyn returns the compliment by saying that it is both honored and flattered by Mr. Nikisch's presence. It is true, on his first appearance, while admitting the beauty and unity of his band, they were at a loss to understand some of his methods and mannerisms as a director; but they now realize that these are in no sense purposeless displays of the man's individual eccentricities, but form a part of his working tools, by the skillful use of which he moves his eighty-five people with an automatic regularity, rarely seen or heard in any country; in other words they are free to confess that Mr. Nikisch is the worthy captain of an accomplished troupe of artists whom he has trained to an implicit obedience so exact as to be described only by the one word—faultless. Long as the symphony is, no one manifested signs of fatigue or weariness. How could they, when every bar of every movement displayed some peculiar charm? The scherzo was a revelation, and the allegro resistless in the snap and vivacity of its tempo. It used to be asserted that there was something amateurish in Schumann's handling of his instruments; mistakes in scoring might have been discovered. Such things have occurred with oven greater men; but the dispersion and distribution of parts for wood, brass and strings, is too elaborate and systematic to be accounted for as the work of an impetuous genius plodding in the dark. A note here and there from the brass, a bar or two from the strings, just a whisper from the flute and oboe, followed by periods of eloquent silence, for the timely rests occurred with persistent frequency, show without a doubt the painstaking forethought of the author and his almost intuitive knowledge of the best attainable orchestral effects. Each of the five movements was loudly applauded. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler who played Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor, created a very favorable impression, but would have shown to better advantage in a less exacting production; not that her playing was faulty, for her execution belongs to the first class of piano soloists; not that she lacks imagination, or sympathy, or keen artistic instincts; she simply failed, if failure it can be called, for lack of the power, almost prodigious, which that great work so preeminently demands. As time advances and her technique strengthens so that like a Naysmith hammer she can crush a hundred tons or flatten a hair, she may be able to achieve or arrive at a higher measure of success; as it was, however, her performance was so acceptable as to call for a triple recall. The work by Bach for string orchestra was particularly fine and the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, which brought the concert to a close, was never heard to better advantage. The programme will be repeated to-night and those who have not yet heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, should be present, for to listen to it attentively is to acquire an important part of a liberal musical education.

16

The Selica was Mme. Nordica, who was specially engaged to fill a role that none of Messrs. Abbey and Grau's singers have in their repertoire. Mme. Nordica, who before the fourth act begged the indulgence of the audience on account of a slight hoarseness, was heard as the Madagascar queen two years ago during the Patti-Tamagno season at the Metropolitan Opera House, and her conscientious work in the part is still what it was then.

Much of the music is sung by Mme. Nordica with capital effect; it is only in the more dramatic moments that her temperament is found to prove insufficient. To counterbalance this short-coming, she may be credited with looking the part better than any of her predecessors, investing it with a degree of attractiveness that has not been known since the days of Lucca.

The minor roles in the opera were fairly well filled, and both orchestra and chorus exerted themselves manfully for the general success. Last evening's performance was, on the whole, one of the best that have yet been heard at the Metropolitan Opera House.

THE SYMPHONY SOCIETY'S CONCERT.

The third afternoon concert of the Symphony Society's course at Music Hall yesterday gave great satisfaction to a large audience. M. Ignace Paderewski was the solo performer, and, of course, the chief attraction. He played the Rubinstein D minor concerto with the same delightful effect as on a previous occasion, and he was admirably seconded by the orchestra under Mr. Damrosch's direction.

The dignity and beauty of the composition received adequate expression, and the pianist was at his best during the entire performance. His other numbers were Chopin's C minor nocturne, Rubinstein's arrangement of the march from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and for an encore Rubinstein's C major etude. In these all the delightful characteristics of his art were displayed.

The orchestral numbers given were the theme and variations from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," the passacaille and minuet from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and three scenes from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." In the last named number, especially the work of the orchestra, was deserving of high praise and brought an admirable concert to an agreeable close.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET'S CONCERT.

The concert given by the Kneisel Quartet in the chamber music room of Music Hall last evening showed that excellent organization at its best. In delicacy of finish, justness of expression and a certain repose that at times is thoroughly welcome, this organization has no superior. These qualities were shown in its rendering of the programme, which consisted of a quartet in E flat major by Carl Dittersdorf, the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor and Schubert's quintet in C major. The critical audience present showed its satisfaction with the performance, and with good reason.

⁂

A Discussion of Relative Merit.

Those who have questioned THE DISPATCH'S remark that Walter Damrosch's orchestra is not the equal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be surprised to see what the New York papers said of the Boston band upon its first concert there this season: Sun, "The palm of supremacy over all kindred organizations on this side of the water;" Herald, "The finest body of strings ever heard in this country;" Recorder, "Nothing like it in New York, neither in quality nor in ensemble;" World, "Among the three or four foremost orchestras of the world." To which in the same week was added by the Brooklyn Eagle, "The rival of any force of the kind in the world," and by the Philadelphia Record, "The most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country."

It is much more pleasant to quote these praises than to quote the words of censure that frequently appear in the best critics' reviews of Mr. Damrosch's concerts. Suffice it to say that THE DISPATCH accorded the New York orchestra and its conductor more generous treatment than they commonly receive at home and elsewhere. On the many points as to which the defects of Cyclorama Hall rendered a positive judgment unsafe, the benefit of the doubt was invariably given to the performers.

Yet, however clearly the performances fell below the highest standards in this or that respect, the visit of Mr. Damrosch and his men to this orchestrally benighted community was an important and most enjoyable occasion, as has always been said in these columns. The Allegheny Musical Association should have every encouragement to repeat the experiment.

RNING JOURNAL, New York, N. Y. 1/17

te

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital of song and piano music next Wednesday afternoon at Chickering Hall, on which occasion Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian lad, brought here to be educated by Mr. Adolph Brodsky, will be heard on the violin.

Fraulein Adele Aus der Ohe will play in Chicago during February, with the Thomas Symphony Orchestra. She is also engaged for a number of recitals in the West.

On the 23d, the Music Club will have an evening of music, followed by a supper and dance in the Assembly Rooms of the Metropolitan Opera House. A trio by Brahms, for piano, violin and horn, performed by Arthur Friedheim, Clifford Schmidt and Carl Pieper; Sinding's variations in E flat minor for two pianos, played by Franz Rummel and Arthur Friedheim, and Schubert's 'Florellen" quintet, given by Franz Rummel, Richard Arnold, Emil Gramm, Victor Herbert and E. Manoli, will be among the musical features.

Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its able conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Paderewski says: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not excepting the orchestra of the conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the conservatoire, but as a whole the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the conservatoire. After the performance of my concert in Brooklyn, in which Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again, and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

Rubenstein is playing in St. Petersburg and Moscow for the benefit of the sufferers by famine.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1-16

The Symphony Concert.

Indications point to a big house at the Academy for the symphony concert, Feb. 16th. We trust that the receipts will be satisfactory enough to warrant their appearance here at least once every season. With Mr. Nikisch's great ability as a conductor and his willingness to produce novelties, there is no reason why the programme this year should not surpass in interest any they have yet given us. While nothing has been positively announced yet, it is pretty sure that one of the numbers will be a composition by the great Russian, Tschnaikowsky, which introduces solo work for the flute, oboe, clarionet, English horn and bassoon, as well as some violin work for Mr. Kneisel. This composition, which the orchestra has already rendered in Brooklyn, Baltimore and other cities, is said to be one of the most "taking" they have ever given. It is also expected that Mr. Nikisch will produce one of the new compositions he recently gave in Boston by an American composer, possibly Mr. DeKoven's "Dance of the Gnomes." Mr. Ellis guarantees that the concert will be considerably longer than the one last given here, and the popularity of his soloist is already assured.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

1/17

Some interest is excited by the competition of the Seidl society and the Philharmonic continuation by Nikisch and the Boston orchestra. The friendly rivalry ought [redacted] music. There might in such a case be differences of public opinion as to which is the stronger and more thoroughly balanced and drilled band, who is the better conductor, the more skillful compiler of programmes. From a purely art point of view these are the most important, the controlling considerations. But they are not the only conditions of success. The social factor and other incidental influences should not be overlooked. Good music is no less good if it is heard in a cheerful place amid attractive surroundings, and musical impressions lose nothing of their wholesome, refining, cultivating effect if their vehicle is made popular, even fashionable—to use in a tolerable sense an objectionable word. Seidl undoubtedly appreciates the backing of his namesake local society, which gives an unmistakable impulse to his series of concerts. Nikisch doubtless duly values the nominal indorsement of the Philharmonic, with a generation of good work behind it, a name which has been a tower of strength. But, apart from this, as to the many things which go to furnish a setting and an atmosphere, Brooklyn is simply one of the stations on the Boston orchestra's season's tour. The Philharmonic society kept the art standard at the highest point, but it never forgot the incidentals. The sudden withdrawal of these is doubtless advantageous to the Seidl society by the suggested contrast. A hint fro the old Philharmonic management to the ne might have been wise.

EVENING POST, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-16

BOSTON IN BROOKLYN.

Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of rare excellence for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to interpret in the Brooklyn Academy of Music to-night; and yesterday's public rehearsal indicated that the performance will be superb. The poetry of Schumann's first symphony was never more perfectly revealed than on this occasion, and the same may be said of the Bach Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler played Rubinstein's D-minor concerto with much spirit, though with somewhat less certainty and technical finish than she usually displays. She seemed to be nervous, being possibly disturbed in mind by the fact that Mr. Paderewski was playing the same concerto in New York about the same hour.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date

The Symphony Concert.

The public seem to appreciate the fact that the concert of Feb 16th, will be given by the finest orchestra in America, and the subscriptions are coming in constantly. People should have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra, at least once [redacted] ing prevents except the great expense of giving these concerts and and lack of the large number of patrons, necessary to make a financial success. Other cities pack the houses, wherever the orchestra appears, and it is to be hoped that Fall River will show its appreciation this season and favor them with an audience limited only by the size of the hall. One thing must be remembered that the organization is so big that the concert can be heard as well in the remote seats of the dress circle as well as near the stage.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

1/17

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The third concert in the philharmonic course by the Boston symphony orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, and was a repetition of the rehearsal that was reviewed in the EAGLE last evening. Schumann's beautiful first symphony, Bach's stirring suite that brought out the surprising value of the strings, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture with its wonderful large for muted strings and Rubinstein's D minor concerto formed the programme. The orchestra played magnificently and was heartily applauded, while in the piano number Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler played with a Delphic fury that startled the audience and provoked her recall. The attendance was larger than at the rehearsal. On February 12 and 13 the orchestra will be heard again in Brooklyn.

TELEGRAM, Worcester, Mass.

Date 1/18

With Symphony Orchestra Musicians.

John J. Heron is to go, to-night, to Boston, to play the piano with a detachment of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has been [redacted] given by Mrs. [illegible] Gardner.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

At the rehearsal for to-night's concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, yesterday afternoon, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a spirited and thoroughly musical fashion, greatly to the pleasure of the audience. The pianist took the final allegro at an almost bewildering pace, but had splendid support from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, which really did wonders with the accompaniment. At the close of the concerto Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was recalled several times.

The concert began with a smooth and thoroughly satisfactory performance of Schumann's B flat symphony, and ended with one of the best and most brilliant performances of the "Euryanthe" overture heard here in years. The programme also contained the Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.

SAY THERE WAS NO TROUBLE.

The wait between the third and fourth acts of "L'Africaine" at the Metropolitan Opera House last night was quite long and caused a good deal of gossip in the lobby of the house.

It was said that Mme. Nordica, the prima donna, had been insulted by Signor Vianesi and refused to continue until the musical conductor had made her an apology. The insult, it was said, took place during the third act and while the prima donna was singing.

"No," said Mr. Maurice Grau, "the story is all wrong. Mme. Nordica did not feel well and wanted an apology made to the audience before the curtain because she was afraid she could not do justice to her part."

"Oh my! the story is absurd," said Signor Vianesi. "Mme. Nordica and myself are the best of friends. She simply wanted to cut some of her music out. That is all there is to it."

"There has been no trouble at all," said Mme. Nordica. "During the early part of the evening my hearing seemed to leave me, and I had to watch Signor Vianesi very closely. I did not know that I would be able to continue and if I had to I thought an apology should be made. I had my doctor here and also Mr. De Reszke's, and without their help I don't think I would be able to get through."

A KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston, gave its third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last night and thoroughly pleased its audience, which should have been larger, with a lovely performance of Schubert's quintet in C major. This was the chief event of the evening, but a curious quartet of the last century by Carl von Dittersdorf, and the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor also gave much pleasure.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

NIKISCH IN BROOKLYN.

Third Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So firmly established in the regard of Brooklyn music-lovers has the Boston Symphony Orchestra become that even such a storm as yesterday's had comparatively little effect upon the attendance at the third rehearsal.

While the programme was not as attractive as the previous one, and consequently did not show the organization at its best, it was rendered in a most masterly manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 1 in B flat, commonly known as the "Spring Symphony." It was in the andante and the allegro that Nikisch and his men most effectively displayed their superiority. Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte received admirable expression from the strings, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was given with characteristic finish.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist and she earned several recalls by her artistic work in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral portions of that classical composition were rendered with delicacy.

By request the concert at the Academy this evening will begin at 8.15 instead of 8 o'clock as heretofore.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Their Third Concert at Carnegie Music Hall.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place last evening at Carnegie Music Hall. To say that the performers are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to insure in advance an excellent performance. The Quartette in E Flat Major of Von Dittersdorf with its simple broad andante on Haydn lines was played with a warm breadth and a fineness of shading which left little to be desired. In the allegro, with its difficult staccato, Mr. Kneisel displayed uncommon skill.

Grieg's "Andante from the G Minor Quartet," a happy selection, with its clear tenuity of subject, was finely played. In the opening solo of bass for the 'cello Mr. Schroeder had opportunity to prove the fineness of his tone. Messrs. Roth and Svecenski shared equal honors in the dramatic interlude, and the return to the original subject was perhaps the best bit of artistic shading of the evening.

The Schubert quintet afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Schulz in fine chromatic passages. The adagio was a bit of blended art, and the trio was rendered by each and all without a flaw.

This latter won the heart of the audience. The programme was of moderate length and closed with the short presto of the quintet.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1892.

Mrs. Lilian Nordica will close her American tour with a concert at the Music Hall on Thursday night, Jan. 28. The programme will consist mainly of airs and concerted movements from popular operas, with six numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana" at the close. In addition to Mrs. Nordica the performers will be Mrs. Scalchi, the famous contralto, Paul Kalisch, the well-known tenor, Zoltan Döme, barytone, from London, his first appearance here, and an orchestra of fifty. Mr. Sapio conductor. Seats are ready at the ticket office.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

There was a large audience in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The opera which was produced was "L'Africaine," by Giacomo Meyerbeer. This opera, it is said, is very popular, and if one might judge by the appearance of the house, the popularity of the work is not on the wane. Thus, the cast last night was one of the most attractive of the season. There was Mme. Nordica, who has long been regarded as one of the prize beauties of the operatic stage, especially engaged to sing the part of Selika, the pretty Indian Princess, who was not an African after all, but was over head and ears in love with Vasco di Gama just the same. There was Jean de Reszke, as Vasco, in the prettiest red tights that ever were seen, a wig that fit him better than his own hair, and a mustache that was divine, inasmuch as it pointed toward heaven at each end.

Edouard de Reszke, the enormous basso, did not have any "make-up" on, but he wore a swelling velvet cap which made him look three inches more imposing than he was designed to be by Providence, and that is saying a good deal. And Mlle. Pettigiani, the diminutive prima donna, who was the Inez of the evening, was incited by her surroundings to sing harder than she ever did before.

But the star of the evening was M. Lassalle, the famous French baritone. He proved to be the tallest and the most imposing of the three big and imposing men who made the ladies sit breathless with delight. As Nelusko he appeared in one of the parts which have earned him his reputation. His singing and acting were carried on with great vigor and he fairly set the audience wild with delight. He was called out every time he went off the stage, and he was compelled to repeat his principal air in the third act.

In addition to all these imposing and interesting people there was a ship that blew up in sections and kept on blowing up some more after the curtain went down, to the intense delight of the people who were away in Europe last Fourth of July, and did not have any fireworks. Then there was a ballet which kicked its heels joyously all over the stage, and a procession which glittered as if it were real gold, and a Grand Brahmin, who knew how to perform the difficult feat of singing two notes at once.

Taken altogether it was the most brilliant night at the opera this season since Jean de Reszke made a tremendous success in "Le Prophete." Among the gossipy bits of talk floating around the house, however, was a rumor that before the season comes to an end a little experimenting with some operas in German would be tried. This rumor, however, lacked verification.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The programme consisted of Schumann's first symphony, the D minor piano concerto of Rubinstein, a prelude, adagio, and gavotte by Sebastian Bach, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." It snowed in Brooklyn just the same as it did in New-York, but that did not keep people away from the concert.

Arthur Nikisch conducted the performance. The person who played the piano part of the Rubinstein concerto was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who lives in Chicago. The many ladies present at yesterday's entertainment seemed to be much interested in her playing, and she was called out four times. The playing of the orchestra was also much applauded. The same orchestra will play again in Brooklyn on Feb. 12.

The New York Recorder.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

LA SALLE APPLAUDIT LASSALLE.

The Parisian Baritone Scores a Success in "L'Africaine."

Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine" was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House in a most artistic manner with a cast that was thoroughly satisfactory. The management must have been very much pleased at the size of the house and the enthusiasm thereof. Hearty applause was bestowed upon M. Lassalle, who was the Nelusko of the evening.

The artists who sang in "L'Africaine" last night were Mme. Nordica, Selika; Mlle. Pettigiani, Inez; Mdlle. Bauermeister, Anna. "Don Pedro" was nobly sung by Edouard de Reszke, whose voice is grand. The Grand Inquisitor was rendered by M. Vinche. Vasco de Gama was impersonated by Jean de Reszke, who sang and acted with all his usual fire and feeling and at the end of the first act was warmly recalled. His duo with Don Pedro was most heartily received.

M. Lassalle, the new baritone, is a man of magnificent presence, who sang and acted in a manner that fully justified his great reputation abroad. His voice is not what it was when he sang with such success in "Roi de Lahore" in Paris, but he is a great artist and impersonates Nelusko in the manner that the savage character calls for. His famous solo in the third act was encored, for it was sung with extraordinary spirit and most expressive pantomime.

Before the resonance of his upper register had gone M. Lassalle must have been one of the greatest baritones of his time.

Nordica sang and acted with earnestness. The male chorus was excellent, and the ship scene was interesting.

"L'Africaine" could easily be given once a week and draw large houses, for it has many elements of picturesqueness and popularity, and the sight of so many large-sized artists on the stage is alone worth the price of admission. The orchestra was conducted by M. Vianesi.

This afternoon "Fidelio" will be repeated, with Lehmann, Kalisch and Edouard de Reszke.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 17, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts and rehearsals the past week in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It was a more successful trip than any previous one. The orchestra arrived back in Boston this morning at 9 o'clock.

The [illegible]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

Concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

An enthusiastic audience listened to a most admirable concert given by the Kneisel Quartet yesterday evening at the Carnegie Music Hall. This was the third appearance of this organization during the season, and it added one more success to its brilliant record. Evenness of tone, artistic shading, musical expression, and intelligence of reading characterized the playing of the entire programme, which consisted of a quartet in E flat major, by Carl Dittersdorf, the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor, and Schubert's quintet in C major, in which Mr. Leo Schulz played the second violoncello part.

The most effective number of the concert was, perhaps, the selection from Grieg, so full of charming melody and richness of color. These qualities, as well as the weird harmonies and peculiarities of rhythm with which the Norse master loves to indulge, were brought out with rare skill and delicacy of sentiment deserving of commendation. The Schubert quartet was also given with much finish and force and elicited bursts of rapturous applause.

The only band of chamber-music musicians which may rank with the Kneisel Quartet is the New York Symphony Society's offspring, conducted by Mr. Brodsky, which has achieved such a deserved name of honor for its splendid performances; but many who attended the concert of last night appreciated the fact that the Kneisel Quartet has more repose, if perhaps a less showy quality, than Brodsky's.

"L'Africaine" at the Opera House.

An admirable performance of "L'Africaine" was given last evening in the Metropolitan. With the exception of the orchestra, which nowadays is never smooth, and which is frequently out of tune, the entire rendition of the opera was on a higher plane than any that can be remembered. A cast of unusual ability undertook the task, and the surety and cleverness of the singers lent the rare charm of tonal exactness to concerted pieces. The ensemble at the close of the second act was noticeably good. So, too, was the scene of Vasco's malediction at the end of the first, where the men's chorus did some fine work.

At his early entrance upon the stage M. Jean de Reszke was most cordially welcomed by the audience, and he immediately again made evident his great versatility, for his Vasco di Gama was quite unlike any other character which he has portrayed, possessing, as each of his heroes does, an individuality of its own. The evening was a very remarkable one in many ways. It took on the appearance of a gala night. The audience was by far the most enthusiastic one of the season and the gayest and most brilliant. Undoubtedly there was sufficient excellence upon the stage to warrant all the applause given, for as time went on the fact became more and more apparent that this was the best all-round presentation of "L'Africaine" ever given here.

M. Lasalle, the new French baritone who has been for about fifteen years a member of the troupe at the Grand Opera in Paris, made his début last night, and scored an instantaneous and solid triumph. He is a most valuable acquisition to this company, being an artist of sterling merit, a splendid actor, and a singer of the first rank.

The waits between acts were all of them nearly or quite a half hour long. This delay, together with the interpolation of many airs frequently cut out in former presentations, caused the performance to last until long past midnight.

Mme. Nordica was a charming though a somewhat too tame and gentle Selika. Vocally if not dramatically she was satisfactory. M. Edouard de Reszke added much to the importance of the opera by filling a comparatively small rôle with power and dignity.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave their third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last evening, where their next and last one will also be heard. It was a change that doubtless approved itself to all their hearers. For their programme they offered a list that did not at first seem of much attractiveness. A quartet of Carl von Dittersdorf had been exhumed for this occasion and was in the nature of a novelty. The works of the minor composers of the eighteenth century, for the most part, have rested during the nineteenth as quietly as their authors. This well-nigh forgotten quartet evinced qualities of interest, however, to an audience of these days. It is written in a fresh and melodious vein, well and clearly wrought out and in the true spirit of the string quartet. There are many traits in it that seem like a foreshadowing of Mozart's work in this line, the turn of a phrase, or a harmonic sequence or a touch here and there of general effect. Almost the only archaic feature of the composition is the fact that all three of the movements are in the same tonality, and that there is no slow movement. Mr. Kneisel, therefore, introduced after the first allegro an adagio in a different key, from another of Dittendorf's quartets, with a result fortunate in the effect of relief and contrast. The last movement is distinctly in the Hungarian style—probably a reminiscence, as are similar passages in other and greater musicians' works, of the composer's stay in the court of some Hungarian dignitary—and is an interesting case of the early adoption of the spirit of a folk song that was destined later to become so prominent in music. Schubert's great quintet in C, in which Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello, and the lovely romance from Grieg's quartet, were the other pieces on the programme. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was never heard to better advantage for its virility and fire, its exquisite and never-failing finish, the absolute blending and subordination of each voice to the general effect, and the beautiful quality of tone. It is quartet playing of the highest order, judged by any standard, and was a source of unalloyed gratification to those who heard it.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1/17

Date

Some interest is excited by the competition of the Seidl society and the Philharmonic continuation by Nikisch and the Boston orchestra. The friendly rivalry ought [illegible] the cause of music. There might in such a case be differences of public opinion as to which is the stronger and more thoroughly balanced and drilled band, who is the better conductor, the more skillful compiler of programmes. From a purely art point of view these are the most important, the controlling considerations. But they are not the only conditions of success. The social factor and other incidental influences should not be overlooked. Good music is no less good if it is heard in a cheerful place amid attractive surroundings, and musical impressions lose nothing of their wholesome, refining, cultivating effect if their vehicle is made popular, even fashionable—to use in a tolerable sense an objectionable word. Seidl undoubtedly appreciates the backing of his namesake local society, which gives an unmistakable impulse to his series of concerts. Nikisch doubtless duly values the nominal indorsement of the Philharmonic, with a generation of good work behind it, a name which has been a tower of strength. But, apart from this, as to the many things which go to furnish a setting and an atmosphere, Brooklyn is simply one of the stations on the Boston orchestra's season's tour. The Philharmonic society kept the art standard at the highest point, but it never forgot the incidentals. The sudden withdrawal of these is doubtless advantageous to the Seidl society by the suggested contrast. A hint from the old Philharmonic management to the new might have been wise.

EVENING POST, New York, N. Y.

Date 1-16

BOSTON IN BROOKLYN.

Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of rare excellence for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to interpret in the Brooklyn Academy of Music to-night; and yesterday's public rehearsal indicated that the performance will be superb. The poetry of Schumann's first symphony was never more perfectly revealed than on this occasion, and the same may be said of the Bach Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler played Rubinstein's D-minor concerto with much spirit, though with somewhat less certainty and technical finish than she usually displays. She seemed to be nervous, being possibly disturbed in mind by the fact that Mr. Paderewski was playing the same concerto in New York about the same hour.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date

The Symphony Concert.

The public seem to appreciate the fact that the concert of Feb 16th, will be given by the finest orchestra in America, and the subscriptions are coming in constantly. People should have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra, at least once a year, and nothing prevents except the great expense of giving these concerts and and lack of the large number of patrons, necessary to make a financial success. Other cities pack the houses, wherever the orchestra appears, and it is to be hoped that Fall River will show its appreciation this season and favor them with an audience limited only by the size of the hall. One thing must be remembered that the organization is so big that the concert can be heard as well in the remote seats of the dress circle as well as near the stage.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The third concert in the philharmonic course by the Boston symphony orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, and was a repetition of the rehearsal that was reviewed in the EAGLE last evening. Schumann's beautiful first symphony, Bach's stirring suite that brought out the surprising value of the strings, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture with its wonderful large for muted strings and Rubinstein's D minor concerto formed the programme. The orchestra played magnificently and was heartily applauded, while in the piano number Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler played with a Delphic fury that startled the audience and provoked her recall. The attendance was larger than at the rehearsal. On February 12 and 13 the orchestra will be heard again in Brooklyn.

TELEGRAM, Worcester, Mass.

Date 1/18

With Symphony Orchestra Musicians.

John J. Heron is to go, to-night, to Boston, to play the piano with a detachment of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has been engaged for [illegible] given by Mrs. Jack Gardner.

[103]

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

At the rehearsal for to-night's concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, yesterday afternoon, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a spirited and thoroughly musical fashion, greatly to the pleasure of the audience. The pianist took the final allegro at an almost bewildering pace, but had splendid support from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, which really did wonders with the accompaniment. At the close of the concerto Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was recalled several times.

The concert began with a smooth and thoroughly satisfactory performance of Schumann's B flat symphony, and ended with one of the best and most brilliant performances of the "Euryanthe" overture heard here in years. The programme also contained the Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.

SAY THERE WAS NO TROUBLE.

The wait between the third and fourth acts of "L'Africaine" at the Metropolitan Opera House last night was quite long and caused a good deal of gossip in the lobby of the house.

It was said that Mme. Nordica, the prima donna, had been insulted by Signor Vianesi and refused to continue until the musical conductor had made her an apology. The insult, it was said, took place during the third act and while the prima donna was singing.

"No," said Mr. Maurice Grau, "the story is all wrong. Mme. Nordica did not feel well and wanted an apology made to the audience before the curtain because she was afraid she could not do justice to her part."

"Oh my! the story is absurd," said Signor Vianesi. "Mme. Nordica and myself are the best of friends. She simply wanted to cut some of her music out. That is all there is to it."

"There has been no trouble at all," said Mme. Nordica. "During the early part of the evening my hearing seemed to leave me, and I had to watch Signor Vianesi very closely. I did not know that I would be able to continue and if I had to I thought an apology should be made. I had my doctor here and also Mr. De Reszke's, and without their help I don't think I would be able to get through."

A KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston, gave its third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last night and thoroughly pleased its audience, which should have been larger, with a lovely performance of Schubert's quintet in C major. This was the chief event of the evening, but a curious quartet of the last century by Carl von Dittersdorf, and the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor also gave much pleasure.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

NIKISCH IN BROOKLYN.

Third Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So firmly established in the regard of Brooklyn music-lovers has the Boston Symphony Orchestra become that even such a storm as yesterday's had comparatively little effect upon the attendance at the third rehearsal.

While the programme was not as attractive as the previous one, and consequently did not show the organization at its best, it was rendered in a most masterly manner.

The symphony was Schumann's No. 1 in B flat, commonly known as the "Spring Symphony." It was in the andante and the allegro that Nikisch and his men most effectively displayed their superiority. Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte received admirable expression from the strings, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" was given with characteristic finish.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist and she earned several recalls by her artistic work in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral portions of that classical composition were rendered with delicacy.

By request the concert at the Academy this evening will begin at 8.15 instead of 8 o'clock as heretofore.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Their Third Concert at Carnegie Music Hall.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place last evening at Carnegie Music Hall. To say that the performers are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to insure in advance an excellent performance. The Quartette in E Flat Major of Von Dittersdorf with its simple broad andante on Haydn lines was played with a warm breadth and a fineness of shading which left little to be desired. In the allegro, with its difficult staccato, Mr. Kneisel displayed uncommon skill.

Grieg's "Andante from the G Minor Quartet," a happy selection, with its clear tenuity of subject, was finely played. In the opening solo of bass for the 'cello Mr. Schroeder had opportunity to prove the fineness of his tone. Messrs. Roth and Svecenski shared equal honors in the dramatic interlude, and the return to the original subject was perhaps the best bit of artistic shading of the evening.

The Schubert quintet afforded an opportunity to hear Mr. Schulz in fine chromatic passages. The adagio was a bit of blended art, and the trio was rendered by each and all without a flaw.

This latter won the heart of the audience. The programme was of moderate length and closed with the short presto of the quintet.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1892.

Mrs. Lilian Nordica will close her American tour with a concert at the Music Hall on Thursday night, Jan. 28. The programme will consist mainly of airs and concerted movements from popular operas, with six numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana" at the close. In addition to Mrs. Nordica the performers will be Mrs. Scalchi, the famous contralto, Paul Kalisch, the well-known tenor, Zoltan Döme, barytone, from London, his first appearance here, and an orchestra of fifty. Mr. Sapio conductor. Seats are ready at the ticket office.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1892.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

There was a large audience in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The opera which was produced was "L'Africaine," by Giacomo Meyerbeer. This opera, it is said, is very popular, and if one might judge by the appearance of the house, the popularity of the work is not on the wane. Thus, the cast last night was one of the most attractive of the season. There was Mme. Nordica, who has long been regarded as one of the prize beauties of the operatic stage, especially engaged to sing the part of Selika, the pretty Indian Princess, who was not an African after all, but was over head and ears in love with Vasco di Gama just the same. There was Jean de Reszke, as Vasco, in the prettiest red tights that ever were seen, a wig that fit him better than his own hair, and a mustache that was divine, inasmuch as it pointed toward heaven at each end.

Edouard de Reszke, the enormous basso, did not have any "make-up" on, but he wore a swelling velvet cap which made him look three inches more imposing than he was designed to be by Providence, and that is saying a good deal. And Mlle. Pettigiani, the diminutive prima donna, who was the Inez of the evening, was incited by her surroundings to sing harder than she ever did before.

But the star of the evening was M. Lassalle, the famous French baritone. He proved to be the tallest and the most imposing of the three big and imposing men who made the ladies sit breathless with delight. As Nelusko he appeared in one of the parts which have earned him his reputation. His singing and acting were carried on with great vigor and he fairly set the audience wild with delight. He was called out every time he went off the stage, and he was compelled to repeat his principal air in the third act.

In addition to all these imposing and interesting people there was a ship that blew up in sections and kept on blowing up some more after the curtain went down, to the intense delight of the people who were away in Europe last Fourth of July, and did not have any fireworks. Then there was a ballet which kicked its heels joyously all over the stage, and a procession which glittered as if it were real gold, and a Grand Brahmin, who knew how to perform the difficult feat of singing two notes at once.

Taken altogether it was the most brilliant night at the opera this season since Jean de Reszke made a tremendous success in "Le Prophete." Among the gossipy bits of talk floating around the house, however, was a rumor that before the season comes to an end a little experimenting with some operas in German would be tried. This rumor, however, lacked verification.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The programme consisted of Schumann's first symphony, the D minor piano concerto of Rubinstein, a prelude, adagio, and gavotte by Sebastian Bach, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." It snowed in Brooklyn just the same as it did in New-York, but that did not keep people away from the concert.

Arthur Nikisch conducted the performance. The person who played the piano part of the Rubinstein concerto was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who lives in Chicago. The many ladies present at yesterday's entertainment seemed to be much interested in her playing, and she was called out four times. The playing of the orchestra was also much applauded. The same orchestra will play again in Brooklyn on Feb. 12.

The New York Recorder.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

LA SALLE APPLAUDIT LASSALLE.

The Parisian Baritone Scores a Success in "L'Africaine."

Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine" was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House in a most artistic manner with a cast that was thoroughly satisfactory. The management must have been very much pleased at the size of the house and the enthusiasm thereof. Hearty applause was bestowed upon M. Lassalle, who was the Nelusko of the evening.

The artists who sang in "L'Africaine" last night were Mme. Nordica, Selika; Mlle. Pettigiani, Inez; Mdlle. Bauermeister, Anna. "Don Pedro" was nobly sung by Edouard de Reszke, whose voice is grand. The Grand Inquisitor was rendered by M. Vinche. Vasco de Gama was impersonated by Jean de Reszke, who sang and acted with all his usual fire and feeling and at the end of the first act was warmly recalled. His duo with Don Pedro was most heartily received.

M. Lassalle, the new baritone, is a man of magnificent presence, who sang and acted in a manner that fully justified his great reputation abroad. His voice is not what it was when he sang with such success in "Roi de Lahore" in Paris, but he is a great artist and impersonates Nelusko in the manner that the savage character calls for. His famous solo in the third act was encored, for it was sung with extraordinary spirit and most expressive pantomime.

Before the resonance of his upper register had gone M. Lassalle must have been one of the greatest baritones of his time.

Nordica sang and acted with earnestness. The male chorus was excellent, and the ship scene was interesting.

"L'Africaine" could easily be given once a week and draw large houses, for it has many elements of picturesqueness and popularity, and the sight of so many large-sized artists on the stage is alone worth the price of admission. The orchestra was conducted by M. Vianesi.

This afternoon "Fidelio" will be repeated, with Lehmann, Kalisch and Edouard de Reszke.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 17, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave concerts and rehearsals the past week in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It was a more successful trip than any previous one. The orchestra arrived back in Boston this morning at 9 o'clock.

The Sun.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

Concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

An enthusiastic audience listened to a most admirable concert given by the Kneisel Quartet yesterday evening at the Carnegie Music Hall. This was the third appearance of this organization during the season, and it added one more success to its brilliant record. Evenness of tone, artistic shading, musical expression, and intelligence of reading characterized the playing of the entire programme, which consisted of a quartet in E flat major, by Carl Dittersdorf, the andante from Grieg's quartet in G minor, and Schubert's quintet in C major, in which Mr. Leo Schulz played the second violoncello part.

The most effective number of the concert was, perhaps, the selection from Grieg, so full of charming melody and richness of color. These qualities, as well as the weird harmonies and peculiarities of rhythm with which the Norse master loves to indulge, were brought out with rare skill and delicacy of sentiment deserving of commendation. The Schubert quartet was also given with much finish and force and elicited bursts of rapturous applause.

The only band of chamber-music musicians which may rank with the Kneisel Quartet is the New York Symphony Society's offspring, conducted by Mr. Brodsky, which has achieved such a deserved name of honor for its splendid performances; but many who attended the concert of last night appreciated the fact that the Kneisel Quartet has more repose, if perhaps a less showy quality, than Brodsky's.

"L'Africaine" at the Opera House.

An admirable performance of "L'Africaine" was given last evening in the Metropolitan. With the exception of the orchestra, which nowadays is never smooth, and which is frequently out of tune, the entire rendition of the opera was on a higher plane than any that can be remembered. A cast of unusual ability undertook the task, and the surety and cleverness of the singers lent the rare charm of tonal exactness to concerted pieces. The ensemble at the close of the second act was noticeably good. So, too, was the scene of Vasco's malediction at the end of the first, where the men's chorus did some fine work.

At his early entrance upon the stage M. Jean de Reszke was most cordially welcomed by the audience, and he immediately again made evident his great versatility, for his Vasco di Gama was quite unlike any other character which he has portrayed, possessing, as each of his heroes does, an individuality of its own. The evening was a very remarkable one in many ways. It took on the appearance of a gala night. The audience was by far the most enthusiastic one of the season and the gayest and most brilliant. Undoubtedly there was sufficient excellence upon the stage to warrant all the applause given, for as time went on the fact became more and more apparent that this was the best all-round presentation of "L'Africaine" ever given here.

M. Lasalle, the new French baritone who has been for about fifteen years a member of the troupe at the Grand Opera in Paris, made his début last night, and scored an instantaneous and solid triumph. He is a most valuable acquisition to this company, being an artist of sterling merit, a splendid actor, and a singer of the first rank.

The waits between acts were all of them nearly or quite a half hour long. This delay, together with the interpolation of many airs frequently cut out in former presentations, caused the performance to last until long past midnight.

Mme. Nordica was a charming though a somewhat too tame and gentle Selika. Vocally if not dramatically she was satisfactory. M. Edouard de Reszke added much to the importance of the opera by filling a comparatively small rôle with power and dignity.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE REELEY

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave their third concert in the Chamber Music Hall last evening, where their next and last one will also be heard. It was a change that doubtless approved itself to all their hearers. For their programme they offered a list that did not at first seem of much attractiveness. A quartet of Carl von Dittersdorf had been exhumed for this occasion and was in the nature of a novelty. The works of the minor composers of the eighteenth century, for the most part, have rested during the nineteenth as quietly as their authors. This well-nigh forgotten quartet evinced qualities of interest, however, to an audience of these days. It is written in a fresh and melodious vein, well and clearly wrought out and in the true spirit of the string quartet. There are many traits in it that seem like a foreshadowing of Mozart's work in this line, the turn of a phrase, or a harmonic sequence or a touch here and there of general effect. Almost the only archaic feature of the composition is the fact that all three of the movements are in the same tonality, and that there is no slow movement. Mr. Kneisel, therefore, introduced after the first allegro an adagio in a different key, from another of Dittendorf's quartets, with a result fortunate in the effect of relief and contrast. The last movement is distinctly in the Hungarian style—probably a reminiscence, as are similar passages in other and greater musicians' works, of the composer's stay in the court of some Hungarian dignitary—and is an interesting case of the early adoption of the spirit of a folk song that was destined later to become so prominent in music. Schubert's great quintet in C, in which Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello, and the lovely romance from Grieg's quartet, were the other pieces on the programme. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was never heard to better advantage for its virility and fire, its exquisite and never-failing finish, the absolute blending and subordination of each voice to the general effect, and the beautiful quality of tone. It is quartet playing of the highest order, judged by any standard, and was a source of unalloyed gratification to those who heard it.

LOWELL, The Morning Times

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 16.

NORDICA AND SCALCHI.

A grand operatic concert is to be given at Music hall, Boston, on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at which Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi will appear with Campanini and Z. Dome, baritone of Covent garden, London, and an orchestra of 50. Tickets $1 and $1.50. Many lovers of music in Lowell should be interested in this announcement.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, was given on Saturday evening in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The house, though well filled, held not quite so many as at the preceding concert, when Paderewski attracted an unusual number. A more artistically arranged and executed programme it would be difficult to imagine. Little of sombre character—much of joyous, exulting expression. The Schumann Symphony No. 1 was very sensibly placed first, and was played with the greatest breadth and accuracy. Particularly charming was the flowing, melodious cantabile of the allegro, which, to our thinking, seems the best movement of the symphony. The whole work is a noble one, and was nobly given. The durability of the classic was well shown by the reception given to the Bach number for string orchestra. The perfection of the strings of the symphony was again attested.

The praeludium and gavotte were played with marvellous spirit and brilliancy of attack. The gavotte should have been given again in response to the decided encore. In contrast with the refined simplicity of the Bach music the Weber Euryanthe Overture seemed overwrought, beautifully played though it was. The pianist, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, developed a surprising degree of strength in the exacting Ruibenstein D Minor Concerto. The selection is one requiring a robust technique and fine perception to avoid falling into mere mechanism. The moderato and allegro were given extremely well, with no perceptible diminution of force at the end of the exhausting performance. Seldom have we seen such finely formed hands as Mrs. Zeisler's—slender, delicately tapering fingers—a true pianist's hand. A conductor who obtains such thoroughly consistent, truly artistic results from his orchestra as does Mr. Nikisch from the symphony seems worthy of something more than the tardy, faint hearted praise which has been accorded him. Have we any one whom the most captious critics would compare with him.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to give a recital in Chickering Hall Wednesday afternoon, when Mrs. Nikisch will sing six songs by Brahms and numbers by Schumann, Jensen, Bungert, Tschaikowsky, Goldmark, Heuberger, Strauss and De Koven. Among Master Alexander Fiedemann's violin solos Vieuxtemps's "Fantaisie Caprice" is the most important.

Clipping Telegram

ipping from New York N. Y.

ate 1-16

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Nickish, was largely attended by the patrons and lovers of the best orchestral music, which is always sure to be given at these concerts. Two very interesting selections were E. A. MacDowell's "suite op 42," and Tschaikowsky's "Concert Fantasia" for piano and orchestra. MacDowall is a young American composer and one of whom all musicians have reason to be proud. The suite proved far more interesting and was more favorably received and commended, from a musical standpoint, than the fantasia of the great Russian composer, Tschaiakowsky.

* * *

It is rumored that Paderewski will settle permanently in Chicago, forming a connection with Ziegfeld's Musical Conservatory there. This is to be an offset to the engagement of Dvorak for Mrs. Thurber's conservatory here. Paderewski says the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best in the world, not even excepting that at the Paris Conservatoire.

* * *

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Boston will give its favorite prima donna, Mme. Nordica, one of the largest houses of the season at her closing concert in Music Hall, Thursday, Jan. 28. The sale of seats opened Monday, and already nearly 1000 seats have been sold. Nothing could better attest her popularity in Boston than this sale 10 days in advance. She will have the assistance of Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch, Mr. Dome and an orchestra of 50 to interpret a programme of choice operatic selections.

Baltimore Journal

Freitag, 15. Januar 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter.—Hr. Arthur Nikiſch, der hochbegabte Dirigent des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, fügte mit dem geſtrigen Conzerte im Conzertſaale der Muſik-Akademie ſeinen in unſerer Stadt errungenen Lorbeeren ein neues Reis hinzu; ſchon bei ſeinem Erſcheinen auf dem Podium wurde er mit ſtürmiſchem Applaus begrüßt, der ſich bei jeder Nummer des hochintereſſanten Programms wiederholte. Das Vortreffliche dieſes Orcheſters liegt in dem ausgezeichneten Zuſammenſpiel u. der feinen Nüancirung. Jede einzelne Inſtrumentengruppe klingt wie ein einziges Inſtrument von gewaltigem Ton; beſonders überwältigend ſind die Violinen und Celli in ihrem Zuſammenſpiel. In Wagner's „Fauſt"-Ouvertüre kamen die Vorzüge des Orcheſters beſonders zu voller Geltung, ſpeziell was Phraſirung und präziſen Einſatz anbetrifft. Als zweite Nummer des Programms kam Frau Nikiſch mit dem Vortrage des Bungert'ſchen Liedes "Amore e Luce" an die Reihe. Frau Nikiſch beſitzt eine Stimme von zwar nicht großem Umfange, aber von einer mächtigen Kraft und Tonfülle. Selbſt das Forte des Orcheſters konnte ihre Stimme nicht übertönen; dabei verfügt ſie aber auch im Piano über eine Reinheit und einen Schmelz, der bezaubernd wirkt. Kein Wunder, wenn ſie auf's Lebhafteſte applaudirt wurde. Strauß's „Ständchen" u. Schumann's „Frühlingsnacht" ſang ſie mit Klavierbegleitung. Auf das wiederholte Hervorrufen gab ſie noch zwei Encores. Hr. Nikiſch ſpielte die Klavierbegleitung in äußerſt feiner, echt künſtleriſcher Weiſe. Liszt's „Mignon" und Schumann's Ouverture zu „Manfred" wurden von dem Orcheſter in meiſterhafter Weiſe wiedergegeben. Beſonders in dem letztgenannten Stück kamen die verſchiedenen Vortragszeichen, vom feinſten Pianiſſimo zum ſtärkſten Forte, zu voller Geltung. Den Glanzpunkt des Abends bildete jedoch Beethoven's A-dur Symphonie. Dieſelbe wird ihrer Schwierigkeiten halber nur ſehr ſelten von einem Orcheſter vorgetragen. Die Symphonie wird öfters mit dem Namen: „Schlacht von Vittoria" bezeichnet. Beethoven componirte dieſelbe, als er ſchon zehn Jahre taub war, und dirigirte ſie auch in einem Hofconzerte, wobei Moſcheles, Hummel, Salieri, Spohr und Meyerbeer mitſpielten. Wir können nur wiederholen, daß das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter den Vortrag der ſchwierigen Compoſition zu einem Meiſterſtücke machte. Der Tempowechſel, die Verſchlingung der einzelnen Leitmotive, ſowie die Phraſirung waren meiſterhaft wiedergegeben; bald zart und fein, bald grell aufleuchtend wurde der Vivace-Satz geſpielt; das Orcheſter folgte ſeinem Dirigenten in jeder Bewegung; das Ganze war ein Guß. ein Ganzes.

Hr. Nikiſch darf verſichert ſein, daß bei ſeinem nächſten Conzerte das Baltimorer Publikum ſich nicht minder dankbar erweiſen wird, als bei dem des geſtrigen Abends. Leider zeigte ſich auch dies Mal wieder der Mangel einer großen Halle. Der Conzertſaal der Akademie iſt viel zu klein für ein Orcheſter von ſolcher Wirkung und für das muſikliebende Publikum Baltimore's.

Das dritte Conzert des „Boſtoner Sinfonie-Orcheſters."

„Nenne mir, ſingende Muſe, die dreimal unſelige Stadt, Die innerhalb ihres Weichbild's noch keine Conzerthalle hat."

Aber wenn auch die Muſe den Namen der Stadt verſchweigt: es weiß ihn die Welt. Der Mangel einer größeren muſikaliſchen Aufführungen entſprechenden Halle machte ſich geſtern Abend wieder recht fühlbar. „Eingekeilt in drangvoll fürchterliche Enge" ſaßen die Hörer; viele ſtanden, weil Sitzplätze nicht zu haben waren; die Temperatur ward ungemüthlich, und da einige Fenſter geöffnet wurden, war ein Theil des Hauſes unleidlich zugig. Ueberdies hat uns der Mangel einer Conzerthalle um manchen muſikaliſchen Genuß gebracht, wie z. B. um die Damroſch- und die Seidel-Conzerte, und ſchädigt auch muſikaliſche Aufführungen großen Styls. Ein Orcheſter, wie das Boſtoner, kommt im Conzertſaal der „Muſik-Akademie" nicht voll zur Geltung.

Was nun das geſtrige Conzert der „Boſtoner" anlangt, ſo iſt für daſſelbe trotz der erwähnten Mißſtände ein glänzender Erfolg zu verzeichnen. Einestheils iſt derſelbe in dem trefflich zuſammengeſtellten Programm, andererſeits in der prächtigen Wiedergabe des Programms begründet. Hr. A. Nikiſch bot im erſten Theile des Conzerts die Wagner'ſche „Fauſt-Ouvertüre" und Schumann's „Manfred-Ouvertüre;" eine jedenfalls abſichtliche und intereſſante Nebeneinanderſtellung. Göthe ſelbſt nennt „Fauſt" und „Manfred" Zwillingsbrüder, aber [illegible] verſchieden geartet. Von den „zwei Seelen", die in „Fauſt's" Bruſt wohnen, hat „Manfred" nur eine. Wagner iſt über die „Fauſt-Ouvertüre" nicht hinausgekommen. Er hat ihr als Motto der Grundſtimmung die Worte „Fauſt's," „der Gott, der mir im Buſen wohnt, kann tief mein Innerſtes erregen" bis „und ſo iſt mir das Leben eine Laſt, der Tod erwünſcht, das Leben mir verhaßt" vorgeſetzt, und dieſe Grundſtimmung hat er mit großem Geſchick feſtgehalten, obgleich Wagner erſt 27 Jahre alt war, als er die Ouvertüre ſchrieb. Schumann, der eine ganze „Manfred-"Muſik geſchrieben, gibt in der Ouvertüre bereits das Bild „Manfred's" in ſeiner ganzen düſteren Größe.

Ein Hauch der Troſtloſigkeit iſt darüber ausgebreitet. Beide Ouvertüren wurden mit einer dem Rufe und der Stellung des Hrn. Nikiſch und ſeines Orcheſters entſprechenden Fein- und Reinheit gegeben und von der Hörerſchaft auf's Wärmſte applaudirt. Am Liebſten aber hört man Nikiſch und ſein Orcheſter in Beethoven'ſchen Sinfonie'n. In ihnen liegt der Höhepunkt der Orcheſter-Muſik; ſie ſind die muſikaliſchſte Muſik. Es wurde die „A-dur-Sinfonie" (Nr. 7) gegeben, die Beethoven ſelbſt als eine ſeiner beſten bezeichnet hat. Sie iſt indeſſen leichter zugänglich, als einige andere Beethoven's; ſo beſonders der zweite Satz mit dem reſignirten Thema im Marſchtempo, das ſofort verſtanden und ſympathiſch aufgenommen wird. Die ſehnſüchtige Melodie der Celli und Bratſchen gewinnt den Hörer in den erſten Takten. Das zauberhafte Tongebilde des Trios, in dem das feſtgehaltene A (die Quinte) den ganzen Satz durchſchimmert, zeigt die geniale Weiſe Beethoven's im beſten Lichte. So ſchön, wie geſtern, haben wir es ſelten gehört. Das ausgelaſſen dahin ſchäumende Finale war eine Prachtleiſtung.

Die Soliſtin des geſtrigen Conzertes war Mad. A. Nikiſch. Die trefflichen, echt künſtleriſchen Eigenſchaften und Vorzüge der Sängerin ſind hier noch vom letzten Jahre her in beſtem Andenken. Sie hatte denn auch den wärmſten Empfang bei ihrem Auftreten. Mad. Nikiſch ſang Liszt's „Mignon" mit Orcheſterbegleitung und vermittelte uns die Bekanntſchaft zweier Liedercomponiſten, Bungert und Richard Strauß. Bungert's „Amore und Luce" und eine „Serenade" von Strauß waren vortrefflich gewählt, und die Schumann'ſche „Frühlingsnacht" bildete einen prächtigen Abſchluß der Lieder. Die Liszt'ſche „Mignon" iſt uns wenig ſympathiſch. Der Componiſt hat den einfachen Göthe'ſchen Text in die geſuchteſten u. geſchraubteſten Harmonie'n eingezwängt, hat es zu dramatiſiren verſucht.

Nach den oft wiederholten Fragen: „kennſt Du es wohl?" wird die Frage am Ende noch einmal aufſummirt: „Kennſt Du das Land? kennſt Du das Haus? kennſt Du den Berg? Ja, ich kenne das Alles; ich kenne die Weiſe, ich kenne den Text, ich kenne auch den Herrn Verfaſſer." Wie „Mignon" geſtern zu Gehör kam, kann man ſich die Compoſition wohl auch einmal gefallen laſſen. Die ſchöne Wiedergabe mit der höchſt effektvollen Orcheſterbegleitung fand die vollſte Anerkennung des Conzertpublikums. Nobler Ton, meiſterhafte Benutzung der einzelnen Regiſter, ein ſehr muſikaliſcher, warmer, beſeelter Vortrag u. muſterhafte Ausſprache ſind geſangliche Vorzüge, welche ſtets die Hörer hinreißen, und ſo lohnte auch geſtern Abend ungetheilter, ſtürmiſcher Beifall jede einzelne Darbietung der Sängerin.

Nach wiederholtem Hervorruf ſang Mad. Nikiſch noch in gleich trefflicher Ausführung als Zugabe „Vergebliches Ständchen" von Brahms. Die Begleitung der Lieder ſpielte Hr. Nikiſch in pianiſtiſch und muſikaliſch vollendeter Weiſe. Noch hätten wir einer ſchönen Blumenſpende zu gedenken, die der Sängerin überreicht wurde. Das Fazit des geſtrigen Conzertes wäre demnach als ein nach jeder Seite erfolgreiches zu verzeichnen.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 21, 1892.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth concert in Cambridge, presenting a varied and characteristic programme of orchestral compositions, with Mr. Alvin Schroeder as soloist on the violincello. He will appear in a violincello concerto by Saint-Saens, and in three soli, respectively, by Bach, Schubert and Kienzel. The other numbers are Gade's overture, "Ossian," "Invitation to Dance," by Weber-Berlioz and the entire "Rhenish" Symphony by Schumann. This symphony is one that has enjoyed a great popularity among musical people in other cities, where the orchestra has given it the present season, and critics generally comment upon its added beauties under Mr. Nikisch's novel interpretation.

The Musical Courier.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
BY THE
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LITTLE need to attach the legend "Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch" under the portraits of this week's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Nikisch is now a name to conjure with in America, as it formerly was in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are a spirituelle combination that one seldom encounters in the artistic world, and in the singular unanimity of their tastes and happy married life they naturally recall to one's mind the similar unions of the Schumanns and the Brownings. Devotion to the very highest artistic ideals, coupled with a high degree of musical culture, single the Nikisches out as rare specimens seldom met with in the art world of to-day, where pelf is more eagerly sought for than genuine striving for lofty achievement.

Arthur Nikisch commands the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra, be it said, that has no parallel on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and grave doubts may be entertained if it has many rivals in Europe. The technical precision of the band and the immense fire and energy it displays may be credited in great part to its leader, whose virile, magnetic beat, enormous musical knowledge and widely cultured sympathies are well known now to metropolitan music lovers. Mr. Nikisch, whose personality is both graceful and forceful, is at home in most schools, for he is eclectic in his tastes, but as an interpreter of Schumann he has no equal, and the warmth and luminous qualities of his readings of the latter and other modern masters place him in the highest ranks of living conductors.

His gifted and charming wife, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was a pupil of Schneider in Cologne, and received the most solid training in song, oratorio and opera. She sang in grand opera in Germany until Mr. Nikisch met her, wooed and won her. She is the possessor of a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, exquisitely cultivated, and in Lieder compositions by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, her strong forte, she displays musical insight and delightful taste.

That Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are potent factors in the advancement of musical culture of this country goes without saying.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE program with which our Boston visitors regaled our musical public on Tuesday night of last week, on the occasion of their third concert this season, was of an exclusively romantic order, and, although not so announced, contained an absolute novelty, at least as far as this country, and we believe also as far as Europe, is concerned.

This was Peter Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56, in G major. The work has never, to our recollection at least, appeared on a concert program, and it redounds therefore to Mrs. Julia Rivé King's credit to have brought to public notice one of the most interesting works the gifted Russian ever wrote for the piano. Certainly the second theme of the first movement is one of the strongest Tschaikowsky ever invented, and the slow movement in G minor, a dialogue between piano and violoncello (the latter instrument exquisitely handled by Mr. Schroeder), is absolutely beautiful. The last movement has too much of the Cossack spirit in it to please non-Muscovite musical ears, but it is fresh and interesting nevertheless and requires a good performer. The one great fault in the work is the cadenza in the first movement, which is entirely too long drawn out and lacks in variety or novelty of pianistic devices. Moreover, it ought to have been played with more verve and abandon than Mrs. King by her very nature was able to bestow upon it. This, however, is the only adverse criticism we have to offer upon that amiable artist's performance, for in every other respect her playing was most enjoyable and did ample justice to a work which bristles with difficulties. Her technic and musical memory, crispness and clearness of touch, good round tone and careful phrasing and pedaling were alike admirable. It is also but fair to state that she achieved a pronounced success.

The orchestral accompaniment, which is likewise no child's play, was, barring a single mistake (the one bar too previous entrance of the horn), performed in most careful, discreet and commendable fashion.

Mr. Nikisch gave a somewhat novel reading of the venerable "Freischütz" overture by drawing out the opening adagio to a breadth that Weber would probably have put down as a largo if he had intended it played so slowly; but the coda was given with a spirit and precision that were perfectly electrifying.

Of E. A. MacDowell's graceful and dainty orchestral suite, op. 42, in A minor, we have repeatedly spoken in terms of high praise, and it can only be reiterated that with more frequent hearing, especially when so exquisitely performed, the miniature work gains upon the listener, who discovers new harmonic beauties that are apt to be overlooked, or rather overheard, in less carefully brought out reproductions.

The final number was perhaps a trifle too lengthy, but otherwise fitted exceedingly well into the scheme of the program. It was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," dubbed a "symphony" by its composer, but in reality certainly more of the style and character of a suite. New York is thoroughly familiar with this interesting and richly endowed work of the Austrian composer, as it was one of the late Dr. Damrosch's favorites and he used to give it a most lovable reading. More tenderly, however, he never could have cared for it than did Mr. Nikisch, whose working out of the technical details and the brilliant colors of the orchestration showed a performance carried by study to the point of virtuosity.

The Bostonians, it goes without saying, were exceedingly well received and elicited heartiest applause from a fashionable audience that crowded Chickering Hall to its utmost, despite the counter attraction of Patti's first reappearance this season on the same evening.

The Kneisel Quartet.

WHETHER it was through the circumstance of the vastly superior acoustic qualities of the chamber music hall in the new Carnegie Hall as against those of Sherry's, or the most interesting program presented, or whether their playing was really above anything they had formerly done, anyhow the fact remains that never before, at least as far back as the writer's memory reaches, was a better chamber music performance given in New York than the one of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday evening last. They were heard in a beautiful string quartet in E flat by Carl von Dittersdorf, the immediate predecessor of Mozart, on whose writings he must have had an undisputable influence, for every once in a while a theme of Dittersdorf or the treatment of it shows where he "anticipated" "Don Giovanni." It is, indeed, a noble and pure work, especially the exquisite slow movement in G, which, however, did not originally belong to the E flat quartet, but was inserted in its present place by Concertmeister Lauterbach of Dresden, to whom belongs the credit of having edited many fine chamber music works.

The B flat andante from Grieg's G minor quartet was the second number. It is as characteristic of Grieg's peculiar mood and his mannerisms of harmonization as anything that can be imagined, and throughout breathes that Northern musical atmosphere that we have learned to associate with the name of Grieg.

Schubert's divinely beautiful and divinely long quintet in C major was the pièce de résistance of the evening. It is a veritable symphony for five instruments, and the second theme in E flat of the first movement is as lovely as the now celebrated 'cello theme of the unfinished symphony. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted in the performance of this quintet by Mr. Leo Schultz, who most favorably distinguished himself in his

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.—The third public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. The program consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto prelude, adagio and gavot for strings, Bach (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The audience was large, and the orchestra as usual played beautifully. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and played brilliantly and most musically, and had many recalls. Arthur Nikisch conducted.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall this afternoon, 2:30, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the talented young violinist and protégé of Adolph Brodsky. The program will be the following:

Songs..	"Die Quelle"	Goldmark
	"Der Nussbaum"	Schumann
	"Volkslied"	August Bungert
	"Ein Bettlerpaerchen"	Richard Heuberger
	"Indian Love Song"	Reginald de Koven
	"Provençalisches Lied"	Schumann
Violin solo,	"Fantaisie Caprice"	Brahms
Songs..	"Geheimniss"	Brahms
	"Therese"
	"Staendchen"
	"Wiegenlied"
	"Des Liebsten Schwur"
	"Vergeblisches Staendchen"
Violin solos
Songs..	"Am Manzanares"	Jensen
	"Beim Tanze"	Tschaikowsky
	"Serenade"	Richard Strauss
	"Staendchen"	Jensen
	"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1892.

The programme for the public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is: Wagner, "A Faust Overture;" Chopin, concerto in F minor, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist; Beethoven, "Heroic Symphony."

Mrs. Nordica's farewell concert to be given in the Music Hall, on Thursday night, Jan. 28, promises to be a delightful occasion. The programme is made up of selections from operas, three of which will be novelties to most of the audience, and includes five of the most striking portions of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Besides Mrs. Nordica, the performers will be Mrs. Scalchi, Paul Kalisch, Zoltan Däme (from the Covent Garden Opera Company, his first appearance here) and an orchestra, Mr. Sapio, conductor

---

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Mme. Nordica's tour, which began last October with the Symphony orchestra and during which she has appeared in oratorio festivals, grand opera, and concerts in the principal cities, has been one of flattering success. In every instance she has displayed abilities of the highest order and graces of person that have made her in other cities as much of a favorite as in her native New England. Her last appearance in public will be in the nature of an ovation, for the bare announcement already made of the operatic concert next Thursday evening at Music hall has caused an advance sale of seats seldom equaled.

The programme itself will be a choice one and enjoyable for its musical excellence. Mme. Scalchi will appear for the first time since her operatic engagement here two years ago. She is without question the greatest contralto of the day and her reappearance will add much to the enjoyment of the event. Herr Kalisch, whose successful performances in German opera are well remembered, will be the tenor and Mr. Dome, the baritone. An orchestra of forty pieces led by Mr. Sapio is also to assist.

The programme in full is:

PART I.

Overture, "Semiramide"..................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen"..........Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi." (Mitrane)............Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville)...Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad"...............Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmerelda"........A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Zaro" (Orfeo)..................Glück
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartette, (Rigoletto)......................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.

PART II.

Selections from Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Preludio and Siciliana.......................
..................Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Aria (Santuzza)......................Mme. Nordica
Duet (Santuzza and Turiddu)..................
............Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo...................................Orchestra
Duet (Santuzza and Alfio)........................
.............Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

e 1-21

Have you subscribed for tickets for the great Boston Symphony concert, February 16th. [redacted] t of its class of the winter. Give it such patronage that Fall River may be assured of at least one such entertainment a year. Send your address to O. E. Borden, with number of tickets desired.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-20

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Speculators are asking $2.50 for Nordica tickets.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

BY THE

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LITTLE need to attach the legend "Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch" under the portraits of this week's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Nikisch is now a name to conjure with in America, as it formerly was in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are a spirituelle combination that one seldom encounters in the artistic world, and in the singular unanimity of their tastes and happy married life they naturally recall to one's mind the similar unions of the Schumanns and the Brownings. Devotion to the very highest artistic ideals, coupled with a high degree of musical culture, single the Nikisches out as rare specimens seldom met with in the art world of to-day, where pelf is more eagerly sought for than genuine striving for lofty achievement.

Arthur Nikisch commands the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra, be it said, that has no parallel on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and grave doubts may be entertained if it has many rivals in Europe. The technical precision of the band and the immense fire and energy it displays may be credited in great part to its leader, whose virile, magnetic beat, enormous musical knowledge and widely cultured sympathies are well known now to metropolitan music lovers. Mr. Nikisch, whose personality is both graceful and forceful, is at home in most schools, for he is eclectic in his tastes, but as an interpreter of Schumann he has no equal, and the warmth and luminous qualities of his readings of the latter and other modern masters place him in the highest ranks of living conductors.

His gifted and charming wife, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was a pupil of Schneider in Cologne, and received the most solid training in song, oratorio and opera. She sang in grand opera in Germany until Mr. Nikisch met her, wooed and won her. She is the possessor of a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, exquisitely cultivated, and in Lieder compositions by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, her strong forte, she displays musical insight and delightful taste.

That Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are potent factors in the advancement of musical culture of this country goes without saying.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE program with which our Boston visitors regaled our musical public on Tuesday night of last week, on the occasion of their third concert this season, was of an exclusively romantic order, and, although not so announced, contained an absolute novelty, at least as far as this country, and we believe also as far as Europe, is concerned.

This was Peter Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56, in G major. The work has never, to our recollection at least, appeared on a concert program, and it redounds therefore to Mrs. Julia Rivé King's credit to have brought to public notice one of the most interesting works the gifted Russian ever wrote for the piano. Certainly the second theme of the first movement is one of the strongest Tschaikowsky ever invented, and the slow movement in G minor, a dialogue between piano and violoncello (the latter instrument exquisitely handled by Mr. Schroeder), is absolutely beautiful. The last movement has too much of the Cossack spirit in it to please non-Muscovite musical ears, but it is fresh and interesting nevertheless and requires a good performer. The one great fault in the work is the cadenza in the first movement, which is entirely too long drawn out and lacks in variety or novelty of pianistic devices. Moreover, it ought to have been played with more verve and abandon than Mrs. King by her very nature was able to bestow upon it. This, however, is the only adverse criticism we have to offer upon that amiable artist's performance, for in every other respect her playing was most enjoyable and did ample justice to a work which bristles with difficulties. Her technic and musical memory, crispness and clearness of touch, good round tone and careful phrasing and pedaling were alike admirable. It is also but fair to state that she achieved a pronounced success.

The orchestral accompaniment, which is likewise no child's play, was, barring a single mistake (the one bar too previous entrance of the horn), performed in most careful, discreet and commendable fashion.

Mr. Nikisch gave a somewhat novel reading of the venerable "Freischütz" overture by drawing out the opening adagio to a breadth that Weber would probably have put down as a largo if he had intended it played so slowly; but the coda was given with a spirit and precision that were perfectly electrifying.

Of E. A. MacDowell's graceful and dainty orchestral suite, op. 42, in A minor, we have repeatedly spoken in terms of high praise, and it can only be reiterated that with more frequent hearing, especially when so exquisitely performed, the miniature work gains upon the listener, who discovers new harmonic beauties that are apt to be overlooked, or rather overheard, in less carefully brought out reproductions.

The final number was perhaps a trifle too lengthy, but otherwise fitted exceedingly well into the scheme of the program. It was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," dubbed a "symphony" by its composer, but in reality certainly more of the style and character of a suite. New York is thoroughly familiar with this interesting and richly endowed work of the Austrian composer, as it was one of the late Dr. Damrosch's favorites and he used to give it a most lovable reading. More tenderly, however, he never could have cared for it than did Mr. Nikisch, whose working out of the technical details and the brilliant colors of the orchestration showed a performance carried by study to the point of virtuosity.

The Bostonians, it goes without saying, were exceedingly well received and elicited heartiest applause from a fashionable audience that crowded Chickering Hall to its utmost, despite the counter attraction of Patti's first reappearance this season on the same evening.

The Kneisel Quartet.

WHETHER it was through the circumstance of the vastly superior acoustic qualities of the chamber music hall in the new Carnegie Hall as against those of Sherry's, or the most interesting program presented, or whether their playing was really above anything they had formerly done, anyhow the fact remains that never before, at least as far back as the writer's memory reaches, was a better chamber music performance given in New York than the one of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday evening last. They were heard in a beautiful string quartet in E flat by Carl von Dittersdorf, the immediate predecessor of Mozart, on whose writings he must have had an undisputable influence, for every once in a while a theme of Dittersdorf or the treatment of it shows where he "anticipated" "Don Giovanni." It is, indeed, a noble and pure work, especially the exquisite slow movement in G, which, however, did not originally belong to the E flat quartet, but was inserted in its present place by Concertmeister Lauterbach of Dresden, to whom belongs the credit of having edited many fine chamber music works.

The B flat andante from Grieg's G minor quartet was the second number. It is as characteristic of Grieg's peculiar mood and his mannerisms of harmonization as anything that can be imagined, and throughout breathes that Northern musical atmosphere that we have learned to associate with the name of Grieg.

Schubert's divinely beautiful and divinely long quintet in C major was the pièce de résistance of the evening. It is a veritable symphony for five instruments, and the second theme in E flat of the first movement is as lovely as the now celebrated 'cello theme of the unfinished symphony. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted in the performance of this quintet by Mr. Leo Schultz, who most favorably distinguished himself in his

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.—The third public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. The program consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto prelude, adagio and gavot for strings, Bach (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The audience was large, and the orchestra as usual played beautifully. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and played brilliantly and most musically, and had many recalls. Arthur Nikisch conducted.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall this afternoon, 2:30, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the talented young violinist and protégé of Adolph Brodsky. The program will be the following:

Songs..	"Die Quelle"	Goldmark
	"Der Nussbaum"	Schumann
	"Volkslied"	August Bungert
	"Ein Bettlerpaerchen"	Richard Heuberger
	"Indian Love Song"	Reginald de Koven
	"Provençalisches Lied"	Schumann
Violin solo, "Fantaisie Caprice"		Brahms
Songs..	"Geheimniss" "Therese" "Staendchen" "Wiegenlied" "Des Liebsten Schwur" "Vergeblisches Staendchen"	Brahms
Violin solos...
Songs..	"Am Manzanares"	Jensen
	"Beim Tanze"	Tschaikowsky
	"Serenade"	Richard Strauss
	"Staendchen"	Jensen
	"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1892.

The programme for the public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is: Wagner, "A Faust Overture;" Chopin, concerto in F minor, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist; Beethoven, "Heroic Symphony."

Mrs. Nordica's farewell concert to be given in the Music Hall, on Thursday night, Jan. 28, promises to be a delightful occasion. The programme is made up of selections from operas, three of which will be novelties to most of the audience, and includes five of the most striking portions of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Besides Mrs. Nordica, the performers will be Mrs. Scalchi, Paul Kalisch, Zoltan Däme (from the Covent Garden Opera Company, his first appearance here) and an orchestra, Mr. Sapio, conductor

---

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Mme. Nordica's tour, which began last October with the Symphony orchestra and during which she has appeared in oratorio festivals, grand opera, and concerts in the principal cities, has been one of flattering success. In every instance she has displayed abilities of the highest order and graces of person that have made her in other cities as much of a favorite as in her native New England. Her last appearance in public will be in the nature of an ovation, for the bare announcement already made of the operatic concert next Thursday evening at Music hall has caused an advance sale of seats seldom equaled.

The programme itself will be a choice one and enjoyable for its musical excellence. Mme. Scalchi will appear for the first time since her operatic engagement here two years ago. She is without question the greatest contralto of the day and her reappearance will add much to the enjoyment of the event. Herr Kalisch, whose successful performances in German opera are well remembered, will be the tenor and Mr. Dome, the baritone. An orchestra of forty pieces led by Mr. Sapio is also to assist.

The programme in full is:

PART I.

Overture, "Semiramide"..................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen"..........Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi." (Mitrane)............Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville)...Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad"...............Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmerelda"........A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Zaro" (Orfeo)..................Glück
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartette, (Rigoletto)........................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.

PART II.

Selections from Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Preludio and Siciliana.........................
...............Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Aria (Santuzza)........................Mme. Nordica
Duet (Santuzza and Turiddu)...............
.............Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo.....................................Orchestra
Duet (Santuzza and Alfio)...................
.............Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

e 1-21

Have you subscribed for tickets for the great Boston Symphony concert, February 16th, [redacted] t of its class of the winter. Give it such patronage that Fall River may be assured of at least one such entertainment a year. Send your address to O. E. Borden, with number of tickets desired.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-20

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Speculators are asking $2.50 for Nordica tickets.

The Musical Courier.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
BY THE
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

LITTLE need to attach the legend "Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch" under the portraits of this week's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER. Nikisch is now a name to conjure with in America, as it formerly was in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are a spirituelle combination that one seldom encounters in the artistic world, and in the singular unanimity of their tastes and happy married life they naturally recall to one's mind the similar unions of the Schumanns and the Brownings. Devotion to the very highest artistic ideals, coupled with a high degree of musical culture, single the Nikisches out as rare specimens seldom met with in the art world of to-day, where pelf is more eagerly sought for than genuine striving for lofty achievement.

Arthur Nikisch commands the forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestra, be it said, that has no parallel on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and grave doubts may be entertained if it has many rivals in Europe. The technical precision of the band and the immense fire and energy it displays may be credited in great part to its leader, whose virile, magnetic beat, enormous musical knowledge and widely cultured sympathies are well known now to metropolitan music lovers. Mr. Nikisch, whose personality is both graceful and forceful, is at home in most schools, for he is eclectic in his tastes, but as an interpreter of Schumann he has no equal, and the warmth and luminous qualities of his readings of the latter and other modern masters place him in the highest ranks of living conductors.

His gifted and charming wife, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, was a pupil of Schneider in Cologne, and received the most solid training in song, oratorio and opera. She sang in grand opera in Germany until Mr. Nikisch met her, wooed and won her. She is the possessor of a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, exquisitely cultivated, and in Lieder compositions by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, her strong forte, she displays musical insight and delightful taste.

That Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are potent factors in the advancement of musical culture of this country goes without saying.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE program with which our Boston visitors regaled our musical public on Tuesday night of last week, on the occasion of their third concert this season, was of an exclusively romantic order, and, although not so announced, contained an absolute novelty, at least as far as this country, and we believe also as far as Europe, is concerned.

This was Peter Tschaikowsky's concert fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 56, in G major. The work has never, to our recollection at least, appeared on a concert program, and it redounds therefore to Mrs. Julia Rivé King's credit to have brought to public notice one of the most interesting works the gifted Russian ever wrote for the piano. Certainly the second theme of the first movement is one of the strongest Tschaikowsky ever invented, and the slow movement in G minor, a dialogue between piano and violoncello (the latter instrument exquisitely handled by Mr. Schroeder), is absolutely beautiful. The last movement has too much of the Cossack spirit in it to please non-Muscovite musical ears, but it is fresh and interesting nevertheless and requires a good performer. The one great fault in the work is the cadenza in the first movement, which is entirely too long drawn out and lacks in variety or novelty of pianistic devices. Moreover, it ought to have been played with more verve and abandon than Mrs. King by her very nature was able to bestow upon it. This, however, is the only adverse criticism we have to offer upon that amiable artist's performance, for in every other respect her playing was most enjoyable and did ample justice to a work which bristles with difficulties. Her technic and musical memory, crispness and clearness of touch, good round tone and careful phrasing and pedaling were alike admirable. It is also but fair to state that she achieved a pronounced success.

The orchestral accompaniment, which is likewise no child's play, was, barring a single mistake (the one bar too previous entrance of the horn), performed in most careful, discreet and commendable fashion.

Mr. Nikisch gave a somewhat novel reading of the venerable "Freischütz" overture by drawing out the opening adagio to a breadth that Weber would probably have put down as a largo if he had intended it played so slowly; but the coda was given with a spirit and precision that were perfectly electrifying.

Of E. A. MacDowell's graceful and dainty orchestral suite, op. 42, in A minor, we have repeatedly spoken in terms of high praise, and it can only be reiterated that with more frequent hearing, especially when so exquisitely performed, the miniature work gains upon the listener, who discovers new harmonic beauties that are apt to be overlooked, or rather overheard, in less carefully brought out reproductions.

The final number was perhaps a trifle too lengthy, but otherwise fitted exceedingly well into the scheme of the program. It was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," dubbed a "symphony" by its composer, but in reality certainly more of the style and character of a suite. New York is thoroughly familiar with this interesting and richly endowed work of the Austrian composer, as it was one of the late Dr. Damrosch's favorites and he used to give it a most lovable reading. More tenderly, however, he never could have cared for it than did Mr. Nikisch, whose working out of the technical details and the brilliant colors of the orchestration showed a performance carried by study to the point of virtuosity.

The Bostonians, it goes without saying, were exceedingly well received and elicited heartiest applause from a fashionable audience that crowded Chickering Hall to its utmost, despite the counter attraction of Patti's first reappearance this season on the same evening.

The Kneisel Quartet.

WHETHER it was through the circumstance of the vastly superior acoustic qualities of the chamber music hall in the new Carnegie Hall as against those of Sherry's, or the most interesting program presented, or whether their playing was really above anything they had formerly done, anyhow the fact remains that never before, at least as far back as the writer's memory reaches, was a better chamber music performance given in New York than the one of the Kneisel Quartet on Friday evening last. They were heard in a beautiful string quartet in E flat by Carl von Dittersdorf, the immediate predecessor of Mozart, on whose writings he must have had an undisputable influence, for every once in a while a theme of Dittersdorf or the treatment of it shows where he "anticipated" "Don Giovanni." It is, indeed, a noble and pure work, especially the exquisite slow movement in G, which, however, did not originally belong to the E flat quartet, but was inserted in its present place by Concertmeister Lauterbach of Dresden, to whom belongs the credit of having edited many fine chamber music works.

The B flat andante from Grieg's G minor quartet was the second number. It is as characteristic of Grieg's peculiar mood and his mannerisms of harmonization as anything that can be imagined, and throughout breathes that Northern musical atmosphere that we have learned to associate with the name of Grieg.

Schubert's divinely beautiful and divinely long quintet in C major was the pièce de résistance of the evening. It is a veritable symphony for five instruments, and the second theme in E flat of the first movement is as lovely as the now celebrated 'cello theme of the unfinished symphony. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted in the performance of this quintet by Mr. Leo Schultz, who most favorably distinguished himself in his

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.—The third public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. The program consisted of Schumann's B flat symphony, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto prelude, adagio and gavot for strings, Bach (arranged by Bachrich), and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The audience was large, and the orchestra as usual played beautifully. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and played brilliantly and most musically, and had many recalls. Arthur Nikisch conducted.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch's Recital.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give a recital at Chickering Hall this afternoon, 2:30, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the talented young violinist and protégé of Adolph Brodsky. The program will be the following:

Songs..	"Die Quelle"	Goldmark
	"Der Nussbaum"	Schumann
	"Volkslied"	August Bungert
	"Ein Bettlerpaerchen"	Richard Heuberger
	"Indian Love Song"	Reginald de Koven
	"Provençalisches Lied"	Schumann
Violin solo,	"Fantaisie Caprice"	Brahms
Songs..	"Geheimniss"	Brahms
	"Therese"
	"Staendchen"
	"Wiegenlied"
	"Des Liebsten Schwur"
	"Vergeblisches Staendchen"
Violin solos...
Songs .	"Am Manzanares"	Jensen
	"Beim Tanze"	Tschaikowsky
	"Serenade"	Richard Strauss
	"Staendchen"	Jensen
	"Fruehlingsnacht"	Schumann

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1892.

The programme for the public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night is: Wagner, "A Faust Overture;" Chopin, concerto in F minor, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist; Beethoven, "Heroic Symphony."

Mrs. Nordica's farewell concert to be given in the Music Hall, on Thursday night, Jan. 28, promises to be a delightful occasion. The programme is made up of selections from operas, three of which will be novelties to most of the audience, and includes five of the most striking portions of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Besides Mrs. Nordica, the performers will be Mrs. Scalchi, Paul Kalisch, Zoltan Düme (from the Covent Garden Opera Company, his first appearance here) and an orchestra, Mr. Sapio, conductor

---

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Mme. Nordica's tour, which began last October with the Symphony orchestra and during which she has appeared in oratorio festivals, grand opera, and concerts in the principal cities, has been one of flattering success. In every instance she has displayed abilities of the highest order and graces of person that have made her in other cities as much of a favorite as in her native New England. Her last appearance in public will be in the nature of an ovation, for the bare announcement already made of the operatic concert next Thursday evening at Music hall has caused an advance sale of seats seldom equaled.

The programme itself will be a choice one and enjoyable for its musical excellence. Mme. Scalchi will appear for the first time since her operatic engagement here two years ago. She is without question the greatest contralto of the day and her reappearance will add much to the enjoyment of the event. Herr Kalisch, whose successful performances in German opera are well remembered, will be the tenor and Mr. Dome, the baritone. An orchestra of forty pieces led by Mr. Sapio is also to assist.

The programme in full is:

PART I.

Overture, "Semiramide"……Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen"……Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi." (Mitrane)……Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville)…Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad"……Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmerelda"……A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Zaro" (Orfeo)……Glück
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartette, (Rigoletto)……Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.

PART II.

Selections from Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rnsticana."

Preludio and Siciliana……Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Aria (Santuzza)……Mme. Nordica
Duet (Santuzza and Turiddu)……Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo……Orchestra
Duet (Santuzza and Alfio)……Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Have you subscribed for tickets for the great Boston Symphony concert, February 16th. ~~It will be the finest event~~ of its class of the winter. Give it such patronage that Fall River may be assured of at least one such entertainment a year. Send your address to O. E. Borden, with number of tickets desired.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1 20

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Speculators are asking $2.50 for Nordica tickets.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING. JANUARY 21, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

GADE.	OVERTURE. "Ossian."
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO, in A minor, op. 33.
WEBER-BERLIOZ.	INVITATION TO DANCE.
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a) BACH.	SARABANDE.
b) SCHUBERT.	MOMENT-MUSICAL.
c) KLENGEL.	SCHERZO.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in E flat, No. 3, (Rhenish). Vivace.—Molto moderato.— Andante.—Religioso.—Vivace.

SOLOIST:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1892.

An opportunity to hear Madame Nordica and Madame Scalchi again in Boston is to be given at Music Hall, Thursday evening. The company also includes Mr. Paul Kalisch and a new baritone, Mr. Zaltan Döme, of whom many pleasant things are said in advance, and who will make his Boston début with the famous baritone song from the 'Trumpeter of Sackingen.' The programme is very attractive, Madame Nordica singing 'Ah! fors e lui' from 'La Traviata,' and Madame Scalchi the habanera from 'Carmen;' while the second part is made up altogether of selections from Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' including for orchestra the prelude and intermezzo.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1892

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

Mme. Nordica, whose season at home has been one of prosperity and applause, is about to return to England where many engagements have long been awaiting her. Manager Ellis has arranged that her farewell concert shall take place at the Music Hall on next Thursday evening, when an attractive and brilliant programme will be presented. Mme. Nordica will be assisted by Mme. Scalchi, who has not been heard here for several years; Mr. Kalisch, and the new basso, Mr. Zoltan Döme. The accompaniments will be orchestral and the directer will be Mr. R. Sapio, who understands so well how to conduct for vocalists.

The Symphony concert of tonight will have this especial interest—that it will induce Mrs. H. H. A. Beach to make one of her rare appearances as a solo pianist. She has chosen the F-minor concerto of Chopin, of which yesterday's public rehearsal promised fine things for tonight. The only other works on the programme are Wagner's "Faust" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The Morning Times

PUBLISHED BY

CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,

No. 32 Central Street, Times Building

LOWELL, MASS.

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 22.

A FINE CONCERT.

Next Thursday evening the last appearance of Madame Nordica this season will be made an event of wide interest by an operatic concert at Boston Music hall under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has secured Madame Scalchi the great contralto, Herr Kalisch tenor, Mr. Dorne, baritone, and an orchestra of fifty musicians, who with Madame Nordica will interpret a programme of special attractiveness. The sale of seats is already reported as very large and the parting songs of this charming New England prima donna will be given to a particularly sympathetic and appreciative audience. Tickets $1 and $1.50, can be secured at the box office of Boston Music hall.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1892.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was too ill at New York [illegible] to appear in the concert arranged [illegible] Wednesday afternoon.

Boston Weekly Amusement Bulletin

AND

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1892.

MADAM LILLIAN NORDICA.

JESSIE BARTLETT DAVIS.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 21, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

GADE.	OVERTURE. "Ossian."
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO, in A minor, op. 33.
WEBER-BERLIOZ.	INVITATION TO DANCE.
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a) BACH.	SARABANDE.
b) SCHUBERT.	MOMENT-MUSICAL.
c) KLENGEL.	SCHERZO.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in E flat, No. 3, (Rhenish). Vivace.—Molto moderato.— Andante.—Religioso.—Vivace.

SOLOIST:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Piano used is a Steinway

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1892.

An opportunity to hear Madame Nordica and Madame Scalchi again in Boston is to be given at Music Hall, Thursday evening. The company also includes Mr. Paul Kalisch and a new baritone, Mr. Zaltan Döme, of whom many pleasant things are said in advance, and who will make his Boston début with the famous baritone song from the 'Trumpeter of Sackingen.' The programme is very attractive, Madame Nordica singing 'Ah! fors e lui' from 'La Traviata,' and Madame Scalchi the habanera from 'Carmen;' while the second part is made up altogether of selections from Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' including for orchestra the prelude and intermezzo.

The Morning Times

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No. 32 Central Street, Times Building
LOWELL, MASS.

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 22.

A FINE CONCERT.

Next Thursday evening the last appearance of Madame Nordica this season will be made an event of wide interest by an operatic concert at Boston Music hall under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has secured Madame Scalchi the great contralto, Herr Kalisch tenor, Mr. Dorne, baritone, and an orchestra of fifty musicians, who with Madame Nordica will interpret a programme of special attractiveness. The sale of seats is already reported as very large and the parting songs of this charming New England prima donna will be given to a particularly sympathetic and appreciative audience. Tickets $1 and $1.50, can be secured at the box office of Boston Music hall.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1892.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was too ill at New York with tonsilitis to appear in the concert arranged for her Wednesday afternoon.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1892

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

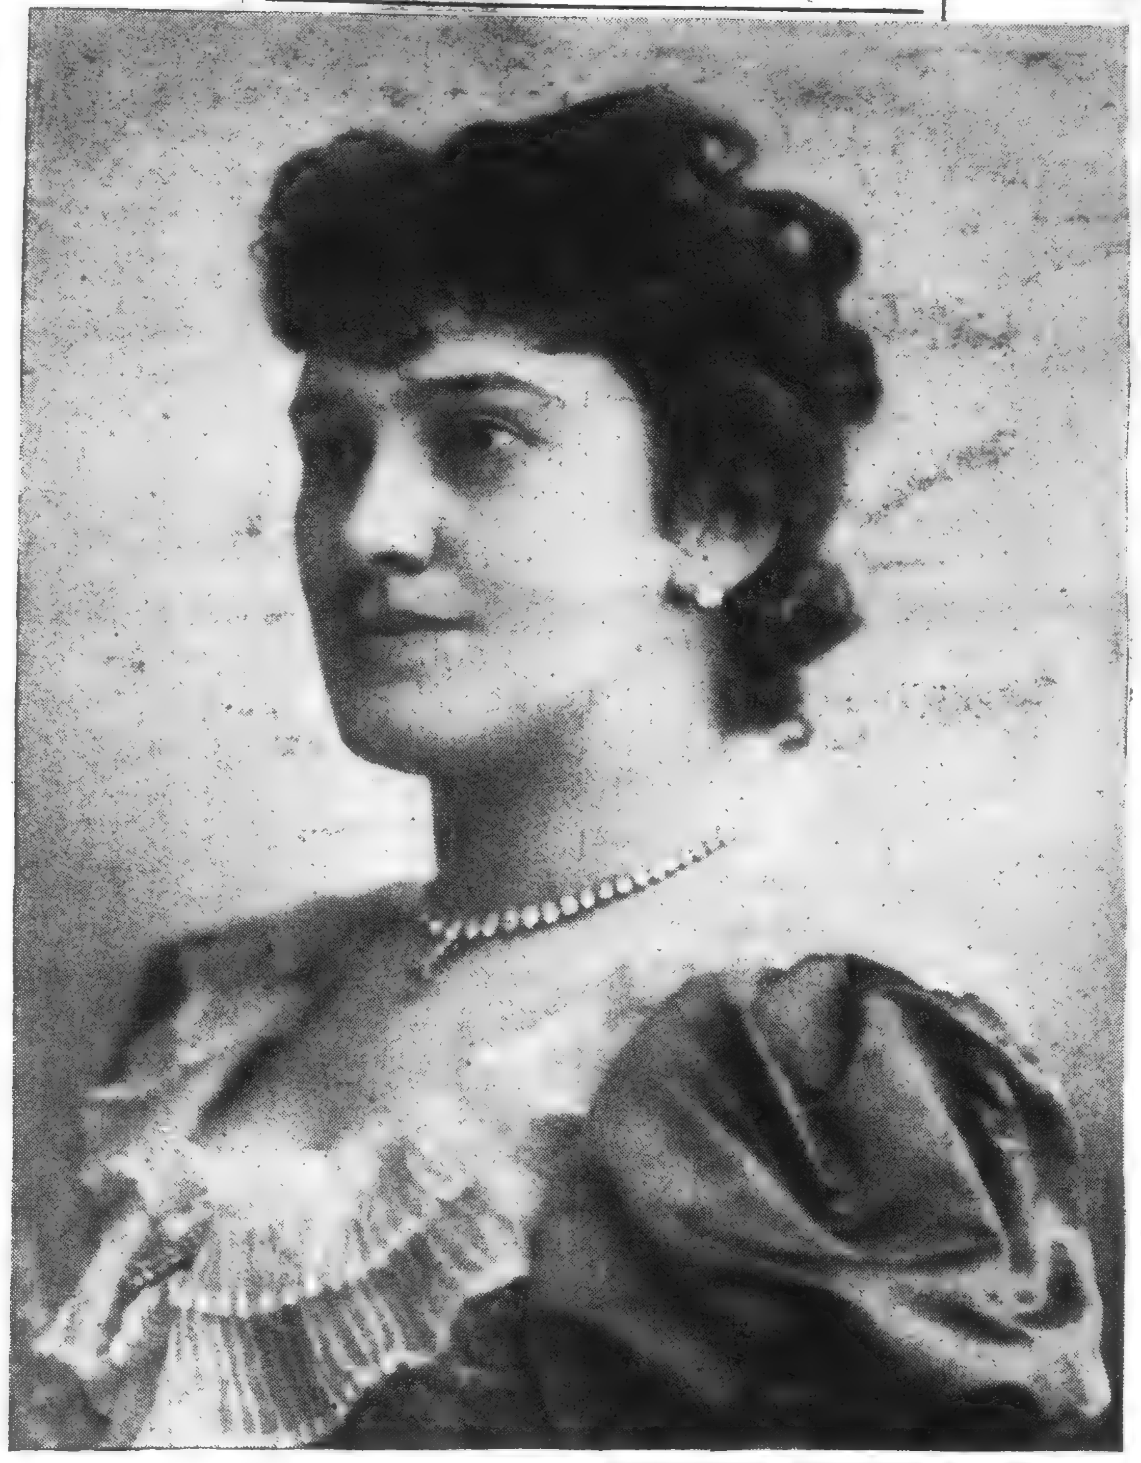
Mme. Nordica, whose season at home has been one of prosperity and applause, is about to return to England where many engagements have long been awaiting her. Manager Ellis has arranged that her farewell concert shall take place at the Music Hall on next Thursday evening, when an attractive and brilliant programme will be presented. Mme. Nordica will be assisted by Mme. Scalchi, who has not been heard here for several years; Mr. Kalisch, and the new basso, Mr. Zoltan Döme. The accompaniments will be orchestral and the directer will be Mr. R. Sapio, who understands so well how to conduct for vocalists.

The Symphony concert of tonight will have this especial interest—that it will induce Mrs. H. H. A. Beach to make one of her rare appearances as a solo pianist. She has chosen the F-minor concerto of Chopin, of which yesterday's public rehearsal promised fine things for tonight. The only other works on the programme are Wagner's "Faust" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

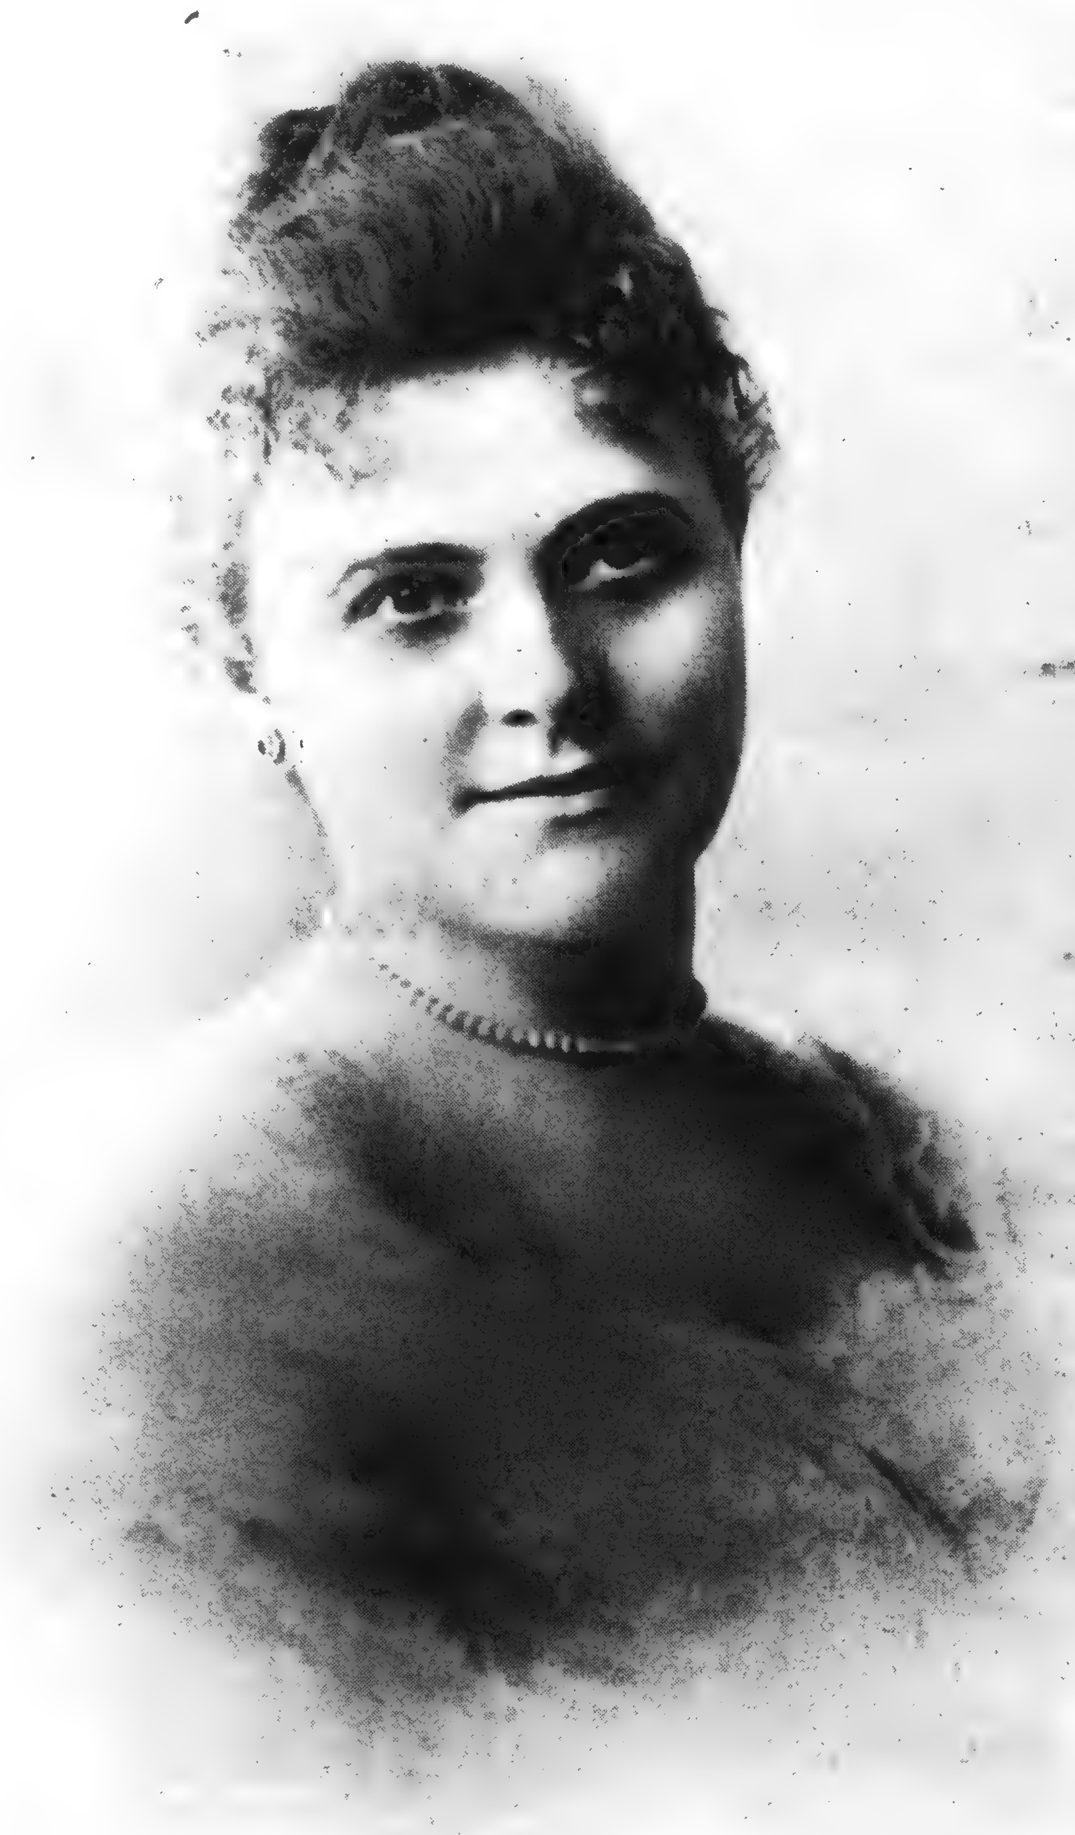
Boston Weekly Amusement Bulletin

AND

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1892.



MADAM LILLIAN NORDICA.



JESSIE BARTLETT DAVIS.

MUSIC HALL
LEWISTON MAINE.
CHAS. HORBURY MANAGER.

FIFTEENTH SEASON. SEASON OF 1891-2. NUMBER 71.

WHIPPED CREAM SODA
IS IMMENSE.
I am having a big run on it.
EVERYBODY LIKES IT.
I also have the best . . . .
CONFECTIONERY
. . . . to be found in the city.
MADE FRESH EVERY DAY.
S. A. CUMMINGS'
223 Main Street, - - - Lewiston.
OPEN AFTER THE ENTERTAINMENT.

TRY US ONCE
AND YOU WILL 'TRY, TRY AGAIN."
JUDKINS' LAUNDRY.
187 LISBON STREET,
LEWISTON, ME.

FRANK KILGORE,
FIRST-CLASS CARRIAGES
FURNISHED FOR Pleasure Parties and Weddings
AT ANY TIME.
Hearse and Carriages for Funerals at Short Notice.
— OFFICES —
Gerrish's Drug Store, & Residence, 107 College St.
☞ Connected by Telephone ☜

Call and see our fine line of LADIES' & GENTS'
Hand Sewed Shoes,
And get our Prices, before purchasing elsewhere.
Also a fine line of Slippers.
Sole agents for the AMERICAN NATIONAL SHOE BLACKING, the best in the world.
Call and get FREE SAMPLE.
JAMES W. CARVER,
123 Lisbon St., Lewiston.

TO-NIGHT!

GRAND
OPERATIC CONCERT

Only Appearance of the Renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

Mme. Lillian Nordica,

Accompanied by the following
Artists:

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI,
The Famous Tenor.

MR. ZOLTAN DOME,
Baritone of Covent Garden, London.

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
The gifted and favorite Pianist.

MR. FRANZ WILCZEK,
The distinguished Violinist.

LONG'S
RESTAURANT
Has been Enlarged and Newly Fitted.
You can get the best of Oysters, Good Steaks, and a Good Meal
at any time.
CHOICE BRANDS OF CIGARS.
LONG'S D. F. L.
Beats the world for a 5c. Cigar.
57 Lisbon St., Near Music Hall.

N. J. Laughton,
General Agent for Maine for
KRANICH & BATCH PIAOS.
Leading Makes of Organs and Small Musical Goods.
17 COURT ST., AUBURN,
84 LISBON ST., LEWISTON.

CITY RESTAURANT.
125 MAIN STREET,
MEALS COOKED TO ORDER AT ALL HOURS.
Regular Dinner 25 Cents.
FIRST-CLASS TABLE BOARD
Gentlemen, $3.25 per week.
Ladies, $2.50 per week.
CONFECTIONERY & CIGARS.
T. W. WEBB, Prop.,

C. L. SAUNDER'S
NEW RESTAURANT,
UNDER HOTEL ATWOOD -:- LEWISTON. LOWER MAIN STREET
Gents, - - - $3.00 per week.
Ladies, - - - $2.50 per week
REGULAR DINNER, 25 cts.
OYSTER STEWS, 15 cts.
AS GOOD AS CAN BE OBTAINED IN THE CITY

DOES ADVERTISING PAY? . . . .
. . . . ASK THOSE WHO ADVERTISE, ...
. . . . AND SEE WHAT THEY SAY.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday was heroic both in its beginning and end, for as Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony gives the character of a masculine warrior, Wagner's "Faust" overture portrays an equally masculine and virile philosopher; both works are examples of musical hero-worship, although cast in such different moulds. That Wagner was very much in earnest about this overture is sufficiently proven by his rescoring it in Zurich in 1855, 15 years after its composition in Paris. One can imagine its rather gloomy character to have sprung from the semi-starvation of the composer in the French capital. In the reaction from writing operatic transcriptions, cornet solos, etc., the pendulum seems to have swung too far in the direction of the abstruse, the mystical and the gloomy. The dark key-note is sounded even in the very first measures, where the sombre bass-tuba is added to the contrabasses. The performance of the work was a good one, although the demon of exaggeration seized upon one chord and a kettledrum note, which are marked in the score with a simple "f," but which became "sffz" in the interpretation.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist of the concert, and appeared in Chopin's F minor concerto. The public has recently had so much of Chopin, interpreted by such giants (in this school) as Paderewski and De Pachmann, that it was very bold, to say the least, for our Boston artist to make choice of such a work. Nevertheless the task was carried through with clearness and ability. One might have demanded more of passion and abandon, but eliminating these requirements, every movement was conscientiously and intelligently rendered. The first movement was rather square cut, and even the rubato effects of the second were made in cold blood, but the finale was the best part of the work, and was given with much grace and was well shaded. Much applause and a monster floral tribute followed. Mrs. Beach only appears in public for charitable purposes, and proves the old saying that "charity covereth a multitude of sins" untrue by the excellence of much of her work.

Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony began excellently; it is long since the orchestra has played with such steadiness and unity as were displayed in the first movement, and Mr. Nikisch seemed thoroughly en rapport with the subject, so that the performance equalled any ever given in Boston. The second movement was inferior, for not only was the orchestra often behind the conductor's beat, but certain ritenuto effects were introduced that never were authorized by Beethoven. At least one can compliment the performance of the movement in its avoiding the error of extreme slowness; many conductors sin in this respect; they should remember Coleridge's remark that the movement is "a funeral march in purple," that it is not pathos so much as brooding that is pictured, that it is Beethoven burying his hopes of freedom and of Napoleon, and not a feminine tearfulness that forms a chief part of the picture. It was noticeable that the important oboe theme was given in accordance with this view. M. Sautet is a great artist, but the Parisian taste often drives French oboe players to seek a thin, nasal and pathetic tone rather than the broader style that is cultivated in Germany; but in this march the oboe was more broadly played than for a long time past, and the result was most praiseworthy; Beethoven here pictured feminine grief, not a Mrs. Gummidge, but something akin to what Tennyson meant in "Home they brought her warrior dead."

The pauses, the orchestral sobs and sighs that close the movement were splendidly given. The scherzo was taken at an appropriately rapid pace, which was well sustained by the orchestra. It is really the first scherzo in musical history, for the scherzo of the second symphony, with which the composer replaced the minuet, was more of a minuet than the movement which bore that name in the first symphony. Here all trace of dance effect is gone and the chatter of the world, forgetting its hero and all his deeds, is predominant. Yet the trio, with its revelations of horn playing (it contains the most difficult and effective horn passages that had up to that time been written) is heroic and romantic too. If only our horn players could achieve a romantic and mellow tone! They play as if they had trombones to deal with! There was exquisite flute and oboe work done in the variations that close the work, and just here one cannot help wishing that the composer had used trombones too, as he did in the finale of the fifth symphony (the first time those instruments were admitted into symphony) for the whole movement is not so heroic as that later finale. The capricious tempo was finely given, and the symphony must be numbered with the successes of the season. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The last concert in Mme. Nordica's brilliant tour, which takes place on Thursday evening at Music Hall, is evidently to be such an ovation as any singer might be proud to receive. Manager Ellis has surrounded the star with an eminent musical array; her admirers, in unusual numbers, have secured their seats, and if Music Hall be not crowded, then every indication goes for naught. The programme contains operatic solos and concerted numbers, in which Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch, Mr. Dome and Mme. Nordica all take part, together with orchestral selections and several numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

THE ELBISREVER IS A NOVELTY IN A FOUR-IN-HAND TIE.
WOVEN IN ONE PIECE
Therefore REVERSIBLE, giving you two ties in one.
IT IS ECONOMICAL.
For Sale only by GLEDHILL & MANEY, Gents' Outfitters,
120 LISBON STREET.

Cressey's Restaurant,
Dining Hall and Oyster Rooms.
Meals cooked to order at all hours. Steaks, Chops, Oysters, Fish, &c.
REGULAR DINNER 35 Cts.
☞Oyster, Turkey, Chicken or Meat Suppers served on short notice, to large or small parties, at Restaurant.
ICE CREAM made to order, 1 gallon or 100, and delivered.
TABLE BOARD: Gentlemen, $3.50; Ladies 3.00 a week
D. B. Cressey, 167 Lisbon Street,
OPPOSITE E. S. PAUL'S. Open until after the Theatre.

MUSICIANS
Should call at the CONSERVATORY
MUSIC STORE.
FOR PROFESSIONAL GOODS.
We have just seceived a SELECTED Stock of New Songs and Piano Pieces for Concert work &c.
G. B. WHITMAN, Agent for BEHR BROS. PIANOS.
149 LISBON STREET.

YES you can get rid of your corns if you will invest twenty five cents in Diamond Corn Solvent. It Never Fails. YOU CAN Prepared only by O. W. Kimball & Co., Registered Druggist, 170 Lisbon St., Lewiston, Me.

HOWARD & CARVER,
DEALERS IN COAL & WOOD,
Lower Main Street. Lewiston.
All orders promptly filled. Small orders a specialty. Give us a call for we have a first-class stock of all kinds.

READ THE REPORT
OF THE NORDICA CONCERT,
IN THE AUBURN DAILY GAZETTE.

MISSES JOYCE & NELLIGAN, FINE MILLINERY,
39 LISBON ST.,
LEWISTON, MAINE.

MUSIC HALL
CHAS. HORBURY MANAGER.

TO-NIGHT!

Only Appearance of the Renowned
Prima Donna Soprano,

MME LILLIAN NORDICA

PROGRAMME:

1. Ballade...Chopin
MISS AUS DER OHE.
2. Song "Trumpeter of Sakkingen"..................Nessler
MR. DOME.
3. Solo for Violin, Caprice de Concert Vieuxtemps
MR. WILCZEK.
4. Aria "Faust"...Gounod
SIG. CAMPANINI.
5. Aria "Ah fors e lui" ....Verdi
MME. NORDICA.
6. Waltz Caprice...Tanssig
MISS AUS DER OHE.
7. Song, "Varrei more"......................................Tosti
SIG CAMPANINI.
8. Solo for Violin, "Gipsy Dances".................Sarasate
MR. WILCZEK.
9. Evening Song, "Tannhauser".......................Wagner
MR. DOME.
10. Polacca Esmeralda......................A Goring Thomas
MME NORDICA.
11. Rhapsodi Hongroise...Liszt
MISS AUS DER OHE.
12. Duet, "Aida"..Verdi
MME NORDICA and SIG. CAMPANINI.

THE GRAND PIANO used at this Concert is furnished by Steinway and Sons, New York.

KNABE
AND IVERS & POND
PIANOS
Old instruments taken in exchange. Terms easy and guaranteed to give satisfaction in every respect.
W. L. Lothrop, New Sales Room,
186 Lisbon St. Lewiston, Me.
(Over Douglas and Cook,)

MURPHY,
HATTER and FURRIER,

SIGN, GOLD HAT,
Lewiston, Me.

GO TO RAYMOND & GUPTILL,
THE STATIONERS,
For ALBUMS, PICTURE FRAMES,
TOILET SETS
In Wood and Plush Cases,
LAP TABLETS, WRITING DESKS,
POCKET BOOKS,
JUCK'S CHRISTMAS NOVELTIES,
Etc., Etc., Etc.
75 LISBON ST., LEWISTON, ME.

Arthur S. Melcher,

DEALER IN FINE FOOTWEAR SIGN
GOLD BOOT
Under Music Hall.
Opera House.

CHOCOLATE NOVELTIES.

SHORTCAKE
ICE CREAM

COCOANUT SPECIALTIES.

A. W. LANGMAID,
CATERER & CONFECTIONER, CAN . SUPPLY - YOU - WITH

BOSTON CHIPS, CHOCLATE CREAMS, CREAM LOZENGES,
HONEY SPLINTS, BUTTERCUPS, ACID DROPS,
RIBBON CANDY, SATIN DROPS, COUGH TABLETS.

FINE BON BONS, ICE CREAM AND SHERBETS.
What is the Pudding without the Sauce?
What is the Matinee without LANGMAID's Candies?

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday was heroic both in its beginning and end, for as Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony gives the character of a masculine warrior, Wagner's "Faust" overture portrays an equally masculine and virile philosopher; both works are examples of musical hero-worship, although cast in such different moulds. That Wagner was very much in earnest about this overture is sufficiently proven by his rescoring it in Zurich in 1855, 15 years after its composition in Paris. One can imagine its rather gloomy character to have sprung from the semi-starvation of the composer in the French capital. In the reaction from writing operatic transcriptions, cornet solos, etc., the pendulum seems to have swung too far in the direction of the abstruse, the mystical and the gloomy. The dark key-note is sounded even in the very first measures, where the sombre bass-tuba is added to the contrabasses. The performance of the work was a good one, although the demon of exaggeration seized upon one chord and a kettledrum note, which are marked in the score with a simple "f," but which became "sffz" in the interpretation.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist of the concert, and appeared in Chopin's F minor concerto. The public has recently had so much of Chopin, interpreted by such giants (in this school) as Paderewski and De Pachmann, that it was very bold, to say the least, for our Boston artist to make choice of such a work. Nevertheless the task was carried through with clearness and ability. One might have demanded more of passion and abandon, but eliminating these requirements, every movement was conscientiously and intelligently rendered. The first movement was rather square cut, and even the rubato effects of the second were made in cold blood, but the finale was the best part of the work, and was given with much grace and was well shaded. Much applause and a monster floral tribute followed. Mrs. Beach only appears in public for charitable purposes, and proves the old saying that "charity covereth a multitude of sins" untrue by the excellence of much of her work.

Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony began excellently; it is long since the orchestra has played with such steadiness and unity as were displayed in the first movement, and Mr. Nikisch seemed thoroughly en rapport with the subject, so that the performance equalled any ever given in Boston. The second movement was inferior, for not only was the orchestra often behind the conductor's beat, but certain ritenuto effects were introduced that never were authorized by Beethoven. At least one can compliment the performance of the movement in its avoiding the error of extreme slowness; many conductors sin in this respect; they should remember Coleridge's remark that the movement is "a funeral march in purple," that it is not pathos so much as brooding that is pictured, that it is Beethoven burying his hopes of freedom and of Napoleon, and not a feminine tearfulness that forms a chief part of the picture. It was noticeable that the important oboe theme was given in accordance with this view. M. Sautet is a great artist, but the Parisian taste often drives French oboe players to seek a thin, nasal and pathetic tone rather than the broader style that is cultivated in Germany; but in this march the oboe was more broadly played than for a long time past, and the result was most praiseworthy; Beethoven here pictured feminine grief, not a Mrs. Gummidge, but something akin to what Tennyson meant in "Home they brought her warrior dead."

The pauses, the orchestral sobs and sighs that close the movement were splendidly given. The scherzo was taken at an appropriately rapid pace, which was well sustained by the orchestra. It is really the first scherzo in musical history, for the scherzo of the second symphony, with which the composer replaced the minuet, was more of a minuet than the movement which bore that name in the first symphony. Here all trace of dance effect is gone and the chatter of the world, forgetting its hero and all his deeds, is predominant. Yet the trio, with its revelations of horn playing (it contains the most difficult and effective horn passages that had up to that time been written) is heroic and romantic too. If only our horn players could achieve a romantic and mellow tone! They play as if they had trombones to deal with! There was exquisite flute and oboe work done in the variations that close the work, and just here one cannot help wishing that the composer had used trombones too, as he did in the finale of the fifth symphony (the first time those instruments were admitted into symphony) for the whole movement is not so heroic as that later finale. The capricious tempo was finely given, and the symphony must be numbered with the successes of the season. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The last concert in Mme. Nordica's brilliant tour, which takes place on Thursday evening at Music Hall, is evidently to be such an ovation as any singer might be proud to receive. Manager Ellis has surrounded the star with an eminent musical array; her admirers, in unusual numbers, have secured their seats, and if Music Hall be not crowded, then every indication goes for naught. The programme contains operatic solos and concerted numbers, in which Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch, Mr. Dome and Mme. Nordica all take part, together with orchestral selections and several numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

AT MISS BOLAND'S
Kid Glove Store,
117 Lisbon Street, Opposite Sands Building,
Will be found one of the Largest and Best Assortments of Ladies', Men's, Misses', and Boys' Kid and Fabric Gloves.
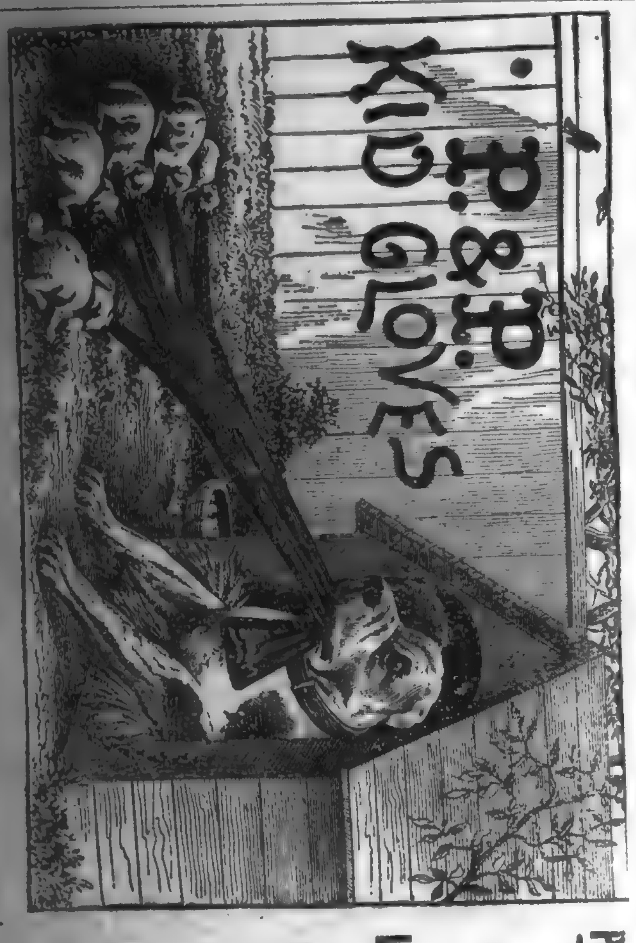
FITTING a specialty. MAIL ORDERS receive special attention.

I want to sell
Hotel St. ELMO.

Located on the Sea Wall at Old Orchard Beach. Will give a good trade to anyone desiring such a piece of property. The St. Elmo is finely located and almost new.

For further information inquire of

CHARLES HORBURY,
Music Hall.



Perfect Fitting
THE NEWEST SHADES
THE LATEST STYLES
The Best WORKMANSHIP
THEREFORE ALWAYS SATISFACT'RY
Every Pair Guaranteed.
FOR SALE AT
B. PECK DRY GOODS CO.

MUSIC HALL
CHAS. HORBURY MANAGER.

Saturday, January 23rd

◆

W. J. FLEMING'S

AROUND THE WORLD IN 80 DAYS

Prices, 35, 50 and 75c.

Reserved Seats now on Sale.

Visit the Big Jewelry Store for Elegant Goods at Lowest Prices.
ANTHOINE
JEWELER,
AND SCIENTIFIC OPTICIAN.
Fine Opera Glasses For Sale and To Let.
Goods and Repairing warranted by a written guarantee.
79 Lisbon St., Under Music Hall.

O. A. NORTON,
DEALER IN COAL AND WOOD.
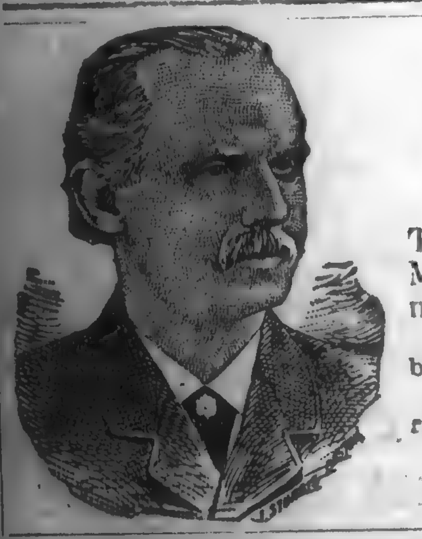
Office. 51 Ash Street.
rd on line of M. C. R. R., between Holland and Elm Streets.
Orders by mail or telephone promptly filled.

DON'T YOU FORGET
That this Programme is
The Best Advertising Medium
In The Two Cities.
For particulars and prices, call on
W. H. WEEKS,
BOOK & JOB PRINTER,
32 MAIN STREET,
LEWISTON. ME.



JOHN GARNER,
—DEALER IN—
Fancy Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Spices,
Canned Goods and Patent Medicines. The Best Brands of Flour and the Choicest Meats and Provisions. Agent for Fleischman & Co.'s Compressed Yeast.
Agent for all first-class Steamers. Passengers booked to or from all parts the world.
Drafts on all parts of the world for sale at low rates.
213 Park Street,
LEWISTON, MAINE.

FOR SALE CHEAP.
A second-hand 10 horse power Boiler.
E. F. Field, 36 Canal St.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday was heroic both in its beginning and end, for as Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony gives the character of a masculine warrior, Wagner's "Faust" overture portrays an equally masculine and virile philosopher; both works are examples of musical hero-worship, although cast in such different moulds. That Wagner was very much in earnest about this overture is sufficiently proven by his rescoring it in Zurich in 1855, 15 years after its composition in Paris. One can imagine its rather gloomy character to have sprung from the semi-starvation of the composer in the French capital. In the reaction from writing operatic transcriptions, cornet solos, etc., the pendulum seems to have swung too far in the direction of the abstruse, the mystical and the gloomy. The dark key-note is sounded even in the very first measures, where the sombre bass-tuba is added to the contrabasses. The performance of the work was a good one, although the demon of exaggeration seized upon one chord and a kettledrum note, which are marked in the score with a simple "f," but which became "sffz" in the interpretation.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist of the concert, and appeared in Chopin's F minor concerto. The public has recently had so much of Chopin, interpreted by such giants (in this school) as Paderewski and De Pachmann, that it was very bold, to say the least, for our Boston artist to make choice of such a work. Nevertheless the task was carried through with clearness and ability. One might have demanded more of passion and abandon, but eliminating these requirements, every movement was conscientiously and intelligently rendered. The first movement was rather square cut, and even the rubato effects of the second were made in cold blood, but the finale was the best part of the work, and was given with much grace and was well shaded. Much applause and a monster floral tribute followed. Mrs. Beach only appears in public for charitable purposes, and proves the old saying that "charity covereth a multitude of sins" untrue by the excellence of much of her work.

Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony began excellently; it is long since the orchestra has played with such steadiness and unity as were displayed in the first movement, and Mr. Nikisch seemed thoroughly en rapport with the subject, so that the performance equalled any ever given in Boston. The second movement was inferior, for not only was the orchestra often behind the conductor's beat, but certain ritenuto effects were introduced that never were authorized by Beethoven. At least one can compliment the performance of the movement in its avoiding the error of extreme slowness; many conductors sin in this respect; they should remember Coleridge's remark that the movement is "a funeral march in purple," that it is not pathos so much as brooding that is pictured, that it is Beethoven burying his hopes of freedom and of Napoleon, and not a feminine tearfulness that forms a chief part of the picture. It was noticeable that the important oboe theme was given in accordance with this view. M. Sautet is a great artist, but the Parisian taste often drives French oboe players to seek a thin, nasal and pathetic tone rather than the broader style that is cultivated in Germany; but in this march the oboe was more broadly played than for a long time past, and the result was most praiseworthy; Beethoven here pictured feminine grief, not a Mrs. Gummidge, but something akin to what Tennyson meant in "Home they brought her warrior dead."

The pauses, the orchestral sobs and sighs that close the movement were splendidly given. The scherzo was taken at an appropriately rapid pace, which was well sustained by the orchestra. It is really the first scherzo in musical history, for the scherzo of the second symphony, with which the composer replaced the minuet, was more of a minuet than the movement which bore that name in the first symphony. Here all trace of dance effect is gone and the chatter of the world, forgetting its hero and all his deeds, is predominant. Yet the trio, with its revelations of horn playing (it contains the most difficult and effective horn passages that had up to that time been written) is heroic and romantic too. If only our horn players could achieve a romantic and mellow tone! They play as if they had trombones to deal with! There was exquisite flute and oboe work done in the variations that close the work, and just here one cannot help wishing that the composer had used trombones too, as he did in the finale of the fifth symphony (the first time those instruments were admitted into symphony) for the whole movement is not so heroic as that later finale. The capricious tempo was finely given, and the symphony must be numbered with the successes of the season. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The last concert in Mme. Nordica's brilliant tour, which takes place on Thursday evening at Music Hall, is evidently to be such an ovation as any singer might be proud to receive. Manager Ellis has surrounded the star with an eminent musical array; her admirers, in unusual numbers, have secured their seats, and if Music Hall be not crowded, then every indication goes for naught. The programme contains operatic solos and concerted numbers, in which Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch, Mr. Dome and Mme. Nordica all take part, together with orchestral selections and several numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound
"Gives good satisfaction."
C. P. OSGOOD, Kingman.

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound
"Goes well." It is a good medicine.
THORNTON & REED, Springfield.

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound
"Cured my cough when everything else failed."
S. P. PAGE, Burlington.

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound
"Cured a bad cough for me when I had done everything else I could with no success."
DANIEL SALLEY, La Grange.

"Syrup Pix Liquida Compound as a cough Specific has proved very effectual."
O. H. WEYMOUTH, Howland

"Syrup Pix Liquida Compound is a good thing. I sell lots of it."
JOHN SEAVY, East Hampden.

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound
"Sells as well as any medicine I keep.
GEORGE W. SMITH, Mattawamkeag.

Syrup Pix Liquida Compound is sold everywhere for $.35.

Made only by
AUBURN DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO.,
AUBURN, MAINE.

PRAGER CLOTHING COMPANY.

Owing to the unseasonable weather the past fall, we find ourselves over stocked with

Ulsters, Overcoats, Reefers and Heavy Weight Suitings for Men, Boys, and Children. All new fresh goods of the latest styles and best manufacture which will be sold at prices unheard of heretofore in the history of the clothing trade.

It]will pay every one to buy a supply for next winters use while these goods are being closed out.

Our Fine Dress Suits and Pants are unequaled by all other dealers for Style Workmanship and Price.

In our Hat, Cap and Gents' Furnishings Department will be found Latest Styles, and Largest Assortment ever shown in Lewiston at the Lowest Prices.

IF YOU WANT TO SAVE MONEY, EXAMINE OUR FINE STOCK BEFORE BUYING.

NO TROUBLE TO SHOW GOODS. ONE LOW PRICE TO ALL

PRAGER CLOTHING COMPANY,
87 LISBON ST., MUSIC HALL BL'K.
LEWISTON, MAINE.

WORTH REMEMBERING

You can furnish a home comfortably and so easily, that you scarcely miss the small sum it costs, by adopting our Contract System. One fourth down, and Weekly or monthly payments to suit. . . . .

SITTING ROOMS FURNISHED FOR $30. CHAMBERS FURNISHED FOR $30. KITCHENS FURNISHED FOR $30.

If you want the Best Made, we have it. If you want the Cheapest, we keep it. We sell everything needed for the complete fitting out of a home. . . . .

CARPETS, FURNITURE, RANGES. SEWING MACHINES, ORGANS, PICTURES, CROCKERY, LAMPS, ETC., ETC., ETC.

THE ATKINSON HOUSE FURNISHING COMPANY.
MAIN STREET, AUBURN, MAINE.
HEADQUARTERS, PORTAND, MAINE. - - - - ISAAC C. ATKINSON, GENERAL MANAGER

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday was heroic both in its beginning and end, for as Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony gives the character of a masculine warrior, Wagner's "Faust" overture portrays an equally masculine and virile philosopher; both works are examples of musical hero-worship, although cast in such different moulds. That Wagner was very much in earnest about this overture is sufficiently proven by his rescoring it in Zurich in 1855, 15 years after its composition in Paris. One can imagine its rather gloomy character to have sprung from the semi-starvation of the composer in the French capital. In the reaction from writing operatic transcriptions, cornet solos, etc., the pendulum seems to have swung too far in the direction of the abstruse, the mystical and the gloomy. The dark key-note is sounded even in the very first measures, where the sombre bass-tuba is added to the contrabasses. The performance of the work was a good one, although the demon of exaggeration seized upon one chord and a kettledrum note, which are marked in the score with a simple "f," but which became "sffz" in the interpretation.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist of the concert, and appeared in Chopin's F minor concerto. The public has recently had so much of Chopin, interpreted by such giants (in this school) as Paderewski and De Pachmann, that it was very bold, to say the least, for our Boston artist to make choice of such a work. Nevertheless the task was carried through with clearness and ability. One might have demanded more of passion and abandon, but eliminating these requirements, every movement was conscientiously and intelligently rendered. The first movement was rather square cut, and even the rubato effects of the second were made in cold blood, but the finale was the best part of the work, and was given with much grace and was well shaded. Much applause and a monster floral tribute followed. Mrs. Beach only appears in public for charitable purposes, and proves the old saying that "charity covereth a multitude of sins" untrue by the excellence of much of her work.

Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony began excellently; it is long since the orchestra has played with such steadiness and unity as were displayed in the first movement, and Mr. Nikisch seemed thoroughly en rapport with the subject, so that the performance equalled any ever given in Boston. The second movement was inferior, for not only was the orchestra often behind the conductor's beat, but certain ritenuto effects were introduced that never were authorized by Beethoven. At least one can compliment the performance of the movement in its avoiding the error of extreme slowness; many conductors sin in this respect; they should remember Coleridge's remark that the movement is "a funeral march in purple," that it is not pathos so much as brooding that is pictured, that it is Beethoven burying his hopes of freedom and of Napoleon, and not a feminine tearfulness that forms a chief part of the picture. It was noticeable that the important oboe theme was given in accordance with this view. M. Sautet is a great artist, but the Parisian taste often drives French oboe players to seek a thin, nasal and pathetic tone rather than the broader style that is cultivated in Germany; but in this march the oboe was more broadly played than for a long time past, and the result was most praiseworthy; Beethoven here pictured feminine grief, not a Mrs. Gummidge, but something akin to what Tennyson meant in "Home they brought her warrior dead."

The pauses, the orchestral sobs and sighs that close the movement were splendidly given. The scherzo was taken at an appropriately rapid pace, which was well sustained by the orchestra. It is really the first scherzo in musical history, for the scherzo of the second symphony, with which the composer replaced the minuet, was more of a minuet than the movement which bore that name in the first symphony. Here all trace of dance effect is gone and the chatter of the world, forgetting its hero and all his deeds, is predominant. Yet the trio, with its revelations of horn playing (it contains the most difficult and effective horn passages that had up to that time been written) is heroic and romantic too. If only our horn players could achieve a romantic and mellow tone! They play as if they had trombones to deal with! There was exquisite flute and oboe work done in the variations that close the work, and just here one cannot help wishing that the composer had used trombones too, as he did in the finale of the fifth symphony (the first time those instruments were admitted into symphony) for the whole movement is not so heroic as that later finale. The capricious tempo was finely given, and the symphony must be numbered with the successes of the season. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The last concert in Mme. Nordica's brilliant tour, which takes place on Thursday evening at Music Hall, is evidently to be such an ovation as any singer might be proud to receive. Manager Ellis has surrounded the star with an eminent musical array; her admirers, in unusual numbers, have secured their seats, and if Music Hall be not crowded, then every indication goes for naught. The programme contains operatic solos and concerted numbers, in which Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch, Mr. Dame and Mme. Nordica all take part, together with orchestral selections and several numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1892.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Mrs. Beach Makes a Favorable Impression as the Piano Soloist.

Music Hall was crowded last night with the usual attentive audience, who came to listen to an attractive programme, which included selections from Wagner, Chopin and Beethoven.

It is seldom that the Symphony orchestra has better opportunities for effective playing than was afforded by Wagner's "Faust's Overture." The theme, which is replete with passionate sentiment and dramatic feeling, was interpreted by Nikisch with wonderful vigor, and the cadence was executed by the orchestra with beautiful effect and vivacity.

The stormy discontent, the indefinite longings, and the bitter complaints and curses of Faust found grand expression in the harmonious altos and the sudden dropping into pathetic tremors—while the effect of distant tones and sudden modulation of notes, introduced here and there, added a poetic suggestiveness to the whole which was cordially appreciated by the audience.

Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, the orchestration of which was arranged by the composer himself, was played by Mrs. Beach, the soloist of the evening.

Mrs. Beach's playing was very skilful, and at times was marked by rare sentiment and delicacy. She displayed almost remarkable talent in her interpretation of the second movement in the concerto, and though there was nothing original in her interpretation she gave full expression to the wonderful and fantastic beauties with which it is pregnant.

The orchestra accompaniments, though cold and weak at first, improved wonderfully in the last movement, and the quick, vivacious, almost sportive tempo with which it concluded, produced a very agreeable impression.

Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of Beethoven's third symphony arrested the attention of the audience, who sat through, listening to the four movements with almost spellbound watchfulness.

The bold, vigorous movement, swelling gradually to a grand diapason and suddenly dropping to a series of heroic staccati, the dramatic climaxes in the adagio, afforded a sublime contrast to the mournful strains, the solemn chords and the pathetic, almost heart-rending notes which pervaded the second movement.

The sighing sorrow, the impotent despair gradually changing to triumphant hope, and the struggling, quivering feeling with which the movement was pregnant, were beautifully expressed by the orchestra, who displayed their powers to excellent advantage, which were thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C minor................Spohr
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for violin, in G minor..............Bruch
A pastoral prelude........................Chadwick
(First time.)
Three Slavonic dances...................Dvorak

MME. NORDICA'S CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance, in Music Hall, Next Thursday Evening.

As a fitting close to Mme. Nordica's tour of the United States, Mr. C. A. Ellis has arranged for an operatic concert at Music Hall next Thursday evening. The occasion will be made very attractive by an array of distinguished soloists and a grand orchestra of 50 musicians, in a programme splendidly arranged to display their talent to especial advantage.

Aside from the charming character of the music and the eminence of the soloists, the occasion will be one of exceeding interest, as it will mark Boston's appreciation of one of the foremost singers this country has produced—one who has secured an artistic standing in Europe, which few of any nationality have attained, and whose recent successes in concert, in oratorio and in grand opera have renewed and extended her fame in America.

The assisting artists are Mme. Scalchi, the great contralto, her first appearance in Boston for two years; Herr Kalish, the distinguished German tenor, and Mr. Dorne, barytone from Covent Garden, London.

The programme is as follows:

Overture, Semiramide........................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, Trumpeter of Sackingen..............Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, Ah! rendimi (Mitrane)...............Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, Una Voce (Barber of Seville.)......Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, Barber of Bagdad..................Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca Esmerelda.............A. Goring Thomas
Mme Nordica.
Aria, Che faro (Orfeo).......................Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartet, Rigoletto...............................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.
Selections from Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Preludio and Siciliana...Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Aria (Santuzza)..................Mme. Nordica
Duet (Santuzza and Turiddu)
Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo.............................Orchestra
Duet (Santuzza and Alfio)
Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Wagner's "Faust Overture;" Chopin's Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Heroic." Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist. In 1840 Wagner had ready a "Faust" overture, which he sketched originally as a movement for a "Faust" symphony. Through the kindness of Schlesinger, the publisher, it was put in the hands of the Directors of the "Société des Concerts." We learn from a number of "La Gazette Musicale" of the same year that after the first and the only rehearsal the players looked at each other, perplexed, if not absolutely stupefied. They were the same players who had given a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that called forth the unqualified praise of Wagner. So the "Faust" overture was not heard in Paris until 1870, in its present form. And now in 1892 the question arises "What did Wagner mean?" For the hypermoderns claim that the hearer must take into consideration the intentions of the composer as well as his actual performance. Viewed as purely absolute music, without any reference to "intentions," this overture is blatant, amorphous and dull. But let us examine the "intentions" of Wagner. This overture, it seems, should represent in music "the solitary Faust, longing, despairing, cursing. The feminine floats around him as an object of his longing, but not in its divine reality; and it is just this insufficient image of his longing which he destroys in his despair." This was Wagner's original idea, and when he rewrote the overture the idea was preserved without material change. The devout Wagnerite keeps this idea firmly in mind when he listens, and so finds enjoyment in the musical portrayal of "longing, despairing, cursing." But would he find these emotions and expressions of emotions in the music unless he were first prepared by the text? This is the old question, and the answer in each case must be an individual one. One hearer may agree with Mr. Hugo Bussmeyer, who once wrote a pamphlet of 40 pages to prove that the overture is a great work. Another may echo feelingly the remark of Hanslick, that the lines of the motto of the overture, "Existence lies a load upon my breast; Life is a curse and death a longed-for rest," express faithfully the feelings of the unfortunate hearer.

⁂

Mrs. Beach was very warmly applauded for her performance of the Chopin concerto. This performance was distinguished by clearness, elegance and feminine refinement, rather than by breadth and passion. It was sane and free from sentimentalism. Her rubato was not always apparently spontaneous, and at times she robbed without giving back. Nor were the arabesques played with sufficient nonchalance. They were too precise, too exact, too carefully planned. But as a whole her performance was a very creditable one, although, as a pianist, she appears to greater advantage in a smaller hall and without the rivalry of the orchestra.

⁂

Mr. Nikisch showed in his version of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony his most characteristic failing; the desire to produce an effect, even if the effect is directly opposed to the express wish of the composer. He is not alone. There are conductors in Europe and in America who look upon a composer's score as a medium merely of showing their own individuality. Rubinstein speaks of them in "A Conversation on Music," and as follows: "You spoke before of the best interpretation of the master works nowadays—I have my doubts of that—the interpreters of to-day (Director and Virtuoso) delight especially in a capricious interpretation of the classical works (for which Wagner and Liszt are most to blame)—change of tempo, holds, ritardandos, stringendos, crescendos and so on, not written by the composer." Take a very simple illustration. A theme of eight measures is given by the composer to the first violins. It is marked simply piano. A crescendo is indicated at the ninth measure. The simple beauty of the theme sung with pure tone does not satisfy Mr. Nikisch. With the second measure he begins a crescendo, so that when he reaches the ninth, instead of a mezzo-forte, or even a forte, there is very apt to be a fortissimo. Nervous unrest takes the place of serenity. The designed effect of the composer's crescendo is discounted at the very start. Or would any one Saturday evening have supposed from the performance of the "Funeral March" that Beethoven had written at the beginning of it sotto voce and pianissimo? But there is no need of multiplying instances. The new method of treating old works is admired by many. It shows the originality of the director; it makes the works themselves "more interesting."

MME. NORDICA'S CONCERT.

Boston Music Hall on Thursday evening will be the scene of a delightful concert, and one doubly interesting from the opportunity it gives to show that home appreciation for a noble artist is equal to that she has obtained abroad. On this occasion Mme. Nordica will close a tour which has been brilliant, varied and triumphant, whether she appeared in concert, festival or opera. Manager Ellis has arranged a choice programme of operatic selections, and secured for supporting artists such famous singers as Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch and Mr. Dome, and a full orchestra, with Signor Sapio to conduct. Already the sale of seats indicates that there will be a fashionable, representative and overflowing audience.

NOTES.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert in Music Hall, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the programme included Wagner's "Faust" overture, the F minor piano concerto by Chopin and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The "Faust" overture has but rarely had so good a performance as that given by Mr. Nikisch on this occasion, and the beauty of the tone pictures was made delightfully clear throughout the composition. The merits of the work of the orchestra in this number of the programme were quickly and enthusiastically appreciated by the audience.

Mrs. Beach was not altogether wise in putting herself before such an audience in so large an auditorium in Chopin's familiar concerto. She is a very gifted player, a musician of excellent parts, and an artist who shows in her limited appearances in concert work a distinct devotion to her chosen field of effort. Her playing is always strictly correct, intelligent and painstaking, but when she enters into the performance of such a work as the Chopin concerto of the evening, her limitations are made very apparent. The emotional characteristics of Chopin's compositions may be too strongly developed in the playing of Paderewsky and De Pachmann, but Mrs. Beach, in last evening's performance failed to give this element in the concerto the desired prominence, and for this reason the lovely adagio was but little appreciated. The brilliant rondo also makes demands upon a player which Mrs. Beach is evidently unequal to at present, yet all her work was characterized by so much earnestness, and was so free from ostentation, that she was heartily commended by the applause of the audience as she ended her playing, and had an additional complimentary recall after she had retired from the stage.

In his reading of the No. 3 Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch merited and recived the highest praise, the beauties of the several movement standing out in bold relief in the performance of the work.

Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include: Spohr's symphony No. 3 in C minor, Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, George W. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

MME. NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

Mme. Lillian Nordica has had a triumphal tour in New England cities the last week, and her immense popularity has been most conclusively shown wherever she has appeared. This artist has such a vast circle of friends and admirers in and about this city that it is not surprising to learn that her farewell concert for the season at Music Hall next Thursday evening is to take on the character of a grand ovation to Mme. Nordica, and a congratulatory gathering in honor of her successes throughout the country during the tour to be ended on that occasion.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has surrounded Mme. Nordica with some eminent artists for the evening, including Mme. Sofia Scalchi, the distinguished contralto; Mr. Paul Kalisch, the famous tenor; Mr. Zoltan Dome, baritone, of Covent Garden, London (his first appearance in Boston), and a complete orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor. The miscellaneous programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Semiramide"..................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen"..........Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi (Mitrane)..............Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville)....Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad"..................Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmeralda"..........A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Zaro" (Orgee)....................Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartet (Rigoletto)................................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.
To be followed by selections from Masagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who, owing to a very severe attack of tonsilitis, was unable to sing in New York last Wednesday, is, if she is able, to sing with the Cecilia at its two concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Wagner's inscrutable "Faust" overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenuous but pervertedly imaginative people have, from time to time, plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing felines ignorant of any music but that of nature. We fear that the solution of this ugly musical problem must be delayed until those other problems, perpetual motion and squaring the circle, are solved. Whether this be so or not, the overture is as depressingly dreary, as drearily dry and as dryly disheartening on a twentieth hearing as it was on a first. It was read and played with much dramatic intensity of feeling, but whether it was read rightly or wrongly it is not easy to say; and after all it does not seem to matter much, for it resembles those picture aberrations of the famous Turner, that were so confused that it made no difference whether they were hung upside down, or not. It was followed by Chopin's Concerto in F-minor, the solo part of which was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. We have been so surfeited on Chopin of late by such unapproachable Chopin interpreters as de Pachmann and Paderewski, that it is to be regretted Mrs. Beach did not select a work from some other composer, to say nothing of the exciting of comparisons, which, in the very nature of things, became inevitable. Her performance, however, may be warmly praised for its grace, its neat and delicate technique and its fluent ease. In style it was, perhaps, somewhat finical and wanting in breath and passion; but the effort, as a whole, was abundant in pleasing interest and was fairly entitled to the vigorous applause and the recalls that rewarded the artist. The concert ended with Beethoven's "Eroiaa" Symphony. The reading accorded the work, did not, on the whole, depart widely from the conventional one. There were some liberties, of a sugary sentimental description, taken with the tempi here and there, and one or two new and obtrusively unnecessary rallentandos were made in the funeral march and an occasional neglect of some of the more significant nuances indicated by the composer; but taken altogether the interpretation was spirited and fairly interesting. The playing of the orchestra was admirable throughout. The soloist at the next concert is to be Mr. T. Adamowski. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony by Spohr, not before heard at these concerts.

On Thursday evening Mme. Nordica will make her last appearance in America this season in a grand operatic concert, assisted by Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Paul Kalisch, Mr. Zoltan Döme, and a full orchestra under the direction of Sig. R. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will be heard in "Una Voce," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville;" the quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto;" Goring Thomas's Polacca "Esmeralda;" Santuzza's aria "Cavalleria Rusticana," and in other selectione from that opera. Mme. Scalchi will sing Rossi's "Ah rendemi" and Bizet's "Habanera" from "Carmen." Mr. Kalisch will contribute to the concert an air from "The Trumpeter of Sackingen," and another from "The Barber of Bagdad." The second part of the programme includes the prelude and intermezzo from "Cavlaleria Rusticana." As will be seen, the programme is remarkably attractive.

Boston Post

MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the concert given in Music Hall Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of unusual interest to Boston people, as it was closely connected with a lady who ranks high both as musician and composer. The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as a soloist has been pleasantly anticipated, and no composition better calculated to bring out the ability of a pianist could have been chosen than the second number on the programe. Chopin's concerto in F minor, op. 21, is in three movements, and dates from the year 1829, when Chopin had barely reached manhood. It was composed while he was living in Warsaw, and was first played at a concert at that city March 17, 1830, by Chopin himself.

Mrs. Beach did her task well; her playing was clear, clean and precise, although there was little vibration in the tones, little of the carrying quality that is so necessary in making pianoforte music interesting. Her shading was excellent and her touch very delicate at times, but she lacked, in a measure, the necessary power to make the performance masterly.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of "A Faust Overture" made it almost interesting, although it is lacking in Wagner's peculiar originality. His original plan was to write a Faust symphony, with this as the first movement, but the plan was never carried out. It is incomplete in many ways.

The Beethoven symphony No. 3, styled "Heroic," was finely rendered. It has been included in the repertoire of each season but one since the Boston Symphony concerts were founded. The funeral march received a masterly rendering and the heartiest reception of the whole programme. Next week's concert will present Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist and two novelties in orchestral music—Spohr's symphony No. 3, in C minor, and "A Pastoral Prelude" by Chadwick.

A notable event to musical Boston will be the farewell concert to Mme. Nordica at Music Hall on Thursday evening. Mme. Scalchi, the contralto; Herr Kalisch, the German tenor; Mr. Zoltan Dorm, baritone, and an orchestra led by Signor Sapio will assist.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert and public rehearsal at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme embraced Schumann's Symphony No. 1, a Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The soloist of the occasion was that excellent pianiste, Fannie Bloomfield Leisler, who played Rubinstein's D-minor Concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET gave a concert in the chamber music room of Carnegie Hall Friday evening week. The finished playing of this club is highly satisfactory and wins the approbation of all hearers. The programme consisted of a Quartet by Carl Dittersdorf, the beautiful Andante from Grieg's G minor Quartet, and Schubert's C major Quintet.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1892.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Mrs. Beach Makes a Faverable Impression as the Piano Soloist.

Music Hall was crowded last night with the usual attentive audience, who came to listen to an attractive programme, which included selections from Wagner, Chopin and Beethoven.

It is seldom that the Symphony orchestra has better opportunities for effective playing than was afforded by Wagner's "Faust's Overture." The theme, which is replete with passionate sentiment and dramatic feeling, was interpreted by Nikisch with wonderful vigor, and the cadence was executed by the orchestra with beautiful effect and vivacity.

The stormy discontent, the indefinite longings, and the bitter complaints and curses of Faust found grand expression in the harmonious altos and the sudden dropping into pathetic tremors—while the effect of distant tenes and sudden modulation of notes, introduced here and there, added a poetic suggestiveness to the whole which was cordially appreciated by the audience.

Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, the orchestration of which was arranged by the composer himself, was played by Mrs. Beach, the soloist of the evening.

Mrs. Beach's playing was very skilful, and at times was marked by rare sentiment and delicacy. She displayed almost remarkable talent in her interpretation of the second movement in the concerto, and though there was nothing original in her interpretation she gave full expression to the wonderful and fantastic beauties with which it is pregnant.

The orchestra accompaniments, though cold and weak at first, improved wonderfully in the last movement, and the quick, vivacious, almost sportive tempo with which it concluded, produced a very agreeable impression.

Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of Beethoven's third symphony arrested the attention of the audience, who sat through, listening to the four movements with almost spellbound watchfulness.

The bold, vigorous movement, swelling gradually to a grand diapason and suddenly dropping to a series of heroic staccati, the dramatic climaxes in the adagio, afforded a sublime contrast to the mournful strains, the solemn chords and the pathetic, almost heart-rending notes which pervaded the second movement.

The sighing sorrow, the impotent despair gradually changing to triumphant hope, and the struggling, quivering feeling with which the movement was pregnant, were beautifully expressed by the orchestra, who displayed their powers to excellent advantage, which were thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C minor................Spohr
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for violin, in G minor............Bruch
A pastoral prelude........................Chadwick
(First time.)
Three Slavonic dances......................Dvorak

MME. NORDICA'S CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance, in Music Hall, Next Thursday Evening.

As a fitting close to Mme. Nordica's tour of the United States, Mr. C. A. Ellis has arranged for an operatic concert at Music Hall next Thursday evening. The occasion will be made very attractive by an array of distinguished soloists and a grand orchestra of 50 musicians, in a programme splendidly arranged to display their talent to especial advantage.

Aside from the charming character of the music and the eminence of the soloists, the occasion will be one of exceeding interest, as it will mark Boston's appreciation of one of the foremost singers this country has produced—one who has secured an artistic standing in Europe, which few of any nationality have attained, and whose recent successes in concert, in oratorio and in grand opera have renewed and extended her fame in America.

The assisting artists are Mme. Scalchi, the great contralto, her first appearance in Boston for two years; Herr Kalish, the distinguished German tenor, and Mr. Dorne, barytone from Covent Garden, London.

The programme is as follows:

Overture, Semiramide........................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, Trumpeter of Sackingen.................Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, Ah! rendimi (Mitrane)..................Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, Una Voce (Barber of Seville..).......Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, Barber of Bagdad.....................Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca Esmeralda...............A. Goring Thomas
Mme Nordica.
Aria, Che faro (Orfeo)........................Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartet, Rigoletto............................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.
Selections from Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Preludio and Siciliana...Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Aria (Santuzza)......................Mme. Nordica
Duet (Santuzza and Turiddu)
Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo..............................Orchestra
Duet (Santuzza and Alfio)
Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Wagner's "Faust Overture;" Chopin's Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Heroic." Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist. In 1840 Wagner had ready a "Faust" overture, which he sketched originally as a movement for a "Faust" symphony. Through the kindness of Schlesinger, the publisher, it was put in the hands of the Directors of the "Société des Concerts." We learn from a number of "La Gazette Musicale" of the same year that after the first and the only rehearsal the players looked at each other, perplexed, if not absolutely stupefied. They were the same players who had given a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that called forth the unqualified praise of Wagner. So the "Faust" overture was not heard in Paris until 1870, in its present form. And now in 1892 the question arises "What did Wagner mean?" For the hyper-moderns claim that the hearer must take into consideration the intentions of the composer as well as his actual performance. Viewed as purely absolute music, without any reference to "intentions," this overture is blatant, amorphous and dull. But let us examine the "intentions" of Wagner. This overture, it seems, should represent in music "the solitary Faust, longing, despairing, cursing. The feminine floats around him as an object of his longing, but not in its divine reality; and it is just this insufficient image of his longing which he destroys in his despair." This was Wagner's original idea, and when he rewrote the overture the idea was preserved without material change. The devout Wagnerite keeps this idea firmly in mind when he listens, and so finds enjoyment in the musical portrayal of "longing, despairing, cursing." But would he find these emotions and expressions of emotions in the music unless he were first prepared by the text? This is the old question, and the answer in each case must be an individual one. One hearer may agree with Mr. Hugo Bussmeyer, who once wrote a pamphlet of 40 pages to prove that the overture is a great work. Another may echo feelingly the remark of Hanslick, that the lines of the motto of the overture, "Existence lies a load upon my breast; Life is a curse and death a longed-for rest," express faithfully the feelings of the unfortunate hearer.

⁂

Mrs. Beach was very warmly applauded for her performance of the Chopin concerto. This performance was distinguished by clearness, elegance and feminine refinement, rather than by breadth and passion. It was sane and free from sentimentalism. Her rubato was not always apparently spontaneous, and at times she robbed without giving back. Nor were the arabesques played with sufficient nonchalance. They were too precise, too exact, too carefully planned. But as a whole her performance was a very creditable one, although, as a pianist, she appears to greater advantage in a smaller hall and without the rivalry of the orchestra.

⁂

Mr. Nikisch showed in his version of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony his most characteristic failing; the desire to produce an effect, even if the effect is directly opposed to the express wish of the composer. He is not alone. There are conductors in Europe and in America who look upon a composer's score as a medium merely of showing their own individuality. Rubinstein speaks of them in "A Conversation on Music," and as follows: "You spoke before of the best interpretation of the master works nowadays—I have my doubts of that—the interpreters of to-day (Director and Virtuoso) delight especially in a capricious interpretation of the classical works (for which Wagner and Liszt are most to blame)—change of tempo, holds, ritardandos, stringendos, crescendos and so on, not written by the composer." Take a very simple illustration. A theme of eight measures is given by the composer to the first violins. It is marked simply piano. A crescendo is indicated at the ninth measure. The simple beauty of the theme sung with pure tone does not satisfy Mr. Nikisch. With the second measure he begins a crescendo, so that when he reaches the ninth, instead of a mezzo-forte, or even a forte, there is very apt to be a fortissimo. Nervous unrest takes the place of serenity. The designed effect of the composer's crescendo is discounted at the very start. Or would any one Saturday evening have supposed from the performance of the "Funeral March" that Beethoven had written at the beginning of it sotto voce and pianissimo? But there is no need of multiplying instances. The new method of treating old works is admired by many. It shows the originality of the director; it makes the works themselves "more interesting."

MME. NORDICA'S CONCERT.

Boston Music Hall on Thursday evening will be the scene of a delightful concert, and one doubly interesting from the opportunity it gives to show that home appreciation for a noble artist is equal to that she has obtained abroad. On this occasion Mme. Nordica will close a tour which has been brilliant, varied and triumphant, whether she appeared in concert, festival or opera. Manager Ellis has arranged a choice programme of operatic selections, and secured for supporting artists such famous singers as Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch and Mr. Dome, and a full orchestra, with Signor Sapio to conduct. Already the sale of seats indicates that there will be a fashionable, representative and overflowing audience.

NOTES.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1892.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert and public rehearsal at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme embraced Schumann's Symphony No. 1, a Bach Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The soloist of the occasion was that excellent pianiste, Fannie Bloomfield Leisler, who played Rubinstein's D-minor Concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET gave a concert in the chamber music room of Carnegie Hall Friday evening week. The finished playing of this club is highly satisfactory and wins the approbation of all hearers. The programme consisted of a Quartet by Carl Dittersdorf, the beautiful Andante from Grieg's G minor Quartet, and Schubert's C major Quintet.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert in Music Hall, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the programme included Wagner's "Faust" overture, the F minor piano concerto by Chopin and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The "Faust" overture has but rarely had so good a performance as that given by Mr. Nikisch on this occasion, and the beauty of the tone pictures was made delightfully clear throughout the composition. The merits of the work of the orchestra in this number of the programme were quickly and enthusiastically appreciated by the audience.

Mrs. Beach was not altogether wise in putting herself before such an audience in so large an auditorium in Chopin's familiar concerto. She is a very gifted player, a musician of excellent parts, and an artist who shows in her limited appearances in concert work a distinct devotion to her chosen field of effort. Her playing is always strictly correct, intelligent and painstaking, but when she enters into the performance of such a work as the Chopin concerto of the evening, her limitations are made very apparent. The emotional characteristics of Chopin's compositions may be too strongly developed in the playing of Paderewsky and De Pachmann, but Mrs. Beach, in last evening's performance failed to give this element in the concerto the desired prominence, and for this reason the lovely adagio was but little appreciated. The brilliant rondo also makes demands upon a player which Mrs. Beach is evidently unequal to at present, yet all her work was characterized by so much earnestness, and was so free from ostentation, that she was heartily commended by the applause of the audience as she ended her playing, and had an additional complimentary recall after she had retired from the stage.

In his reading of the No. 3 Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch merited and recived the highest praise, the beauties of the several movement standing out in bold relief in the performance of the work.

Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include: Spohr's symphony No. 3 in C minor, Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, George W. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

MME. NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

Mme. Lillian Nordica has had a triumphal tour in New England cities the last week, and her immense popularity has been most conclusively shown wherever she has appeared. This artist has such a vast circle of friends and admirers in and about this city that it is not surprising to learn that her farewell concert for the season at Music Hall next Thursday evening is to take on the character of a grand ovation to Mme. Nordica, and a congratulatory gathering in honor of her successes throughout the country during the tour to be ended on that occasion.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has surrounded Mme. Nordica with some eminent artists for the evening, including Mme. Sofia Scalchi, the distinguished contralto; Mr. Paul Kalisch, the famous tenor; Mr. Zoltan Dome, baritone, of Covent Garden, London (his first appearance in Boston), and a complete orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor. The miscellaneous programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Semiramide"...................Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen"............Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi (Mitrane)................Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" (Barber of Seville).....Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad"................Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmeralda"...........A. Göring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Zaro" (Orgee).....................Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Quartet (Rigoletto)..........................Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.

To be followed by selections from Masagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who, owing to a very severe attack of tonsilitis, was unable to sing in New York last Wednesday, is, if she is able, to sing with the Cecilia at its two concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Wagner's inscrutable "Faust" overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenuous but pervertedly imaginative people have, from time to time, plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing felines ignorant of any music but that of nature. We fear that the solution of this ugly musical problem must be delayed until those other problems, perpetual motion and squaring the circle, are solved. Whether this be so or not, the overture is as depressingly dreary, as drearily dry and as dryly disheartening on a twentieth hearing as it was on a first. It was read and played with much dramatic intensity of feeling, but whether it was read rightly or wrongly it is not easy to say; and after all it does not seem to matter much, for it resembles those picture aberrations of the famous Turner, that were so confused that it made no difference whether they were hung upside down, or not. It was followed by Chopin's Concerto in F-minor, the solo part of which was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. We have been so surfeited on Chopin of late by such unapproachable Chopin interpreters as de Pachmann and Paderewski, that it is to be regretted Mrs. Beach did not select a work from some other composer, to say nothing of the exciting of comparisons, which, in the very nature of things, became inevitable. Her performance, however, may be warmly praised for its grace, its neat and delicate technique and its fluent ease. In style it was, perhaps, somewhat finical and wanting in breath and passion; but the effort, as a whole, was abundant in pleasing interest and was fairly entitled to the vigorous applause and the recalls that rewarded the artist. The concert ended with Beethoven's "Eroiaa" Symphony. The reading accorded the work, did not, on the whole, depart widely from the conventional one. There were some liberties, of a sugary sentimental description, taken with the tempi here and there, and one or two new and obtrusively unnecessary rallentandos were made in the funeral march and an occasional neglect of some of the more significant nuances indicated by the composer; but taken altogether the interpretation was spirited and fairly interesting. The playing of the orchestra was admirable throughout. The soloist at the next concert is to be Mr. T. Adamowski. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony by Spohr, not before heard at these concerts.

On Thursday evening Mme. Nordica will make her last appearance in America this season in a grand operatic concert, assisted by Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Paul Kalisch, Mr. Zoltan Döme, and a full orchestra under the direction of Sig. R. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will be heard in "Una Voce," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville;" the quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto;" Goring Thomas's Polacca "Esmeralda;" Santuzza's aria "Cavalleria Rusticana," and in other selections from that opera. Mme. Scalchi will sing Rossi's "Ah rendemi" and Bizet's "Habanera" from "Carmen." Mr. Kalisch will contribute to the concert an air from "The Trumpeter of Sackingen," and another from "The Barber of Bagdad." The second part of the programme includes the prelude and intermezzo from "Cavlaleria Rusticana." As will be seen, the programme is remarkably attractive.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the concert given in Music Hall Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of unusual interest to Boston people, as it was closely connected with a lady who ranks high both as musician and composer. The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as a soloist has been pleasantly anticipated, and no composition better calculated to bring out the ability of a pianist could have been chosen than the second number on the programe. Chopin's concerto in F minor, op. 21, is in three movements, and dates from the year 1829, when Chopin had barely reached manhood. It was composed while he was living in Warsaw, and was first played at a concert at that city March 17, 1830, by Chopin himself.

Mrs. Beach did her task well; her playing was clear, clean and precise, although there was little vibration in the tones, little of the carrying quality that is so necessary in making pianoforte music interesting. Her shading was excellent and her touch very delicate at times, but she lacked, in a measure, the necessary power to make the performance masterly.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of "A Faust Overture" made it almost interesting, although it is lacking in Wagner's peculiar originality. His original plan was to write a Faust symphony, with this as the first movement, but the plan was never carried out. It is incomplete in many ways.

The Beethoven symphony No. 3, styled "Heroic," was finely rendered. It has been included in the repertoire of each season but one since the Boston Symphony concerts were founded. The funeral march received a masterly rendering and the heartiest reception of the whole programme. Next week's concert will present Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist and two novelties in orchestral music—Spohr's symphony No. 3, in C minor, and "A Pastoral Prelude" by Chadwick.

A notable event to musical Boston will be the farewell concert to Mme. Nordica at Music Hall on Thursday evening. Mme. Scalchi, the contralto; Herr Kalisch, the German tenor; Mr. Zoltan Dorm, baritone, and an orchestra led by Signor Sapio will assist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth concert was as follows:

Wagner: "Eine Faust-Ouverture."
Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, Op. 21.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), Op. 55.
Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist.

Wagner's "Erin Faust-Overtüre," written during his unhappy first Paris period as the first movement of a "Faust" symphony, and afterwards entirely re-written in Zürich, holds its own wonderfully well—indeed, it does rather more than this, it seems to ripen and grow finer with age, like sound wine. Time was when a certain lack of control over musical form was painfully apparent in the work, and the second theme seemed all too vague. But, with repeated hearing, has come better understanding. Perhaps, also, we now involuntarily and half consciously compare it in our mind with much of the more recent music that we hear nowadays, and the comparison shows it to us as very strong and coherent indeed. Certainly we can now recognize the second half of the Allegro as one of the finest bits of purely orchestral writing that ever came from Wagner's pen; it has more of the truly symphonic spirit in it than anything else he ever did, saving the corresponding part of the Prelude to the "Meistersinger." The performance last Saturday evening was really superb; the poetic essence and intent of the music were thrown into due relief, while every element that could make for musical coherence and clearness of outline was made the most of.

The first movement of the "Eroica" was grandly played: with clearness, vigor of accent, and just the right Beethovenish intensity of passion. The change of mood, too, from the stormy, tragic character of the main body of the movement to the radiant, Hellenic serenity of the Coda was admirably reflected in the performance. It was like turning from some mighty tragedy of Sophocles in the theatre of Dionysus, and looking out over the sun-steeped glory of the Attic landscape. In the Funeral March we found only one thing whereat to take exception: why, oh! why will Mr. Nikisch, when a passage in the wind instruments is answered by the strings, suddenly take the tempo of the response half as slow again as before? Is it for greater solemnity of impression? If so, we think it fails to gain its end; this outburst of merely human pathos seems weak and trivial in comparison with the superhuman solemnity of what has just gone before. Apart from this, the movement was admirably played; Mr. Santat is especially to be praised for his playing of the first theme. The Scherzo was taken at the brisk tempo in which we used to hear it years ago, and we must own that we have grown to liking it to go a little more moderately. We have nothing to urge against the slight overblowing of the horns in the Trio. It may be a little contrary to the (perhaps rather finicking) modern notions about horn playing, but it is quite in accordance with German tradition, and produces a fresh, breezy effect wholly consonant with the woodland associations of the instrument. A French conductor would be horrified at it; but there is no need of playing German music with a French accent. The Finale was splendidly given.

Mrs. Beach played the Chopin concerto very beautifully indeed, notably the first two movements. In purity and sincerity of feeling, beauty of tone, grace and elegance of phrasing, clearness and coherency, her performance left nothing to be desired. It showed fine fibre and artistic perception throughout. Not that it was great playing, for the music is capable of having a greater quantity of being thrown into it, and there is much in it that can be invested with more resplendent brillency. But it was superlatively good and artistic playing, fully adequate technically, and with the emotional and intellectual elements well balanced. The only point that seems to us fairly open to criticism is that, in the first movement, Mrs. Beach gave evidence of sharing one error with most players of her sex—and with not a few of the others, too, if the whole truth be told—that is, of considering pathos of expression as inseparable from a slow tempo. Reason about the matter as you will, you cannot escape the fact that this first movement is an Allegro, and that no pathetic possibilities that may be discovered in its first, and principal theme can warrant a style of playing this theme—especially in its first announcement—that tends to efface its Allegro character. But, with this exception, we can speak of Mrs. Beach's playing with hearty admiration.

The next programme is; Spohr, symphony No. 3, in C. Minor, op. 78; Bruch, violin concerto No. 1, in G minor; Chadwick, pastoral prelude; Dvorak, three Slavonic dances. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1-21

The Symphony Concert.

Subscriptions for the Symphony concert of Feb. 16th., are constantly being received by the local manager, and the list will close in a few days. It is evident that this will be the fashionable event of the winter, and that a great audience will be in attendance. It is to be hoped that the financial result of this concert will be such that Mr. Ellis will favor the citizens with at least one similar concert every year.

There are few orchestras of equal prominence in the world and no other in America. This is acknowledged by the leading musical critics of New York who have abundant opportunities to compare it with the Metropolitan, the Damrosch and the Thomas orchestras, its three most prominent rivals.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 24, 1892.

NEXT Wednesday the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given in Providence, on which occasion Mr. Mole will be solo flutist, and Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler of Chicago will be the solo pianist. This lady has an extended reputation for brilliant and forceful playing, and is much sought after for orchestral concerts. She played at a recent concert given by this society in Brooklyn, with such effect that "she earned several recalls by her artistic work in Rubenstein's concerto in D minor." The New York and Brooklyn papers all speak of her brilliant playing and the enthusiasm of the audience. She is to play this same work at the coming concert. With every reappearance of the orchestra in New York the critics find occasion to speak of the grandeur, finish and perfection of its performances. It is acknowledged to be superior to any orchestra in this country, and we have the testimony of Paderewski to the effect that it is even superior to the greatest in Europe. The orchestral numbers are "Le Rouet d 'Omphale," a symphonic poem by Saint Saens, and the overture, scherzo and finale by Schumann; besides which there will be the Rubenstein concerto in D minor, and three soli for flute. The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning at 93 Westminster street.

At the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, Paderewski, who was the soloist, gave these words of praise: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few beter instruments in the Conservatoire, but as a whole the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again, and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 26, 1892.

The interest taken in Nordica's last concert in Boston, which occurs Thursday evening at Music Hall, is widespread and general. The occasion will be in the nature of a testimonial by her friends and admirers, who will enjoy besides a rich programme of operatic selections with such artists to interpret it as Mme. Scalchi, Herr Kalisch and Mr. Dorne.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1892.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica will close her tour in this country at the Music Hall, tomorrow night, with a concert in which she will have the aid of Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Mr. P. Kalisch, Mr. Z. Döme, barytone, his first appearance in Boston, and an orchestra, Mr. Sapio, conductor. The programme includes selections from operas by Nessler, Rossi, Goring Thomas, Verdi, Cornelius and Gluck and five of the most important numbers in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Of the seven vocal pieces included in the first part of the programme four will be heard for the first time in a concert room here.

The Morning Times

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No. 22 Central Street, Times Building
LOWELL, MASS.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 27.

To-morrow night at Music hall, Boston, Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi appear in concert. Tickets $1 and $1 50. Lowell people should be there.

Clipping from ....

Date 1-27

This evening the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Infantry Hall. The romantic element enters largely into the programme and two of the tone pictures represent mythological scenes—Goldmark's overture "Prometheus Bound," deriving its subject from the sublime tragedy of "Aeschylus," where the hero is bound down in the cleft of a rock and the Daughters of Ocean are vainly trying to comfort him; Saint Saen's symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale," is from the life of Hercules, whom Omphale succeeds in fascinating and binding in her train. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will repeat here her performance of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor; Mons. Charles Mole will play three solos for flute, and the concert will end with Schumann's cheerful and masterful "Overture Scherzo and Finale." Altogether the concert is of surpassing interest, both to the musician and the general public. Seats can be procured at 93 Westminster street.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1-28

It is not yet too late to subscribe for tickets for the grandest concert of the season,—and secure a first choice of seats by so doing,—by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 16th. ~~The Brooklyn Eagle~~ says the Symphony is "the rival of any force of the kind in the world."

[illegible]
JANUARY [illegible], 1892.

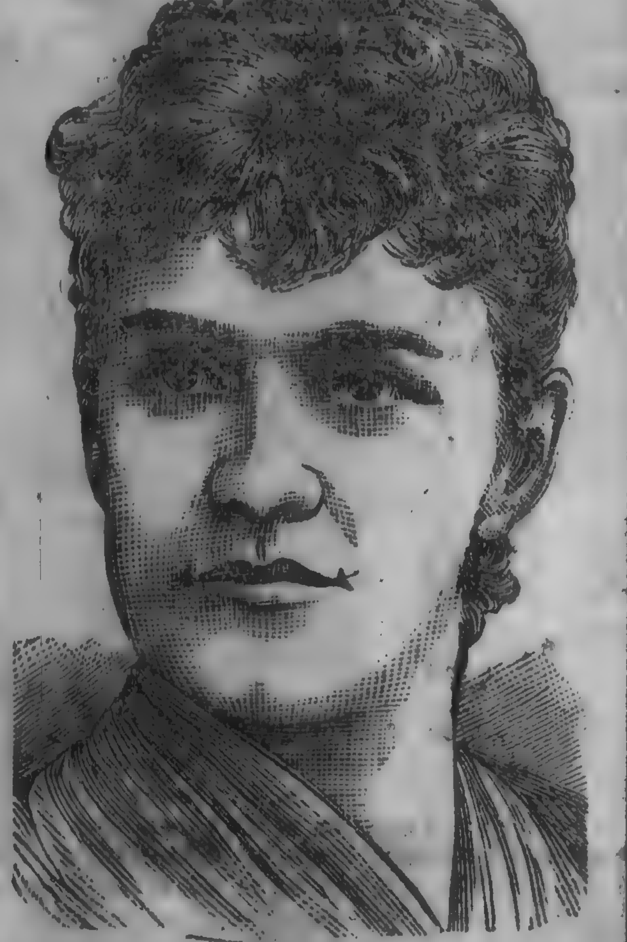
NORDICA.

A Magnificent Concert at the Opera House Last Evening.

Seldom it is, and perhaps never in late years, that New Bedford has been so favored by a truly musical treat as it was last evening in the appearance of Madame Nordica and her support at the Opera House. Perhaps when it is considered that all through her American tour Nordica has been demanding a guarantee fund of a cool thousand, and that such a sum was impossible in the New Bedford Opera House at the prices charged, the full significance of the prima donna's favor may be appreciated. A large audience was present, though the house was by no means crowded. The programme:

Quartet in E flat—Allegro, andante, minuetto, finale, Carl von Dittersdorf
Kneisel Quartet.
Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Swecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello.
Aria—Eri tu, (Masked Ball,) Verdi
Mr. Dome.
Soli for Violoncello.
a. Sarabande, Bach
b. Tarentelle, Cossman
Mr. Schroeder.
Aria—Una Voce, (Barber of Seville,) Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Andante—From Quartet in D major. Tschaikowsky
Kneisel Quartet.
Song—Les Filles de Cadiz, Delibes
Mme. Nordica.
Solo for Violin—Rhapsodie Hongroise, Hauser
Mr. Kneisel.
Song—Star of the Evening, (Tannhaeuser,) Wagner
Mr. Dome.
a. Cavatina, from Quartet, B flat, Beethoven
b. Menuet, Boccherini
Kneisel Quartet.
Polacca—Esmeralda, A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Presto, from Quartet, D major, Haydn
Kneisel Quartet.

To speak individually of the numbers is perhaps unnecessary, the reputation of the artists being well known.



LILIAN NORDICA.

Madame Nordica is by far the finest prima donna that has been here in a long time. Her voice is of great range, and possesses a peculiarly musical quality, not particularly vibrant or ringing, but rolling out in a pure tone of rare sweetness. Her technique, too, is marvelous, the most difficult of trills and runs being magnificently rendered without an apparent effort, as is often the case in singers of less merit who essay such classic selections. The lady showed excellent judgment, too, when in response to rapturous encores she sung such favorites as "Robin Adair" and "Whistle and I'll come to you my lad," the latter being redemanded and encored with "My Valentine." It seemed as though the Lillian Norton of former years held sway in the singer's heart as with touching pathos she sung the first of these—a gracious compliment to her girlhood's home.

The Kneisel Quartet and Franz Kneisel are already familiar to New Bedford people, and played with their usual marvellous skill and sweetness. Mr. Schroeder in the place of Mr. Hekking was heartily received in his solos, and filled his part ably in the quartet.

Mr. Dome has a good voice but of no very great power. At times he noticeably sacrificed his pitch and quality in his endeavors to broaden out, but was nevertheless well received and encored on his second selection. Mr. E. Rose played accompaniments in a manner both artistic and modest, the latter too often a lacking quality in accompanists

---

[illegible] JOURNAL
THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra, Assisted by Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole, gave its fourth concert last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Rubenstein, Piano Concerto in D minor, Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Soli for flute, (a) E. Barnard, "Romance," (b) A. Lavignac, "Serenade," (c) B. Godard, "Valse," Schumann, overture, "Scherzo and Finale, op. 52."

The performance of such a programme as Mr. Nikisch presented, is one of the severest tests by which an orchestra can be tried, and to say that the Boston Symphony rendered it in every way satisfactory, is but the unvarnished truth. The tonal equipment of this orchestra is well nigh faultless, but a certain spirit of indifference pervades it at times, which causes many of the critically inclined to wonder whether or no the power in question is really there. However, this apathy was noticeable only at the beginning of the evening, or, one might say, until Mr. Nikisch had had sufficient time to gain the sympathies of his musicians. The overture by Goldmark is a semi-mournful, wholly passionate creation, and can be rightly termed a tone-picture. From its mysterious introduction, which reminded one of the indescribable seething and surging of the ocean, an effect produced by the soft roll of drums, to its equally wierd ending, one realizes how the Ocean Maidens tried and tried in vain to free the bound Prometheus from his chains, and failing in that, to comfort him with their wonderful singing. These beautiful songs are introduced by oboes representing the different voices. The instruments of the orchestra are splendidly distributed; there is no over-balance of tone in a single part of it, none of that brazen blare of wind instrument and pounding of drums which is so frequently heard, and this first work on the programme was masterly in its interpretation. The Symphonic poem entitled "The Spinning Wheel," by Saint Saens, is a very charming, capricious piece of work, which, while seeming to be a very simple little spinning song, is, withal, very difficult of execution. It is full of puzzling syncopations, and requires the strictest absorption in each individual part, as well as a thorough knowledge of it as a whole. From start to finish there are continual recurring passages which remind one irresistibly of Wagner's "Spinning Song." Mr. Nikisch makes the Finale of this very effective by a prolonged pianissimo on the last note. It was held by all the first violins as by one man. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, a bright work in Symphony form, concluded the programme, and was completely enjoyed. The abilities of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler as pianist, are already well known. Last evening was her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one can only say that it was a great success. Technically Rubenstein's beautiful Concerto in D minor is not so difficult, but it requires an immense amount of strength, and the pianists' powers of endurance were tried to the utmost, and at times her notes were completely drowned by the audience. Her octave playing is exceptionally good; she has an extremely fine and delicate technique, and her interpretation of the Concerto showed a refined, poetical sense of her work. Mrs. Zeisler seemed to throw her soul into the second movement, and it seemed to appeal more powerfully to her sympathies than either the foregoing or the following movements. The last movement is rapid and affords more scope for the exhibition of her technical powers, which are great. Her performance of the Concerto aroused much enthusiasm, and she was recalled repeatedly. Mons. Mole completely captivated the audience by his manipulations of that most mellow-voiced of instruments, the flute. He is a thorough musician, as was proven by his rendering of the three little things by Bernard, Lavignac and Godard, respectively. The "Serenade" particularly was full of little runs and trills which he gave with bird-like clearness. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch. The fifth concert of the series will be given Monday evening, Feb. 29.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Produces a Suite by an American Composer.

In spite of the rain above and the slush below, a well filled house greeted Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra from Boston at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening.

Rarely if ever has the overture to "Der Freischutz" been given with such dramatic intensity. The Adagio (introduction) swelled up from nothingness into a volume of tone which may be regarded as unsurpassable by any body of strings in this country. And when it died down again to a pianissimo tremulo of the violins, with low tones of the clarinets and the syncopated pizzicato of the double basses, the effect was so thrilling that Berlioz would certainly have raved could he but have heard it. It was unfortunate that the intonation and precision of tone in the beautiful horn quartet was not what it should have been, otherwise the performance might have been recorded as the finest ever known. As it was Weber's masterpiece was easily the feature of the evening.

It was gratifying to hear an American orchestral work so worthily rendered as was the Suite in A-minor Op. 42, by E. A. MacDowell. This Suite is a series of sketches which would correspond to the impressionistic paintings of some of our modern artists, a treatment quite appropriate to the titles of most of the movements, which are as follows:

In a Haunted Forest (Largamente misterioso Allegro furioso; Maestoso).
Summer Idyl (Allegretto grazioso).
The Shepherdess Song (Andantino, Semplice).
Forest Spirits (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).

The first and last movements seemed to please the best of all. The mind was allowed to run (or rather fly) rioting through space with bogies and hobgoblins as they whisked through the air on chromatic slides of chords of the diminished seventh. Be it remarked in passing that this chord, so valuable when used in moderation, becomes rather worn by the end of the Tschaikowsky number which followed, containing as it did a great deal of the same kind of passage work.

The Fantasie de Concert for piano and orchestra, by the great Russian, played here for the first time by Mme. Rive-King, opens with a pleasing, well-regulated theme given by the orchestra. A melodious episode for the flute occurs, and at length the piano takes a prominent part. Much of the work is contrapuntal, and there is a long series of passages for piano alone, which, it must be confessed, are very dry, although they were very ably played by the favorite artiste Mme. Rive-King. The second and last number begins with a theme for the pianoforte solo. On its repetition a second part for violoncello solo is added, it being ingeniously developed in strict canon in the octave. Mme. King, who played the Fantasie with great bravoua was recalled and rewarded with floral offerings.

The concert concluded with a finished rendition of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The performance of a certain passage of this familiar work is worthy of special comment. The cadenza leading back to the main theme of the scene "In the Garden" ranges from the upper registers of the violins to the depths of the basses, and so gradual and imperceptible was the transition from one set of instruments to another that it sounded as if done by a single performer.

THE first of series of Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large audience, despite the bad weather. There were several novelties, played for the first time by this orchestra, if not in our city: De Koven's March and Dance of Gnomes; Van der Stucken's Pagina d'Amore; Arthur Bird's Carnival Scene; Littolff's King Lear Overture. Massenet's lovely ballet music, from the Cid, wound up the concert. The soloists were the pianist Aus Der Ohe and the violinist Maud Powell, in Tschaikowsky's first concerto, B-flat-minor, op. 23, and the Rondo Capricioso of Saint Saens. The selections were more than popular and were finely rendered.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH will give a recital at Chickering Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing and Mr. Nikisch will play the piano accompaniments. They will be assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

VENING STANDAR
JANUARY 8, 1892.

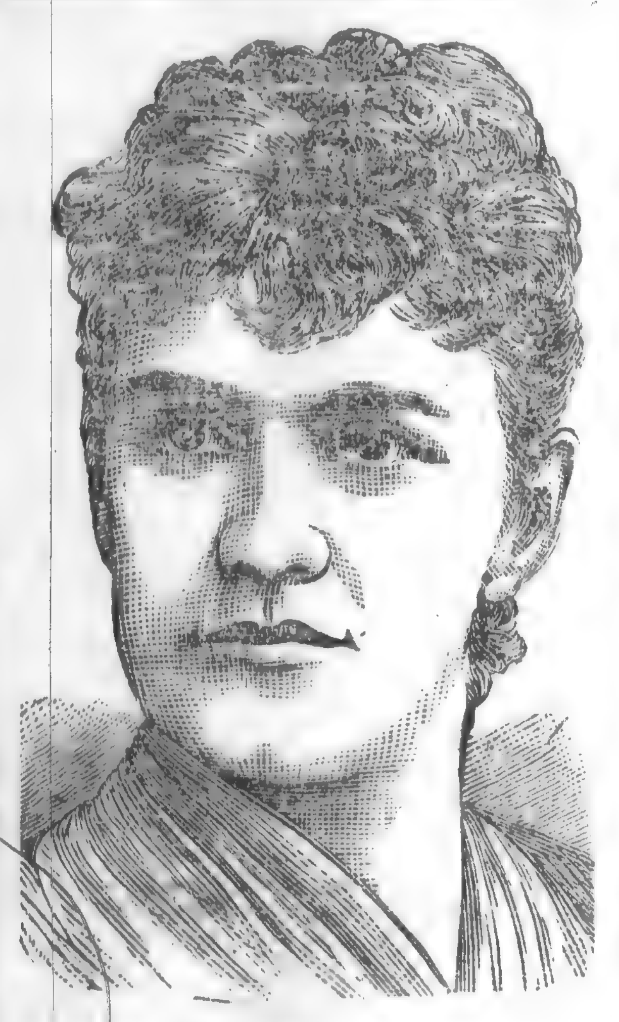
NORDICA.

A Magnificent Concert at the Opera House Last Evening.

Seldom it is, and perhaps never in late years, that New Bedford has been so favored by a truly musical treat as it was last evening in the appearance of Madame Nordica and her support at the Opera House. Perhaps when it is considered that all through her American tour Nordica has been demanding a guarantee fund of a cool thousand, and that such a sum was impossible in the New Bedford Opera House at the prices charged, the full significance of the prima donna's favor may be appreciated. A large audience was present, though the house was by no means crowded. The programme:

Quartet in E flat—Allegro, andante, minuetto, finale, Carl von Dittersdorf
Kneisel Quartet.
Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Swecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, violoncello.
Aria—Eri tu, (Masked Ball,) Verdi
Mr. Dome.
Soli for Violoncello.
a. Sarabande, Bach
b. Tarentelle, Cossman
Mr. Schroeder.
Aria—Una Voce, (Barber of Seville,) Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Andante—From Quartet in D major. Tschaikowsky
Kneisel Quartet.
Song—Les Filles de Cadiz, Delibes
Mme. Nordica.
Solo for Violin—Rhapsodie Hongroise, Hauser
Mr. Kneisel.
Song—Star of the Evening, (Tannhaeuser,) Wagner
Mr. Dome.
a. Cavatina, from Quartet, B flat, Beethoven
b. Menuet, Boccherini
Kneisel Quartet.
Polacca—Esmeralda, A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Presto, from Quartet, D major, Haydn
Kneisel Quartet.

To speak individually of the numbers is perhaps unnecessary, the reputation of the artists being well known.



LILIAN NORDICA.

Madame Nordica is by far the finest prima donna that has been here in a long time. Her voice is of great range, and possesses a peculiarly musical quality, not particularly vibrant or ringing, but rolling out in a pure tone of rare sweetness. Her technique, too, is marvellous, the most difficult of trills and runs being magnificently rendered without an apparent effort, as is often the case in singers of less merit who essay such classic selections. The lady showed excellent judgment, too, when in response to rapturous encores she sung such favorites as "Robin Adair" and "Whistle and I'll come to you my lad," the latter being redemanded and encored with "My Valentine." It seemed as though the Lillian Norton of former years held sway in the singer's heart as with touching pathos she sung the first of these—a gracious compliment to her girlhood's home.

The Kneisel Quartet and Franz Kneisel are already familiar to New Bedford people, and played with their usual marvellous skill and sweetness. Mr. Schroeder in the place of Mr. Hekking was heartily received in his solos, and filled his part ably in the quartet.

Mr. Dome has a good voice but of no very great power. At times he noticeably sacrificed his pitch and quality in his endeavors to broaden out, but was nevertheless well received and encored on his second selection. Mr. E. Rose played accompaniments in a manner both artistic and modest, the latter too often a lacking quality in accompanists

---

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra, Assisted by Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole, gave its fourth concert last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Rubenstein, Piano Concerto in D minor, Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Soli for flute, (a) E. Barnard, "Romance," (b) A. Lavignac, "Serenade," (c) B. Godard, "Valse;" Schumann, overture, "Scherzo and Finale, op. 52."

The performance of such a programme as Mr. Nikisch presented, is one of the severest tests by which an orchestra can be tried, and to say that the Boston Symphony rendered it in every way satisfactory, is but the unvarnished truth. The tonal equipment of this orchestra is well nigh faultless, but a certain spirit of indifference pervades it at times, which causes many of the critically inclined to wonder whether or no the power in question is really there. However, this apathy was noticeable only at the beginning of the evening, or, one might say, until Mr. Nikisch had had sufficient time to gain the sympathies of his musicians. The overture by Goldmark is a semi-mournful, wholly passionate creation, and can be rightly termed a tone-picture. From its mysterious introduction, which reminded one of the indescribable seething and surging of the ocean, an effect produced by the soft roll of drums, to its equally wierd ending, one realizes how the Ocean Maidens tried and tried in vain to free the bound Prometheus from his chains, and failing in that, to comfort him with their wonderful singing. These beautiful songs are introduced by oboes representing the different voices. The instruments of the orchestra are splendidly distributed; there is no over-balance of tone in a single part of it, none of that brazen blare of wind instrument and pounding of drums which is so frequently heard, and this first work on the programme was masterly in its interpretation. The Symphonic poem entitled "The Spinning Wheel," by Saint Saens, is a very charming, capricious piece of work, which, while seeming to be a very simple little spinning song, is, withal, very difficult of execution. It is full of puzzling syncopations, and requires the strictest absorption in each individual part, as well as a thorough knowledge of it as a whole. From start to finish there are continual recurring passages which remind one irresistibly of Wagner's "Spinning Song." Mr. Nikisch makes the Finale of this very effective by a prolonged pianissimo on the last note. It was held by all the first violins as by one man. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, a bright work in Symphony form, concluded the programme, and was completely enjoyed. The abilities of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler as pianist, are already well known. Last evening was her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one can only say that it was a great success. Technically Rubenstein's beautiful Concerto in D minor is not so difficult, but it requires an immense amount of strength, and the pianists' powers of endurance were tried to the utmost, and at times her notes were completely drowned by the audience. Her octave playing is exceptionally good; she has an extremely fine and delicate technique, and her interpretation of the Concerto showed a refined, poetical sense of her work. Mrs. Zeisler seemed to throw her soul into the second movement, and it seemed to appeal more powerfully to her sympathies than either the foregoing or the following movements. The last movement is rapid and affords more scope for the exhibition of her technical powers, which are great. Her performance of the Concerto aroused much enthusiasm, and she was recalled repeatedly. Mons. Mole completely captivated the audience by his manipulations of that most mellow-voiced of instruments, the flute. He is a thorough musician, as was proven by his rendering of the three little things by Bernard, Lavignac and Godard, respectively. The "Serenade" particularly was full of little runs and trills which he gave with bird-like clearness. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch. The fifth concert of the series will be given Monday evening, Feb. 29.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Produces a Suite by an American Composer.

In spite of the rain above and the slush below, a well filled house greeted Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra from Boston at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening.

Rarely if ever has the overture to "Der Freischutz" been given with such dramatic intensity. The Adagio (introduction) swelled up from nothingness into a volume of tone which may be regarded as unsurpassable by any body of strings in this country. And when it died down again to a pianissimo tremulo of the violins, with low tones of the clarinets and the syncopated pizzicato of the double basses, the effect was so thrilling that Berlioz would certainly have raved could he but have heard it. It was unfortunate that the intonation and precision of tone in the beautiful horn quartet was not what it should have been, otherwise the performance might have been recorded as the finest ever known. As it was Weber's masterpiece was easily the feature of the evening.

It was gratifying to hear an American orchestral work so worthily rendered as was the Suite in A-minor Op. 42, by E. A. MacDowell. This Suite is a series of sketches which would correspond to the impressionistic paintings of some of our modern artists, a treatment quite appropriate to the titles of most of the movements, which are as follows:

In a Haunted Forest (Largamente misterioso Allegro furioso; Maestoso).
Summer Idyl (Allegretto grazioso).
The Shepherdess Song (Andantino, Semplice).
Forest Spirits (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).

The first and last movements seemed to please the best of all. The mind was allowed to run (or rather fly) rioting through space with bogies and hobgoblins as they whisked through the air on chromatic slides of chords of the diminished seventh. Be it remarked in passing that this chord, so valuable when used in moderation, becomes rather worn by the end of the Tschaikowsky number which followed, containing as it did a great deal of the same kind of passage work.

The Fantasie de Concert for piano and orchestra, by the great Russian, played here for the first time by Mme. Rive-King, opens with a pleasing, well-regulated theme given by the orchestra. A melodious episode for the flute occurs, and at length the piano takes a prominent part. Much of the work is contrapuntal, and there is a long series of passages for piano alone, which, it must be confessed, are very dry, although they were very ably played by the favorite artiste Mme. Rive-King. The second and last number begins with a theme for the pianoforte solo. On its repetition a second part for violoncello solo is added, it being ingeniously developed in strict canon in the octave. Mme. King, who played the Fantasie with great bravoua was recalled and rewarded with floral offerings.

The concert concluded with a finished rendition of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The performance of a certain passage of this familiar work is worthy of special comment. The cadenza leading back to the main theme of the scene "In the Garden" ranges from the upper registers of the violins to the depths of the basses, and so gradual and imperceptible was the transition from one set of instruments to another that it sounded as if done by a single performer.

THE first of series of Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a large audience, despite the bad weather. There were several novelties, played for the first time by this orchestra, if not in our city: De Koven's March and Dance of Gnomes; Van der Stucken's Pagina d'Amore; Arthur Bird's Carnival Scene; Littolff's King Lear Overture. Massenet's lovely ballet music, from the Cid, wound up the concert. The soloists were the pianist Aus Der Ohe and the violinist Maud Powell, in Tschaikowsky's first concerto, B-flat-minor, op. 23, and the Rondo Capricioso of Saint Saens. The selections were more than popular and were finely rendered.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH will give a recital at Chickering Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, Jan. 20. Mrs. Nikisch will sing and Mr. Nikisch will play the piano accompaniments. They will be assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann, the Russian youth whom Mr. Brodsky brought hither, and whose education the older virtuoso is now completing.

LEWISTON EVENING JOURNAL, FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1892.

The Nordica Concert at Music Hall on Thursday Evening.

An Array of Talent Never Before Equaled in Lewiston—The Brilliant Scene Throughout the House — Nordica's Trinmph at Home.

The climax of the concert at Music Hall, Thursday evening by Madame Nordica and her attendant artists was when the gracious singer herself sat down at the piano and, playing her own accompaniment sang "Home, Sweet Home." The song was to an audience comprising many of her old friends and townspeople. If in its singing there was no note of true feeling, no touch of sympathy, not a sense of the joy of once again seeing old faces, then this was wonderfully simulated and the great lyric artist is a greater artist than ever was before. The light of her eyes, the welcome of her beautiful face, even the pauses of the song were eloquent. It is an old and hackneyed song—we all know it—yet it seems like a handshake across the years, a sense of mutual recognition, and many will remember it longer than anything else because they will be pleased to believe that there was in it more than art—a confidential heart-throb from the Maine woman towards a Maine audience.

The Nordica concert at Music Hall Thursday evening will, in many ways besides and including this, go down in local history as an unusual musical event. The audience was large and noteworthy. Central Maine was largely represented and special trains brought many to the city. For the first time at a musical entertainment every seat was occupied and hundreds stood. The boxes were gay with the concert parties—the Evergreen S. S. club occupying a box on the right of the stage and lending light and color to the audience by their pretty toilets. The body of the house was made up of a very cultured and interested audience. The orchestra pit was filled with chairs and some of the musical critics had seats in the very center of the musical influence. Up stairs and down the house was a solid front of light and color. Never before at any performance were there so many people in Music Hall and this fact lends a special interest to this concert which should make it noteworthy.

A particular fact, also, and one to be commended was the promptness of the audience. The curtain was given at 8.05 P. M., and at this hour everyone was seated and there were no subsequent interruptions.

The stage was handsomely set, with draperies, pictures and decorations. At 8.10 Fraulein Aus der Ohe made her peculiar little courtesy to the audience and took her seat at the Steinway grand to strike the first note of this concert. From then until ten o'clock the evening was of uninterrupted intellectual and musical delight—the more appreciated with us if we need to beg pardon of the world, because the more rare.

The program was:

Ballade—Chopin,	Miss Aus Der Ohe
Ballad—"Es hat nicht sollen sein,"	Mr. Dome
Caprice de Concert—Vieuxtemps,	Mr. Franz Wilczek
Aria—Faust—Gounod,	Sig. Campanini
Polacca—Esmeralda—A. Goring Thomas,	Mme. Nordica
Waltz Caprice—Taussig,	Miss Aus Der Ohe
Song—Varrei morie—Tosti,	Sig. Campanini
Gipsey Dances—Sarasate,	Mr. Franz Wilczek
Song of the Toreador—from "Carmen"	Mr. Dome
Aria—"Una voce pocca fa"—from "The Barber of Seville,"	Mme. Nordica
Rhapsodie Hongroise—Liszt,	Miss Aus Der Ohe
Duet—Aida—Verdi	Mme. Nordica and Sig. Campanini

Miss Aus der Ohe was simply and tastefully dressed, and the chief surprise to many was in the marked maturity of her face, and in the general sense of strength and power that the past three years seem to have given her. She seems to have developed from the spirituelle almost frail maiden whom we so long have associated with the fostering care of the great meister, Liszt, into a self-poised, reliant woman, with a face of such strong intellectual fibre that it seems like a revelation. Miss Aus der Ohe's first number was the ballade in G minor by Chopin. It was characterized by the utmost refinement of interpretation. If this is not an all-inclusive term it may be added that it was an extreme satisfaction to hear Chopin played, as in this instance, as Chopin meant rather than full of alien ideas. In some important respects the ballade was the best work of the pianist for the evening. In our judgment she shows her finest intellectual powers in Chopin. There is nothing florid, nothing done merely for effect from the time Aus der Ohe appears on the stage to the time of her exit. She is loyal simply to her Art, and evidently feels that her loyalty to her audience is not supreme. Of course Aus der Ohe lacks the masculine strength of Paderewski; but, then, Aus der Ohe is a pianist merely, while Paderewski is a full orchestra. Her music is so wholly pure and spiritual that she is the Marguerite of the [illegible]. When playing she listens [illegible] every note. Executing with rare care, she yet plays with a freedom and abandon which are a rare combination of intellectual and spiritual force. Her enjoyment in her work is reflected not only in her musical results but also in her face. We regard Aus der Ohe as the best living pianist for all music. Some pianists may and some undoubtedly do excel in one or another master, but she is like Nordica in song, she can play the whole repertoire. We trust that some day our musical public may be able to hear her in Beethoven in one of her public recitals; for she is in warm sympathy with and a close student of this great master.

Aus der Ohe's second piece was a Waltz Caprice by Taussig. It was beautifully executed, but it supplied nothing beyond an opportunity for beautiful execution and delicacy of touch. It is very airy and delicate, with much tone-color. Her encore, however, was all that could be desired. We never remember to have heard before such a charming performance of Liszt's Transcription of the Spinning Song from the Flying Dutchman. This was simply peerless. Liszt sounds like a different composer when interpreted by his favorite pupil than when pounded out by the ordinary school-girl or school-boy pianist. This number, it is not perhaps too much to say, reflected the personality of Liszt communicated from master to pupil and we never expect to hear any of that author's work played by anybody else so wonderfully. It was the gem of the evening, something long to be remembered by all Liszt-lovers.

Who can make anything out of a Liszt rhapsody? Aus der Ohe may and does; but woe betide the commonalty when undertaking this enterprise. She played it almost perfectly—it would be hard to say where it was imperfect. Her final encore was Moskowski's Serenata—familiar to all but new in her interpretation. It was played with quicker tempo than we like to hear it. The middle part was altogether different from any interpretation that we have ever heard, but rather effective, reflecting the individuality of the artiste. Aus der Ohe won in personal favor by her modest grace and self-reliance and the last touch of the "Spinnerlied" left her with many a wondering admirer in the audience before her.

The barytone is a new importation fresh from Covent Garden theatre, London. His first and second numbers were both changed from the house-program. In place of the "Trumpeter of Sakkingen" he sang a German ballad "Es hat nicht sollen sein," and in place of the "Evening Song," from Tannhauser, he sang the well-known Song of the Toreador, from Carmen. His manner is admirable and his stage presence gracious and self-contained. His voice, although pleasing, does not possess the force and power requisite for the greatest work. His encores were decidedly the most generous of his gifts to the audience. He is a Hungarian by birth and his Hungarian song to his own accompaniment had the fire and bravo of the song of a people. Its reception was instantaneons and he sang again—a tuneful little ballad which we did not know. We should call Mr. Dome a very pleasing singer but we doubt if America in his subsequent introduction entirely surrenders to him.

The young violinist, Mr. Wilczek, seems like one of the Joachim brood. His work shows that he is fresh from his master and that he has been a close and painstaking student of the violin in Joachim's hands. He has a good deal of the refinement which sets Joachim apart from all violinists. The neatness of his bowing, the ease of his execution and the purity of his tone and sentiment are marked characteristics of this young violinist. He seems to us to be a little too Dutchy—that is, he is super-refined, losing in the process force and fire which seem to us to be as necessary for highest achievements on the violin as on any instrument under the sun. Mr. Wilczek's first number was his best, because it was best adapted to his refined style. His first encore was to his credit, and throughout the entire number the results were happy. The Gipsey dances lacked Sarasate because they overflowed with Joachim. It was here that Mr. Wilczek's lack of spirit and fire was lamentably noticeable. He failed to enter into the abandon of Sarasate's Gipseys. But his final encore, Chopin's Nocturne in E flat, covered a multitude of shortcomings. The cleanness of his phrasing and the purity and sentiment displayed in the entire Nocturne, were indeed a bit of the real Chopin. Mr. Wilczek was a favorite with the audience and many times recalled. Wilczek has the gift of expression.

Campanini sang better last evening than we have heard him for some time. He was in good voice, in good nature and evidently enjoyed himself—and that goes a vast ways. He was re-demanded at every appearance and graciously met the requisitions with songs that evidently caught the audience. His first encore was Hatton's "Goodbye Sweetheart Goodbye." You have heard Brignoli sing it, no doubt, and yet not better than Campanini sang it last evening. The masculine fullness of Campanini's upper register is undiminished. His voice has tears in it for the sympathetic and his rendition of the Ave Maria on a second recall was a leaf out of the past—a memory refreshed.

The evening had passed almost into nine o'clock when Nordica was led to the front of the stage by Campanini and left standing to bow her acknowledgments to the rounds of applause. She seemed as she is, a most beautiful woman. Her costume was of rich, brocaded satin of a tint approaching white, the high Elizabethan ruff setting off her beautiful neck and shoulders to perfection. Her jewels were profuse upon the neck, the bodice, and in the hair. Nordica's voice has changed since last we heard her, but not for the worse; for while it has lost none of the girlish freshness, it has gained in all the points of culture and skill which are essential in the prima donna. She is at the head of the ranks and has earned her position by merit and hard work. Her stage presence is as charming as Annie Louise Cary's, and her voice possesses range, quality and power which are heard in not more than one singer in a generation. The first solo was more pleasing to us than the last. The responses brought the house down in a hurricane. Nordica is an actress and the audience could see how charming she must be in an opera. She seated herself at the piano and played her own accompaniments. Her first song was rich in action but the second encore was the event of the evening. The audience broke out into wild applause as they caught the tones of Home Sweet Home. It is enough to say the song was never sung more effectively in all the world. We have heard Patti in this familiar ballad; but Patti lost her laurels last night. It was a matchless work of song and the effect on the audience was profound.

The closing duet was very fine. Aida is one of Nordica's favorite roles and we could not help wishing from the bit we had in the duet that we might have had the whole. Campanini's work in this number was very fine.

The only feature of the concert that was not pleasing was that of the accompanist, who for some reason was not himself.

The Aida duet brought to a close the finest musical treat ever given in Lewiston; for each participant was an artist. The audience was ready in appreciation and all Maine was represented. Nordica must come again. We trust this event is a forecast that our cities will ever be ready, to warmly appreciate what is best in musical art.

A Chat With Aus der Ohe.

Aus der Ohe in speaking with a journal reporter remarked, "I am very fond of America and Americans. They have been very kind to me. I think it is surprising that so young a nation receive good music so appreciatively. I am about leaving on a five weeks' tour West and South, shall play a series of concerts in Chicago and also in St. Louis, Omaha and other points, with private recitals in the prominent cities.

"What music do I regard most highly? That depends on my mood. Sometimes I want to play Beethoven; sometimes, Schumann; sometimes, Chopin, and so on; but I regard Beethoven most highly.

"O yes! I like Paderewski's art in some work—he is no more perfect than the best—he isn't a second Liszt—and I doubt if there is another Liszt in our day.

"Liszt, you know, was my teacher—he is my ideal. He didn't teach for money; he was extremely exacting except that he never exacted nor accepted money for his services. He had a few pupils only, and he did his best to make them great?"

"Have you done any composing."

"Yes—but not in my own name. I write only when I travel and I shall soon publish under my own name. I think there is great pleasure in public playing, if one pleases the public; but there is more satisfaction in musical composition because that is creative work.

"I am with my sister in my travels. Our headquarters are in New York. We go home to Germany every summer, on a vacation. We have now been five years in this country, and we have been very happy."

Aus der Ohe was in Lewiston three years ago. She is 25 years of age, speaks English gracefully and fluently, and has very charming and unassuming manners. She spoke with especial appreciation of Lewiston's "beautiful Opera house."

Musical Notes.

Madame Nordica received many Maine callers, acquaintances and others, before leaving Lewiston. A little three-year-old namesake from Brunswick, Lillian Norton Stone, with her mother, was among her callers. She gave the child her photograph and autograph and invited mother and child to a seat on the platform at the concert.

A Buckfield man drove twenty miles; paid $12 for four seats; put up at the hotel and drove back twenty miles after the concert. Mme. Lillian Norton, there's devotion for you!

NORDICA'S OLD HOME.

A Glimpse at the Romantic Spot on the Sandy.

The most picturesque and romantic spot along the Sandy river is the little hamlet called Backus Corner, which is situated about two miles north of Farmington village on the Sandy River Railroad. Leaving Farmington, one passes by Hotel Willows, around the foot of Powder House hill, and on up across the railroad and he is at Backus Corner.

Half a mile up the road from the corner where the old grocery store used to stand is the birthplace of the famous Maine prima donna, Lillian Norton. The house now looks as it used to when little Lillian toddled in and out of the door a happy and innocent child. The house is on prominent ground and has a fine view of the river which curves in and out among the tall elms and the bushes on the wide intervale a mile to the southeast.

In the east is Powder House Hill and and other hills around Farmington village. Up to the north and northeast rises a great ridge of mountains whose blue massiveness does not overshadow all the intervening scenery but serves to make it more glorious and inspiring. Mt. Blue, New Vineyard Mountain, Saddle Back and others all range along in one grand cavalcade of peaks.

Such scenery as this the great singer was accustomed to view in the first few years of her successful life. From the little white cottage with its air of neatness the fields gently slope away in almost all directions. Here in the pretty front yard the infant Nordica used to sit and play with her dolls or pick daisies and buttercups to crown her mother who watched her playing with her sisters among the trees.

Here, perhaps she wandered off by herself and fell asleep and dreamed that the wreath of white weed she had made and wore, now was a beautiful crown given to her by the great world that she had heard people talking about, and which she thought must lie somewhere behind those big blue mountains over there. Did she hear the robin sing and understand what he said to her? Perhaps she has longed to hear those wild birds sing often while fighting the upward road to success.

Down at the corner and up the road toward Fairbanks, is the little red or brown schoolhouse where Lillian Norton sometimes went to school with her older sisters and commenced her education. This little old schoolhouse has been the stepping stone where many a man and woman commenced the mental culture that has placed them in responsible positions in the west and east, and all over the world, for that matter.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1892.

The Nordica Concert.

The days of miscellaneous concerts are not yet past in Boston, nor is Italian opera even moribund among us, if the immense audience of last night may be taken as a criterion. It was a better programme and better executed than the one in which Patti appeared recently, although the orchestra vied with the one of the previous occasion in eccentric tempi and opposition to the singers, but this was undoubtedly the fault of a lack of rehearsal, for Sig. Sapio conducted intelligently and in the purely orchestral numbers, barring a few "couacs" on the clarinet, all went very well. Mr. Zoltan Döme began the vocal work with that cloying sugarplum by the Nessler "Behut dich Gott," which is quite as poor as Abt's setting of the words, and which, I am glad to say, received no encore; the singer appeared to much better advantage in the Wagnerian "Evening Star," for, although his voice was light, it was very sympathetic, and as the subsequent encore the singer gave a Hungarian folk-song in its original tongue, and was at his very best, playing the difficult accompaniment himself.

Scalchi was as excellent as ever. Her voice shows not the slightest touch of the ravages of time, and is, if anything, superior to what it was formerly, for the registers seem better united, and somewhat more even, while the glorious breadth is as effective as of yore. Her best work was in the aria from Rossi's "Mitrane," in a charming Italian canzonetta by Sig. Sapio and in the gavotte from "Mignon," which she sings better than any vocalist of the present. Less delightful was "Che Faro senza Eurydice," which was given with explosive ferocity, rather than with befitting pathos.

Mr. Kalisch has but one style of singing and when a song fits in his vein he is excellent. He was therefore entirely commedable in the fiery and robust music of Turiddu from Mascagni's opera and also in the broad aria from Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," which deserves special mention as noble music, and has an accompaniment which ought to have eclipsed all that Mascagni had to offer, but which evidently was not recognized by the audience for they obliterated a splendid postlude by ill-timed applause. At a miscellaneous concert, if anywhere, it is "Vox, et praeterea nihil!"

The quartette from "Rigoletto" justly aroused immense enthusiasm, for it was well sung, and is such excellent music in itself that it is almost a sufficient apology for all Verdi's misdeeds in his earlier school. Karl Reinecke once said to me that not a composer in all Germany could produce a similar quartette, let them deride Verdi as they pleased. To combine two voices singing of despair and two indulging in most frivolous and amatory measures, in such a manner, certainly required the hand of a master. La Nordica was in superb voice and mood throughout the concert. Her first number displayed her vocal flexibility, her brilliancy of execution and excellent phrasing, to great advantage. From Rossi the programme went to Rossini, from the Barber of Bagdad and to his tonsorial brother of Seville, and in "Una Voce" the first great success was attained. This was subsequently heightened in a brilliant polacca by that Anglo-Frenchman—Goring-Thomas—which was not as attractive music as the polonaise from "Mignon" (which is of the same school) would have been. As an encore Mme. Nordica gave a simple, old English song,—"When Love is Blind"—accompanying herself. A protracted struggle with the artist's gloves took place after she had seated herself at the piano. The audience took as evident a pleasure in watching this "fight to a finish with gloves" as in the ensuing music.

The vocal numbers from "Cavalleria Rusticana" have never been so well rendered in Boston, and Mme. Nordica sang gloriously in both the solo and the passionate duet, working up the climaxes with a power that was phenomenal when the dainty lightness of her preceding work, the beauty of her trill and the grace of her staccato passages is considered.

The chief faults of the concert were the aberrations in the tempo of the orchestra, but one cannot refrain from commending the good musical taste displayed in the selections of the programme, the contrasted schools illustrated (not all Italian either) and the general freedom of the list from trashy vocal gymnastics.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1892.

The Symphony Orchestra will be away from Boston next week, and the next concert in the Music Hall series will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. Particulars will be duly announced. Eugen d'Albert will play at the rehearsal and concert March 11 and 12.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JAN. 29, 1892.

Plaudits and Flowers for Mme. Lillian Nordica.

The audience which crowded Music Hall last night was amply rewarded for their eagerness to be there by hearing not only the great Nordica herself, but also such splendid talent as Mme. Scalchi and Messrs. Kalisch and Dome.

Mr. Ellis displayed excellent taste in his presentation of a programme specifically calculated to elucidate the best qualities of the singers, as much as to comprehend everything that was direct and most popular of such composers as Rossini, Gluck, Verdi and Thomas, let alone the selections from that magic "Cavalleria Rusticana," which is taking the world by storm.

Mr. Dome opened the concert with Nessler's "Trumpeter of Sackingen," and his voice, rich and flexible, if not powerful in compass, produced a very agreeable impression on the audience.

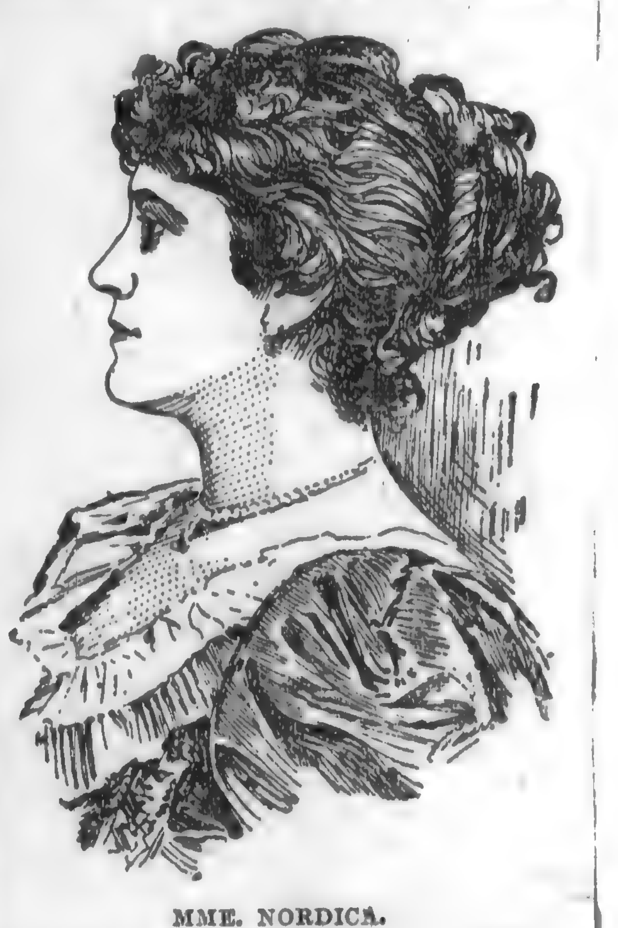
He was followed by Mme. Scalchi, who sang the aria from Rossi's "Mitrane" with pleasing eclat.

Her beautiful and expressive contralto, capable of lovely modulation, excited the warmest applause, which did not abate until she consented to an encore.

Mme. Scalchi's singing only excited the expectations of the audience to a higher pitch, and when Mme. Nordica appeared on the stage a shower of applause greeted her with an enthusiastic welcome.

She sang "Una Voce," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," with great effect.

Her voice was clear and sweet and wonderfully flexible, while her method of rendering her most expressive accents of the song presented that indescribable charm which has beguiled audiences all over the world, and which has made her such a universal favorite.



MME. NORDICA.

If the rigor of criticism must detect in her occasionally the absolute abandoning of notes, the appreciation of taste must applaud her best effort, which was rounded, finished and beautifully expressive.

Mme. Nordica compares to advantage even with Mme. Patti in her manner of singing. She is perfectly at ease and appears to be entirely unconscious of any strain or effort.

Her voice pours out naturally, like a smooth ringing liquid, capable of rising to the grandeur of impassioned expression, as she did when singing the part of Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana"—as well as dropping the gentlest and softest of silvery notes.

Her graceful pose, her attitude, as if attuned to the subject which she is rendering, adds not a little to the impression with which the ensemble of her singing is enhanced, while her natural manner with her audience, as if she understood them and they understood her, helps to elucidate her qualities as an actress, not at all the least of qualifications in an operatic singer.

When the tempest of applause which succeeded Mme. Nordica's singing subsided and the audience was convinced that they could not make her respond to another encore, Mr. Kalisch apppeared and sang Cornlius' "Barber of Bavdad."

Mr. Kalisch was a little stiff at first, but improved rapidly, and at the end had regained entire self-possession, which made him sing with better effect and better expression.

It is a pity that Mr. Kalisch's excellent and finished qualities as a tenor should be so impaired by the stiff manner which reminds one more of the German officer than the operatic singer, and when, later, he sang in "Cavalleria Rusticana" without appearing in full view on the stage he was more thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mme. Scalchi fairly rivaled Mme. Nordica in the applause, the demands for encores and the flowers which rewarded her singing.

In response to persistent plaudits she sang the entracte from "Mignon," and the first part of the attractive programme was concluded with Nordica, Scalchi, Kalisch and Dome singing in quartet Verdi's "Rigoletto."

Selections from "Cavalleria Rusticana," in which Mme. Nordica appeared to the greatest advantage, and in which her voice found range for the greatest expression, wound up one of the most brilliant and enjoyable of musical events that have taken place in Boston this season.

The audience was extremely appreciative, warm and enthusiastic to a degree, and if the orchestra was a little harsh at times Sig. Sapio, the leader, displayed originality and vivacity in his conceptions and interpretations of most of the accompaniments.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1892.

TWO SINGERS.

Nordica and Scalchi in Operatic Concert.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica gave a "grand operatic concert" in Music Hall last evening. She was assisted by Mrs. Sofia Scalchi and Messrs. Paul Kalisch and Zoltan Doeme. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Romnaldo Sapio, was made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The hall was crowded.

The programme was divided into two parts. The first opened in the traditional manner of the Italian operatic concert with the overture to "Semiramide," and it closed with the quartette from "Rigoletto." The second part was devoted to selections from "Cavalleria Rusticana"—the Prelude, Santuzza's aria, the duets between Santuzza and Turiddu and between Santuzza and Alfio, and, as a matter of course, the Intermezzo.

Mrs. Nordica sang in the first part two bravura arias, "Una Voce" and the polacca from Goring Thomas's "Esmerelda." Her bravura was not always free from reproach. Her runs were often labored and occasionally sluggish, and once or twice her intonation was of doubtful purity. But she was most loudly applauded. After the polacca she seated herself before the pianoforte and sang to her own accompaniment an insipid song. Mrs. Nordica does herself great injustice by choosing bravura airs as concert numbers. When, nearly ten years ago, she made her debut at the Paris Opera House she was warmly praised by the critics of that day for her "tender and passionate accents and her natural dramatic intelligence seconded by solid study." Last evening her singing of the part of Santuzza confirmed here in Boston, even at this late day, the verdict of Paris. She is a dramatic soprano. Santuzza is her woman, not Rosina. She sang Mascagni's music as though she were Sicilian born, with blood at fever heat. She sang it with breadth, with unexaggerated pathos, with passionate intensity. And the hearer forgot that Santuzza was in concert dress and bespangled with diamonds; that Turiddu had donned his swallow-tail; that Alfio was ornamented by a white cravat. The scene was Sicily; the singers were creatures of flesh and blood.

Mrs. Scalchi was heard in the great air from Rossi's "Mitrane" and in Gluck's "Che Faro." She used her voice with great care, and in the former air she changed certain measures and thus avoided as a rule tones lying in the celebrated break. In fact, in each of the airs she took many liberties, but she is heartily to be praised for not running the close of the "Che Faro" for the sake of displaying a low and impertinent tone—a trick that is only too frequently indulged in by singers of renown. She was most enthusiastically applauded, and she sang two additional numbers; one of them was the gavotte from "Mignon."

Mr. Doeme, a fine-looking baritone, sang an air from Nessler's "Trumpeter" and the "Evening Star" from "Tannhaeuser." In the first he wandered from the true pitch, and his tones seemed pinched and dry. In the second he made a more favorable impression, and in response to the applause he, too, took his place at the piano and sang an outlandish song, the refrain of which was "Hi," varied at times by "Hi, hi."

Mr. Kalisch has not improved during his absence from the country, in spite of the eulogistic notices of certain German papers. Naturally endowed with a stentorian voice, he forced it last evening until he fairly shouted, in the air from "The Barber" of Cornelius. In the quartette from "Rigoletto" he made a sad mess of the Duke's part, and he brought additional proof to German testimony from Frederick the Great to Richard Wagner that it is almost impossible for a German to sing a sustained melody. But in the duet with Mrs. Nordica he was less objectionable.

Mr. Sapio led the orchestra with skill and intelligence. It was a pleasure to hear the accompaniments in "Cavalleria Rusticana" played at last by a full orchestra. In the Rossini overture the clarinet and the horns did not distinguish themselves, and in the solos of the first part the accompaniment was at times slack and ragged in spite of Mr. Sapio's endeavors.

Singularly enough the selections from Mascagni's opera—even the Intermezzo—were coolly received by the audience. And yet one would have thought that the remarkable singing of Mrs. Nordica and Mascagni's music itself would have roused the hearers to wild enthusiasm.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 29.

FRIDAY, JAN. 29, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mme. Nordica's Farewell for the Present Season.

Mme. Lillian Nordica brought her American tour for the present season to an end last evening by a grand farewell concert, arranged by Manager Charles A. Ellis with a view to affording the many personal friends of this gifted artist a final opportunity of hearing her before she resumes her career abroad.

The size and character of the audience best proved the admiration of the Boston musical public for Mme. Nordica, and the enthusiastic fashion in which she was greeted and applauded for each of her contributions to the programme was a high tribute to the chief singer of the evening. Mme. Nordica was assisted on this occasion by Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Mr. Paul Kalisch, tenor; Mr. Zoltan Dome, baritone, of Covent Garden, London, and a large orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor.

The selections given in the miscellaneous programme making the first half of the evening's attractions, were as follows:

Overture, "Semiramide" .... Rossini
Orchestra.
Air, "Trumpeter of Sackingen" .... Nessler
Mr. Dome.
Aria, "Ah! rendimi" ("Mitrane") .... Rossi
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Una Voce" ("Barber of Seville") ... Rossini
Mme. Nordica.
Air, "Barber of Bagdad" .... Cornelius
Mr. Kalisch.
Polacca, "Esmeralda" .... A. Goring Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria, "Che Garo" ("Orgee") .... Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Mr. Z. Dome.
Quartet ("Rigoletto") .... Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Dome.

It is easy to understand the great success of Mme. Nordica during the season after witnessing her triumphs last evening, and the applause called out by her efforts was well calculated to give gratification to the artist. Her singing of the familiar "Una Voce" served to exhibit all her brilliant technical abilities at their best, and her vocal gifts were the source of unmixed pleasure to her admirers. The polacca from "Esmeralda" also proved an excellent selection for Mme. Nordica, and in her singing of this number she aroused the audience to a point of admiration that found expression in a grand ovation to the artist as she concluded the selection. The applause was only quieted by the addition of the old ballad, "When Love Is Kind," to which Mme. Nordica played her own accompaniment.

Mme. Scalchi's absence from the concerts of last season has evidently not effaced the memory of her many Boston successes, and her local popularity was demonstrated unmistakably by the reception she had upon her entrance. She sang the arias by Rossi and Gluck with all her old-time success, her noble voice fitting these numbers in the most admirable manner, and the artistic vocal work of the singer in both selections delighted all who heard her.

Mr. Kalisch exhibited fine taste in his delivery of the air from "The Barber of Bagdad," and Mr. Dome proved a most enjoyable baritone singer, becoming an instant favorite with the audience. His splendid singing of the aria from "Tannhauser" created a marked impression, and he responded to the ovation following it by singing, to his own accompaniment, a Hungarian song, with the dash and fire of his native land.

The programme was ended with a performance of selections from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," in concert form, these including the "Preludio" and "Siciliana," orchestra and Mr. Kalisch; the aria for Santuzza, Mme. Nordica; the duet for Santuzza and Turiddu, Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch; the "Intermezzo," orchestra, and the duet for Santuzza and Alfio, Mme. Nordica and Mr. Dome.

Custom has sanctioned the performance of these selections in concert form; but this custom cannot make amends for the loss to some of them caused by such a performance. Mascagni's opera is not a great musical creation like the "Fidelio" of Beethoven, and without the stage action his work is shorn of a very important element in its success. The prelude "Siciliana" and "Intermezzo" however, being independent of these stage associations, make very effective numbers for the concert room, and the singing of Mr. Kalisch and the work of the orchestra were fully appreciated in these parts of the programme.

Mme. Nordica sung the Santuzza music with splendid effect, despite the limitations of the concert stage, and she had admirable support in the singing of Messrs. Kalisch and Dome, and the playing of the orchestra under Sig. Sapio, who contributed largely to the enjoyment of the evening by his intelligent direction.

The social aspect of the evening was somewhat out of the usual. Mme. Nordica's friends and acquaintances appeared to have taken possession of the hall, and complimentary words were spoken of the singer's personality and the elegance of her stage presence on every side. She received many elaborate floral tributes.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1892.

FAREWELL TO BOSTON.

Nordica Sang Her Last Sweet Strains at Music Hall Last Night.

An audience that equalled that which gathered to pay tribute to Patti assembled in Music Hall, last evening, to welcome Mme. Nordica and her excellent support at this, her farewell to America for a year at least.

It is seldom that one has an opportunity to hear four such artists as Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Paul Kalisch and Zoltan Dome at one concert. Mme. Nordica, the centre of interest to true Bostonians, never sang as well throughout a programme. Her voice was clear, bright and strong and full of expression.

The aria "Una Voce," from Rossini's Barber of Seville, was beautifully rendered, and "Esmeralda" called for an encore. As "Santuzza" in Cavalleria Rusticana, her voice was taxed to its utmost capacity, and readily responded. The amount of dramatic feeling she infuses into her work was one of the most enjoyable things of her performance.

Mme. Scalchi's voice is unlike any other contralto in quality and flexibility. Her execution is wonderful, but her rendering of the Gluck aria, "Che fars," was not good; her phrasing was faulty. In quartette singing she excels, for she executes with precision and is true to pitch.

Mr. Paul Kalisch was beyond ordinary praise. The air from "Barber of Bagdad" was the finest solo on the programme. His voice has gained in power and sweetness, and his phrasing is artistic. The serenade and duet from "Cavalleria" were well done.

Mr. Zoltan Dome possesses a voice rich in quality and well trained. His first solo, "Trumpeter of Sackingen," was nearly spoiled by the tempo of the orchestra, but his second, the aria from "Tannhaeuser," redeemed his first effort from the suspicion of a fault.

The quartette, "Rigoletto," by Verdi, so seldom attempted on account of the difficulties with which it teems, was the finest selection, musically, in the whole concert. The voices blended well, but then, again, much of the effect was spoiled by the orchestra, which was composed of Boston Symphony members, but whose work was only ordinary. Signor Sapio, the conductor, did not have perfect control of them, and the constant effort to keep up to time was painfully apparent throughout the entire concert,

---

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1892.

Nordica's Farewell Concert.

Last night the Music Hall was filled, every seat and every foot of standing room, with an interested and enthusiastic audience, gathered to listen to the entertainment arranged by Mrs. Lillian Nordica as her farewell concert of her present American tour. This was the programme:

Overture to "Semiramide" .... Rossini
Air, Behut dich Gott, from "The Trumpeter of Säckingen" .... Nessler Zoltan Döme.
Air, Ah! rendimi, from "Mitrane" .... Rossi
Mrs. Sofia Scalchi.
Air, Una Voce, from "The Barber of Seville," .. Rossini
Mrs. Lillian Nordica.
Air, from "The Barber of Bagdad" .... Cornelius
Paul Kalisch.
Polacca, from "Esmerelda" .... Goring Thomas
Mrs. Nordica.
Air, Che faro, from "Orfeo" .... Gluck
Mrs. Scalchi.
Air, To the Evening Star, from "Tannhäuser". Wagner
Mr. Döme.
Quartet, Bella Figlia, from "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch, Mr. Döme.
Selections from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ...... Mascagni
Prelude and Sicilienne.. Orchestra and Mr. Kalisch
Air, Santuzza .... Mrs. Nordica
Duet, Santuzza and Turiddu,
Mrs. Nordica and Mr. Kalisch
Intermezzo .... Orchestra
Duet, Santuzza and Alfio,
Mrs. Nordica and Mr. Döme

The entertainment was further varied and lengthened by extra contributions sung in answer to recalls, as follows: By Mrs. Scalchi, an Italian song, unidentified and the gavotte faom "Mignon,'; by Mrs. Nordica, following the polacca, a song, "When Love is Blind," playing her own accompaniment; by Mr. Döme, following his second air, an Hungarian popular song with the original words, also playing the accompaniment. The record of the occasion is completed by noting the presence of a good orchestra, directed with excellent judgment by Romualdo Sapio.

Comments on the occasion must of necessity be brief, but they must also, in perfect sincerity, be mostly complimentary. Mrs. Nordica showed by her passionate singing in the selections from Mascagni's opera that she is better fitted for strong, emotional work than for bravura execution, though she sang her other selections with notable brilliancy and fluency. Of Mrs. Scalchi's singing it is only necessary to say that it had all its familiar charm of richness, when the tones fell in the lower part of her voice, and all the usual blemish of uneven quality. Mr. Kalisch sang gloriously. Never before have the bits from "Cavalleria Rusticana" been sung here with such intensity, such fire. Magnificent, too, were the warmth of his singing in Verdi's matchless quartet, and the breadth of his manner in the air by Cornelius. Mr. Döme was found to be a singer with a good voice and a smooth style; but the voice lacked power, and the style had its moments of dryness. He sang with great intelligence, however, and with an evident purpose to show the composer's thought rather than his own gifts.

The entire affair was by all odds the best of the miscellaneous concerts that have been offered here this season. There was a good variety in operatic styles and composers, there was very little that was hackneyed, and there was much that was new or unfamiliar. A concert of this order, now and then, provided the good points of the one under notice are developed, is by no means an unwelcome intruder among our severer delights of oratorio, symphony and string quartet.

ate 1-28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra, Assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole, gave its fourth concert last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Rubenstein, Piano Concerto in D minor, Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Soli for flute, (a) H. Barnard, "Romance," (b) A. Lavignac, "Serenade," (c) B. Godard, "Valse;" Schumann, overture, "Scherzo and Finale, op. 52."

The performance of such a programme as Mr. Nikisch presented, is one of the severest tests by which an orchestra can be tried, and to say that the Boston Symphony rendered it in every way satisfactory, is but the unvarnished truth. The tonal equipment of this orchestra is well nigh faultless, but a certain spirit of indifference pervades it at times, which causes many of the critically inclined to wonder whether or no the power in question is really there. However, this apathy was noticeable only at the beginning of the evening, or, one might say, until Mr. Nikisch had had sufficient time to gain the sympathies of his musicians. The overture by Goldmark is a semi-mournful, wholly passionate creation, and can be rightly termed a tone-picture. From its mysterious introduction, which reminded one of the indescribable seething and surging of the ocean, an effect produced by the soft roll of drums, to its equally wierd ending, one realizes how the Ocean Maidens tried and tried in vain to free the bound Prometheus from his chains, and failing in that, to comfort him with their wonderful singing. These beautiful songs are introduced by oboes representing the different voices. The instruments of the orchestra are splendidly distributed; there is no over-balance of tone in a single part of it, none of that brazen blare of wind instrument and pounding of drums which is so frequently heard, and this first work on the programme was masterly in its interpretation. The Symphonic poem entitled "The Spinning Wheel," by Saint Saens, is a very charming, capricious piece of work, which, while seeming to be a very simple little spinning song, is, withal, very difficult of execution. It is full of puzzling syncopations, and requires the strictest absorption in each individual part, as well as a thorough knowledge of it as a whole. From start to finish there are continual recurring passages which remind one irresistibly of Wagner's "Spinning Song." Mr. Nikisch makes the Finale of this very effective by a prolonged pianissimo on the last note. It was held by all the first violins as by one man. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, a bright work in Symphony form, concluded the programme, and was completely enjoyed. The abilities of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler as pianist, are already well known. Last evening was her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one can only say that it was a great success. Technically Rubenstein's beautiful Concerto in D minor is not so difficult, but it requires an immense amount of strength, and the pianists' powers of endurance were tried to the utmost, and at times her notes were completely drowned by the audience. Her octave playing is exceptionally good: she has an extremely fine and delicate technique, and her interpretation of the Concerto showed a refined, poetical sense of her work. Mrs. Zeisler seemed to throw her soul into the second movement, and it seemed to appeal more powerfully to her sympathies than either the foregoing or the following movements. The last movement is rapid and affords more scope for the exhibition of her technical powers, which are great. Her performance of the Concerto aroused much enthusiasm, and she was recalled repeatedly. Mons. Mole completely captivated the audience by his manipulations of that most mellow-voiced of instruments, the flute. He is a thorough musician, as was proven by his rendering of the three little things by Bernard, Lavignac and Godard, respectively. The "Serenade" particularly was full of little runs and trills which he gave with bird-like clearness. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch. The fifth concert of the series will be given Monday evening, Feb. 29.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.

Date 1-27

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's program tonight at Infantry hall contains more music of general interest than any yet heard. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler is to play the Rubinstein concerto in which she won universal commendation recently at the Brooklyn philharmonic. Mons. Charles Mole plays three solos for the flute, and the orchestral members are Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound," and Saint-Saen's symphony poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and Schuman's overture, Scherzo and Finale op. 52.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1892.

Eugen d'Albert will return to America in March to give twenty orchestral concerts and twenty concerts of pianoforte music under the management of Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Music Hall. His wife, Teresa Carreño, will not come with him, her London engagements preventing. Mr. d'Albert will play with the Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall, March 11 and 12.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1/27

[illegible] for the concert of the [illegible] Orchestra in the [illegible] will close with O. E. [illegible] at the Second National Bank [illegible]

[113]

The Morning Times

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No. 32 Central Street, Times Building
LOWELL, MASS,

Single copies two cents; 12 cents per week, or 50 cents per month, delivered anywhere within the city limits. Sent to any address in the United States o Canada at the same price.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 30.

When Critics Disagree.

Wonderful and past finding out are the ways of critics and fortunate is the man who is not numbered among them. A little knowledge may be a dangerous thing, but a great deal of knowledge is an excessively uncomfortable thing, as critics prove in every word they write. The unfortunate creatures enjoy nothing, their business in life is a very different matter from pleasure and it never allows them a vacation. It is their duty to look at all pictures with a view to bad composition and harsh tones, to read all books with reference to faulty constructions and defective style, to hear all music intent upon wrong tempo and poor phrasing. Naturally they themselves are unhappy, the only wonder is that there should still be people who are affected by them. Much as critics delight to criticize anything and everything that comes in their way, there is nothing that rouses in them a pleasure comparable to criticizing another critic. There are no two who agree or who are not ready to turn their knives at each other. And yet the world goes on believing them and trusting their judgment and hiring them to give public expression to their opinions.

For instance, last Thursday night there was in Boston a concert, a great concert, with Mme. Nordica and Mme. Schalchi, and Herr Kalisch and a comparatively new baritone named Dome. Music hall was crowded, seats and aisles, with an audience that disproved the popular theory of the "coldness" of a Boston audience. The applause was hearty and repeated, a few irrepressible Italians and Germans shouted their encores, flowers were sent up at every number, and the singers were given a warm and hearty ovation. It was a concert to be remembered and enjoyed for years by nearly every one in the large hall.

But in this vast and enthusiastic audience were a few professional critics, and the next morning the leading papers contained such contradictory statements as these: "Mr. Kalisch has not improved during his absence from the country. Naturally endowed with a stentorian voice, he forced it until he fairly shouted in the air from 'The Barber.'" "Mr. Paul Kalisch was beyond ordinary praise. The air from 'Barber of Bagdad' was the finest solo in the programme. His voice has gained in power and sweetness."

Mr. Dorne's first solo "was nearly spoiled by the tempo of the orchestra, but his second redeemed his first effort from the suspicion of a fault." In Mr. Dome's first solo "he wandered from the true pitch and his tones seemed pinched and dry. In the second he made a more favorable impression."

Mme. Nordica's "singing of the familiar 'Una Voce' served to exhibit all her brilliant technical abilities at their best." In "Una Voce," Mme. Nordica's "runs were often labored and occasionally sluggish, and once or twice her intonation was of doubtful purity. She does herself great injustice by choosing bravura airs as concert numbers."

Again we protest, happy is the man who is not numbered among the critics. He has no reputation to uphold, he has no rival critic to oppose. He can enjoy as much as he is able without any guilty feeling that it is his duty to find fault with something. The true enjoyment of music belongs to those who are capable of musical appreciation and at the same time are devoid of a too carking knowledge of technique. The r[illegible] pleasure of that concert came to those who were unconscious that the clarinet got out of time in the overture and that Mme. Schalchi changed three notes in "Ah, rendimi," to those who listened "with soul not ear" and lost the singer in the song.

[illegible]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1892.

Mme. Nordica's Concert.

The Music Hall was crowded last night to listen to an operatic concert, with Nordica, Scalchi, Kalish, and a new-comer, Zoltan Dörne, a baritone, as soloist, in a varied programme ending with selections from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." An orchestra of the Boston Symphony members assisted, and Mr. Romnaldo Sapio was director. In part first of the programme Nordica sang "Una Voce," from the "Barber of Seville," and a polacca, "Esmeralda," by Goring Thomas.

These bravura airs were trying tests to her ability as a coloratura singer, and her success was not of the best. Mrs. Nordica has always been handicapped with a faulty early training, a fact that is evident in all the cantabile and bravura singing she does. This was more particularly so in the earlier part of her career; more recently there has been some improvement in this direction. It is to be regretted that she was not started upon a correct method of voice production, for she has many noble qualities and is possessed of musical enthusiasm, if not of passion. When Nordica can bring strong impulses to bear, and thus, unwittingly, locates her voice well forward, she rises at once to a superior height, vocally.

This was the case in the Mascagni selections last evening, where dramatic power and intense passion gave a breadth to the music of Santuzza that was thrilling, and yet the audience that loudly applauded her not unreproachful efforts earlier in the evening received quite coolly this magnificent, passionate rendering upon her part. Madame Scalchi sang Rossi's "Ah rendimi" and Gluch's "Che Faro." The coarseness and violence that have formerly marked Scalchi's efforts were not so apparent last evening. The inversion of intervals and a general care in her singing showed that her voice is not in the vigorous state it was formerly. Scalchi has been a fearful example for contraltos to imitate.

Mr. Kalisch forced his voice and exaggerated the expression in most everything that he sang, being particularly out of place in the "Rigoletto" Quartet, which demands the digrazia of the Italian school, something Kalisch does not possess. Mr. Dörne has not a great voice, and his tones are dry and not always tuneful. He however earned an encore in the Aria from "Tannhauser." The orchestral accompaniments were not always what they should have been from such a fine body of players, and the orchestra at times was violently loud in the Mascagni selections. But this was the fault of the conductor. Nine out of ten conductors, when they see a forte mark, more particularly a fortissimo, throw all discretion to the winds and let the vocal score take care of itself until the hurricane in the orchestra is over. If the large audience that crowded Music Hall last night came in compliment to Nordica then she should be extremely happy for many reasons.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30. 1892

The Saturday Evening Paper.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Madam Nordica's concert at Music Hall on Thursday evening was attended by an audience that was large, friendly and brilliant. The program included Rossini's overture to "Semiramide," Nessler's "Trumpeter of Sackingen," Rossi's "Ah! rendimi," "Esmerelda" a Polacca, by Goring Thomas, air from the "Barber of Bagdad" Cornelius, Gluck's "Che Faro" from Orfeo, "Thou Star of Evening," from Wagner's "Tannhauser," quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto," and selections, vocal and instrumental, from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mme. Nordica was tendered an enthusiastic reception and many flowers, but her singing of the "Una Voce" was white and colorless, and the Polacca was very little better. It was not until the "Cavalleria" that Mme. Nordica sang without reserve and proved herself the artist she undoubtedly is. Her voice has grown in volume and brilliancy, and she has acquired skill in its delivery. From her singing of the "Cavalleria" music it is easy to understand the reputation she has acquired as an interpreter of dramatic roles. With possibly one exception we do not remember to have heard Santuzza's music sung in so satisfactory and interesting a manner.

Mme. Scalchi was also warmly welcomed. She sang "Ah! rendimi" and "Che Faro"; albeit her voice was not in its best condition; she pleased the audience who gave her two very spontaneous recalls, to which she graciously responded.

Mr. Kalisch would give more pleasure with his fine voice if he would forego such loud singing.

Mr. Döme, a newcomer, after the first nervousness of appearing before a strange audience was overcome, proved himself a delightful singer, with a full melodious baritone voice, which he handles well. The orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Sapio, seemed to find some difficulty in keeping with the singers, but on the whole was satisfactory.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.

Date 1-28

MUSIC BY THE SYMPHONY.

Boston's Crack Orchestra Pleases an Infantry Hall Gathering.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth Providence concert at Infantry hall last night to an audience numerically less than has listened to its playing at some of the previous entertainments. The program was unique in its inclusion of Goldmark, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens and Schumann, together with three less famous composers.

Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," was rendered with scarcely a flaw. The power of the orchestra to evolve the richest quality of full, round sound in its interpretation of the brilliant score Goldmark used to delineate the occurrences of which the story of Prometheus and Zeno is made up, was charmingly evinced, and the gathering manifested its delight by hearty applause.

"The Spinning Wheel of Omphale," by Saint-Saens, was to the larger part of the audience the most pleasing number. The opportunity it gave the strings for soft, bewitching expression was adequately embraced.

Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, a composition containing many passages of light, delicate velocity of a popular form, was performed almost perfectly.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the piano soloist. Her selection was Rubinstein's minor concerto, a hard work with profuse technical complications, and one that offers a competent pianist plenty of chances for artistic playing. While Mrs. Zeisler's peculiarities of manner at the piano were criticised unfavorably by many, it is doubtful if her performance as a whole was not enjoyed in a considerable measure by nearly every person. She betrayed defects, and her awkward bodily movements and exaggerated arm and wrist gyrations seemed only to make them the more noticeable, instead of detracting from their prominence. She was recalled.

Mons. Charles Mole, the Boston flute player, gave a romance, serenade and a waltz with true artist skill.

The fifth concert will take place Monday, Feb. 29.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 30, 1892.

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

Music Hall was crowded on Thursday evening, when Mme. Nordica took her leave for the present of this country. The programme began with a vocal miscellany, after which the chief numbers of "Cavalleria Rusticana" were sung. This arrangement enforced what the eminent soprano's singing has demonstrated heretofore—that her true sphere is in dramatic and emotional music, not in that which levity and bravura characterize. She gets through such an air as "Une voce poco fa," but she does not move easily or always securely, and one is more disposed to compliment her at last because she has not failed than because she has succeeded. Mme. Scalchi's weird voice and intense manner were heard with confessed rapture, and Mr. Kalisch's tremendous vociferation also won applause. The new barytone, Mr. Zoltan Döme, showed a pretty voice and fair method—nothing more. Mr. Sapio conducted unexceptionally, and as Manager Ellis had supplied a large band of Symphony men, the orchestral accompaniments were thoroughly good.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/30

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following skilfully varied and deeply interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 79. (Rhenish.)
Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).
a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor.
b. Brahams—Hungarian Dances.
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Dvorak—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played. She is a daughter of the Morgan who was so long organist of Trinity Church, New York, and who became known as the best Bach player and scholar in the country. Miss Morgan is quite young, and is a very attractive looking girl. The sale of seats will open on Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1/29

Nordica appeared as Selika in the performance of "L'Africaine" Monday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The Herald said, "Nordica's voice was of beautiful quality, her singing was in admirable taste and her performance as a whole in keeeping with the superlatively good work done by Jean and Edouard de Reszke and by Mr. Lassalle, such a trio as can be found in no other opera house in the world." Nordica had a great farewell reception in Boston, last eveni ate 1-28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra, Assisted by Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler and Mons. Charles Mole.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch, conductor, assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, and Mons. Charles Mole, gave its fourth concert last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Rubenstein, Piano Concerto in D minor, Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Soli for flute, (a) H. Barnard, "Romance," (b) A. Lavignac, "Serenade," (c) B. Godard, "Valse;" Schumann, overture, "Scherzo and Finale, op. 52."

The performance of such a programme as Mr. Nikisch presented, is one of the severest tests by which an orchestra can be tried, and to say that the Boston Symphony rendered it in every way satisfactory, is but the unvarnished truth. The tonal equipment of this orchestra is well nigh faultless, but a certain spirit of indifference pervades it at times, which causes many of the critically inclined to wonder whether or no the power in question is really there. However, this apathy was noticeable only at the beginning of the evening, or, one might say, until Mr. Nikisch had had sufficient time to gain the sympathies of his musicians. The overture by Goldmark is a semi-mournful, wholly passionate creation, and can be rightly termed a tone-picture. From its mysterious introduction, which eminded one of the indescribable seething and surging of the ocean, an effect roduced by the soft roll of drums, to its qually wierd ending, one realizes how he Ocean Maidens tried and tried in vain o free the bound Prometheus from his hains, and failing in that, to comort him with their wonderful singing. These beautiful songs are introduced by boes representing the different voices. The instruments of the orchestra are splendidly distributed; there is no over-balance f tone in a single part of it, none of that razen blare of wind instrument and ounding of drums which is so frequently eard, and this first work on the proramme was masterly in its interpretaion. The Symphonic poem entitled "The Spinning Wheel," by Saint Saens, is a very harming, capricious piece of work, which while seeming to be a very simple little pinning song, is, withal, very difficult of execution. It is full of puzzling syncopations, and requires the strictest absorpion in each individual part, as well as a horough knowledge of it as a whole. From tart to finish there are continual recurring passages which remind one irresistibly of Wagner's "Spinning Song." Mr. Nikisch makes the Finale of this very effective by a prolonged pianissimo on the last note. It was held by all the first violins as by one man. Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, a bright work in Symphony form, concluded the programme, and was completely enjoyed. The abilities of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler as pianist, are already well known. Last evening was her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one can only say that it was a great success. Technically Rubenstein's beautiful Concerto in D minor is not so difficult, but it requires an immense amount of strength, and the pianists' powers of endurance were tried to the utmost, and at times her notes were completely drowned by the audience. Her octave playing is exceptionally good; she has an extremely fine and delicate technique, and her interpretation of the Concerto showed a refined, poetical sense of her work. Mrs. Zeisler seemed to throw her soul into the second movement, and it seemed to appeal more powerfully to her sympathies than either the foregoing or the following movements. The last movement is rapid and affords more scope for the exhibition of her technical powers, which are great. Her performance of the Concerto aroused much enthusiasm, and she was recalled repeatedly. Mons. Mole completely captivated the audience by his manipulations of that most mellow-voiced of instruments, the flute. He is a thorough musician, as was proven by his rendering of the three little things by Bernard, Lavignac and Godard, respectively. The "Serenade" particularly was full of little runs and trills which he gave with bird-like clearness. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch. The fifth concert of the series will be given Monday evening, Feb. 29.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.

Date 2/1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's program tonight at Infantry hall contains more music of general interest than any yet heard. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler is to play the Rubinstein concerto in which she won universal commendation recently at the Brooklyn philharmonic. Mons. Charles Mole plays three solos for the flute, and the orchestral members are Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound," and Saint-Saen's symphony poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and Schuman's overture, Scherzo and Finale op. 52.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1892.

Eugen d'Albert will return to America in March to give twenty orchestral concerts and twenty concerts of pianoforte music under the management of Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Music Hall. His wife, Teresa Carreño, will not come with him, her London engagements preventing. Mr. d'Albert will play with the Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall, March 11 and 12.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 1/27

Subscriptions for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy Feb. 16th will close with O. E. Borden at the Second National Bank Saturday.

The Morning Times

PUBLISHED BY

CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,

No. 32 Central Street, Times Building

LOWELL, MASS.

Single copies two cents; 12 cents per week, or 50 cents per month, delivered anywhere within the city limits. Sent to any address n the United States o Canada at the same price.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 30.

When Critics Disagree.

Wonderful and past finding out are the ways of critics and fortunate is the man who is not numbered among them. A little knowledge may be a dangerous thing, but a great deal of knowledge is an excessively uncomfortable thing, as critics prove in every word they write. The unfortunate creatures enjoy nothing, their business in life is a very different matter from pleasure and it never allows them a vacation. It is their duty to look at all pictures with a view to bad composition and harsh tones, to read all books with reference to faulty constructions and defective style, to hear all music intent upon wrong tempo and poor phrasing. Naturally they themselves are unhappy, the only wonder is that there should still be people who are affected by them. Much as critics delight to criticize anything and everything that comes in their way, there is nothing that rouses in them a pleasure comparable to criticizing another critic. There are no two who agree or who are not ready to turn their knives at each other. And yet the world goes on believing them and trusting their judgment and hiring them to give public expression to their opinions.

For instance, last Thursday night there was in Boston a concert, a great concert, with Mme. Nordica and Mme. Schalchi, and Herr Kalisch and a comparatively new baritone named Dome. Music hall was crowded, seats and aisles, with an audience that disproved the popular theory of the "coldness" of a Boston audience. The applause was hearty and repeated, a few irrepressible Italians and Germans shouted their encores, flowers were sent up at every number, and the singers were given a warm and hearty ovation. It was a concert to be remembered and enjoyed for years by nearly every one in the large hall.

But in this vast and enthusiastic audience were a few professional critics, and the next morning the leading papers contained such contradictory statements as these: "Mr. Kalisch has not improved during his absence from the country. Naturally endowed with a stentorian voice, he forced it until he fairly shouted in the air from 'The Barber.'" "Mr. Paul Kalisch was beyond ordinary praise. The air from 'Barber of Bagdad' was the finest solo in the programme. His voice has gained in power and sweetness."

Mr. Dorne's first solo "was nearly spoiled by the tempo of the orchestra, but his second redeemed his first effort from the suspicion of a fault." In Mr. Dome's first solo "he wandered from the true pitch and his tones seemed pinched and dry. In the second he made a more favorable impression."

Mme. Nordica's "singing of the familiar 'Una Voce' served to exhibit all her brilliant technical abilities at their best." In "Una Voce," Mme. Nordica's "runs were often labored and occasionally sluggish, and once or twice her intonation was of doubtful purity. She does herself great injustice by choosing bravura airs as concert numbers."

Again we protest, happy is the man who is not numbered among the critics. He has no reputation to uphold, he has no rival critic to oppose. He can enjoy as much as he is able without any guilty feeling that it is his duty to find fault with something. The true enjoyment of music belongs to those who are capable of musical appreciation and at the same time are devoid of a too carking knowledge of technique. The r[illegible] pleasure of that concert came to those who were unconscious that the clarinet got out of time in the overture and that Mme. Schalchi changed three note in "Ah, rendimi," to those who listened "with soul not ear" and lost the singer in the song.

Boston Daily Traveller

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1892.

Mme. Nordica's Concert.

The Music Hall was crowded last night to listen to an operatic concert, with Nordica, Scalchi, Kalish, and a new-comer, Zoltan Dörne, a baritone, as soloist, in a varied programme ending with selections from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." An orchestra of the Boston Symphony members assisted, and Mr. Romualdo Sapio was director. In part first of the programme Nordica sang "Una Voce," from the "Barber of Seville," and a polacca, "Esmeralda," by Goring Thomas.

These bravura airs were trying tests to her ability as a coloratura singer, and her success was not of the best. Mrs. Nordica has always been handicapped with a faulty early training, a fact that is evident in all the cantabile and bravura singing she does. This was more particularly so in the earlier part of her career; more recently there has been some improvement in this direction. It is to be regretted that she was not started upon a correct method of voice production, for she has many noble qualities and is possessed of musical enthusiasm, if not of passion. When Nordica can bring strong impulses to bear, and thus, unwittingly, locates her voice well forward, she rises at once to a superior height, vocally.

This was the case in the Mascagni selections last evening, where dramatic power and intense passion gave a breadth to the music of Santuzza that was thrilling, and yet the audience that loudly applauded her not unreproachful efforts earlier in the evening, received quite coolly this magnificent, passionate rendering upon her part. Madame Scalchi sang Rossi's "Ah rendimi" and Gluch's "Che Faro." The coarseness and violence that have formerly marked Scalchi's efforts were not so apparent last evening. The inversion of intervals and a general care in her singing showed that her voice is not in the vigorous state it was formerly. Scalchi has been a fearful example for contraltos to imitate.

Mr. Kalisch forced his voice and exaggerated the expression in most everything that he sang, being particularly out of place in the "Rigoletto" Quartet, which demands the digrazia of the Italian school, something Kalisch does not possess. Mr. Dörne has not a great voice, and his tones are dry and not always tuneful. He however earned an encore in the Aria from "Tannhauser." The orchestral accompaniments were not always what they should have been from such a fine body of players, and the orchestra at times was violently loud in the Mascagni selections. But this was the fault of the conductor. Nine out of ten conductors, when they see a forte mark, more particularly a fortissimo, throw all discretion to the winds and let the vocal score take care of itself until the hurricane in the orchestra is over. If the large audience that crowded Music Hall last night came in compliment to Nordica then she should be extremely happy for many reasons.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1892

The Saturday Evening Paper.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Madam Nordica's concert at Music Hall on Thursday evening was attended by an audience that was large, friendly and brilliant. The program included Rossini's overture to "Semiramide," Nessler's "Trumpeter of Sackingen," Rossi's "Ah! rendimi," "Esmerelda" a Polacca, by Goring Thomas, air from the "Barber of Bagdad" Cornelius, Gluck's "Che Faro" from Orfeo, "Thou Star of Evening," from Wagner's "Tannhauser," quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto," and selections, vocal and instrumental, from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mme. Nordica was tendered an enthusiastic reception and many flowers, but her singing of the "Una Voce" was white and colorless, and the Polacca was very little better. It was not until the "Cavalleria" that Mme. Nordica sang without reserve and proved herself the artist she undoubtedly is. Her voice has grown in volume and brilliancy, and she has acquired skill in its delivery. From her singing of the "Cavalleria" music it is easy to understand the reputation she has acquired as an interpreter of dramatic roles. With possibly one exception we do not remember to have heard Santuzza's music sung in so satisfactory and interesting a manner.

Mme. Scalchi was also warmly welcomed. She sang "Ah! rendimi" and "Che Faro"; albeit her voice was not in its best condition; she pleased the audience who gave her two very spontaneous recalls, to which she graciously responded.

Mr. Kalisch would give more pleasure with his fine voice if he would forego such loud singing.

Mr. Döme, a newcomer, after the first nervousness of appearing before a strange audience was overcome, proved himself a delightful singer, with a full melodious baritone voice, which he handles well. The orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Sapio, seemed to find some difficulty in keeping with the singers, but on the whole was satisfactory.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.

Date 1-28

MUSIC BY THE SYMPHONY.

Boston's Crack Orchestra Pleases an Infantry Hall Gathering.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth Providence concert at Infantry hall last night to an audience numerically less than has listened to its playing at some of the previous entertainments. The program was unique in its inclusion of Goldmark, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens and Schumann, together with three less famous composers.

Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," was rendered with scarcely a flaw. The power of the orchestra to evolve the richest quality of full, round sound in its interpretation of the brilliant score Goldmark used to delineate the occurrences of which the story of Prometheus and Zeno is made up, was charmingly evinced, and the gathering manifested its delight by hearty applause.

"The Spinning Wheel of Omphale," by Saint-Saens, was to the larger part of the audience the most pleasing number. The opportunity it gave the strings for soft, bewitching expression was adequately embraced.

Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, a composition containing many passages of light, delicate velocity of a popular form, was performed almost perfectly.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the piano soloist. Her selection was Rubinstein's minor concerto, a hard work with profuse technical complications, and one that offers a competent pianist plenty of chances for artistic playing. While Mrs. Zeisler's peculiarities of manner at the piano were criticised unfavorably by many, it is doubtful if her performance as a whole was not enjoyed in a considerable measure by nearly every person. She betrayed defects, and her awkward bodily movements and exaggerated arm and wrist gyrations seemed only to make them the more noticeable, instead of detracting from their prominence. She was recalled.

Mons. Charles Mole, the Boston flute player, gave a romance, serenade and a waltz with true artist skill.

The fifth concert will take place Monday, Feb. 29.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 30, 1892.

NORDICA'S FAREWELL.

Music Hall was crowded on Thursday evening, when Mme. Nordica took her leave for the present of this country. The programme began with a vocal miscellany, after which the chief numbers of "Cavalleria Rusticana" were sung. This arrangement enforced what the eminent soprano's singing has demonstrated heretofore—that her true sphere is in dramatic and emotional music, not in that which levity and bravura characterize. She gets through such an air as "Une voce poco fa," but she does not move easily or always securely, and one is more disposed to compliment her at last because she has not failed than because she has succeeded. Mme. Scalchi's weird voice and intense manner were heard with confessed rapture, and Mr. Kalisch's tremendous vociferation also won applause. The new barytone, Mr. Zoltan Döme, showed a pretty voice and fair method—nothing more. Mr. Sapio conducted unexceptionally, and as Manager Ellis had supplied a large band of Symphony men, the orchestral accompaniments were thoroughly good.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1/30

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following skilfully varied and deeply interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 79. (Rhenish.)

Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).

Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).

- a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor.
- b. Brahams—Hungarian Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Dvoràk—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played. She is a daughter of the Morgan who was so long organist of Trinity Church, New York, and who became known as the best Bach player and scholar in the country. Miss Morgan is quite young, and is a very attractive looking girl. The sale of seats will open on Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-27

Nordica appeared as Selika in the performance of "L'Africaine" Monday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The Herald said, "Nordica's voice was of beautiful quality, her singing was in admirable taste and her performance as a whole in keeeping with the superlatively good work done by Jean and Edouard de Reszke and by Mr. Lassalle, such a trio as can be found in no other opera house in the world." Nordica had a great farewell reception in Boston, last evenin

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, JANUARY 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra makes a good programme, it is "very, very good," and when the reverse happens the old nursery rhyme can be completed with equal truth. Last evening's selection was of the "very, very good" sort, and the enjoyment of the audience was in keeping with the musical feast provided for the occasion.

Beginning his programme with Spohr's third symphony in C minor, Mr. Nikisch gave a delightful interpretation of the tuneful movements, in which the beauties of the ol . time forms and their graceful treatment were given in all their perfection, and this example of the genius and melodious fertility of the composer was thoroughly enjoyed.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was then heard in Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, a composition exactly suited to the player, and in which he made, by all odds, the happiest effort in his whole career in this city. His playing was characterized by a degree of excellence in purity of tone, expression and refinement that he has never equalled in these concerts, and he held his audience at his will throughout the concerto. The beautiful adagio was sung upon the instrument with wonderful expression, and the finale was played with splendid breadth and vigor. The audience responded to his efforts with hearty good will, and recalled their old-time favorite with great enthusiasm.

Mr. George W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" followed, having its first hearing here on this occasion. Mr. Chadwick's eminent attainments as a musician and his genius as a composer entitle him to the honor thus conferred upon him, and it is pleasant to have Mr. Nikisch recognize the rights of local composers in such a scheme of concerts. Concerning the prelude, it is difficult to express an opinion on a single hearing, especially as no key is given making it possible to "dilate with the right emotion" in its hearing. It has the traditional pastoral sounds which, however, are as unlike nature as they can well be, and undoubtedly to the imaginative mind its several movements present beautiful tone pictures. It is skilfully and gracefully scored, and is all in all a work worthy the hearing given it, and in keeping with the excellent record of this composer.

Three "Slavonic dances" by Dvorak brought the bright enjoyable programme to an end, and these numbers were splendidly played, the readings given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out all the spirit and dash of the compositions with brilliant effect.

Next Saturday evening the programme will include Dvorak's symphonic variation, Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue and Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Music Hall presented an extremely fine appearance on Thursday evening, when it was filled to its utmost capacity to wish Mme. Nordica "bon voyage," as it was her last appearance before sailing for Europe yesterday. Among the many familiar faces were Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Sig. and Mme. Auguste Ritoli, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. and Mrs. Jean Paul Selinger, Mrs. Macdonald ("Marie Stone"), Mr. Lyman Greenleaf, Mr. and Mrs. William Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. C. H. Washburn, and many others.

Miss Lou Stosch, the young violinist, who has been so warmly received the past week in Boston, will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Washington at their concert in February.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: Spohr's Symphony No. 3 in C minor (first time at these concerts), Bruch's violin concerto in G minor (played by Mr. Timothy Adamowski), Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Spohr in his autobiography says that, according to the best of his recollection, the symphony in C minor was played for the first time in June, 1828, at a musical festival in Halberstadt. He was invited there to direct his oratorio, "The Last Judgment." In a second concert he played a new violin concertino (op. 79); and it was at this same concert that he thinks the symphony was produced. Schumann once said that Spohr's instrumental compositions were nearly all alike, and that there was only a superficial difference between his first and third symphonies. And there is truth in this remark, in spite of Spohr's many attempts to invent new symphonic movements, for the invention rarely went beyond the choosing of a fantastic name as "The Consecration of Sound" or the arrangement of a programme which should be expressed by the music. Yet this third symphony is a delightful work. It is "old fashioned," and many who prefer modern striving after effect, and consequent unintelligibility, to old-fashioned clearness of melody and chasteness of treatment, hold their hands to their ears or doze patiently until the final chord. The first three movements are wanting, perhaps, in contrast; they are so gently melodious, so smooth, oily and refined. Yet the luxuriant melody of Spohr is refreshing in these days when themes sprout with difficulty and are forced and nurtured in the composer's hotbed. The finale is spirited enough to make amends, and it might have been written at a later date.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" is a perplexing composition. The natural question is, prelude to what? And, again, why should the word "Pastoral" be used? For even in the vague and unsatisfactory nomenclature of music the different meanings of "pastoral" are fairly defined. There are, it is true, occasional barn-yard imitations which are not beyond recognition, such as the crowing of cocks, etc.; the naiveté that is associated with the pastoral is absent. The themes are to the point, and they are characteristic, but in the middle of the composition there is not a little that is obscure and apparently without real meaning. The instrumentation shows a practiced hand and it is often very ingenious.

Mr. Adamowski gave a fine performance of the Bruch concerto. His mechanism was sure; his phrasing was musicianlike, and he played throughout with breadth, elegance and artistic finish. Nor was his sentiment finical, nor did it degenerate into mere prettiness. He was twice recalled.

The orchestral numbers were admirably played, and the Dvorak dances closed a concert that in spite of an occasional lack of precision of attack was worthy of the old reputation of the organization.

The programme of the next concert includes Dvorak's Symphonic Variations, Prelude and [illegible] Floersheim (first time), "Harold in [illegible]," in which the viola [illegible] Mr. Kneisel.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Welcome Novelties Played by Director Nikisch's Orchestra.

The attractions at the Symphony concert last night, besides Mr. Adamowski's solo, were Spohr's third symphony, in C minor, and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude," both of which were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitous in his interpretation of the scherzo, and the orchestra displayed their greatest skill and accuracy in harmony blending generally.

The symphony was very effective. It occasionally labored in construction, the delicate shadings, and growing harmonies of the second and third movement were delightfully pleasant, especially that shading and imperceptible blending of notes in the third movement of the finale resounding almost as a repeatedly distancing and dying echo.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Chadwick's prelude was equally satisfactory, brilliant at times, and replete with those delicate touches which make the themes, under his interpolations, so full of rich and lovely coloring.

The humorous and lively staccati with which the theme is introduced excites the imagination to reflect scenes of picturesque rustic life, and the obtrusion of the wood winds in the midst of the vivacious harmonies produces a charming effect in the ensemble.

The orchestra played the "Pastoral Prelude" with excellent technique, and the comical introduction of the second horn here and there, mingling and echoing with higher notes of the flute, contributed very picturesque effects, and was exceedingly pleasing to the audience.

Mr. Adamowski, as soloist, had the opportunity of once more displaying his great command over the violin.

He played Bruch's concerto, in G minor, and if in the allegro he was somewhat stiff and abrupt in bowing, in the adagio he exhibited a wonderful capacity of producing the loveliest and most delicate tones of which the instrument is susceptible.

Three Slavonic dances from Dvorak, which concluded the concert, were played with vivacity and that abandonment in movement which is characteristic of Slavonic music and which seem to breathe that native fantastic, almost wild buoyancy, which was thrown into more conspicuous relief by the emphasis and vigor of the tempo in which they were played, and of which Mr. Nikisch is probably the most brilliant exponent in this country.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Symphonic variations, Dvorak; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. Mr. Franz Kneisel will play the viola solo.

—The farewell Nordica concert, Thursday night, was a fitting termination of that prima donna's exceptionally successful season, which Mr. Ellis has managed so well. The fact that not one vacant seat was seen on the floor or balconies and no space left to stand even, was an eloquent tribute to the deep interest Boston feels in its gifted townswoman. Mme. Nordica is in splendid form and fairly shone with smiles as she acknowledged her hearty and prolonged welcome. She never looked younger, handsomer or more queenly than she did as she came upon the stage in a Worth gown of heavy white satin, with gold embroidered panels and a broad gold band at the bottom of the skirt. The decollette bodice was bordered with the same rich band, and below it gleamed some brilliant jewels very artistically arranged. A diamond necklace, with turquoise pendants, was around the full white throat, and she wore some superb bracelets. In her hair were diamond pins. Two immense baskets, one of calla lilies and ferns and another of annunciation lilies, were passed up to her, and several loose clusters of roses. Mme. Scalchi looked unusually well in buttercup yellow satin, brocaded with flowers. She wore at the throat a large diamond cross, and some diamond ornaments in her hair. She was presented with a huge basket of red roses. The daintiest hit of the evening was the simple old English song which Mme. Nordica sang to an encore, and played her own accompaniment. It was exquisitely done. In the great audience among the throng of well-known people were Mrs. F. S. Watson, Miss Lucretia Abbot, Mr. Frank Beebe and party, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Little, and Mr. Arthur M. Little, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Frank Jackson, Miss May Lockwood and Mr. William Gaston, Mr. Dwight Braman, the Misses Stackpole, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. W. G. Russell, Miss Russell and party, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott W. Pratt, Mrs. W. G. Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Jr., Mr. Isadore Braggiotti, Miss K. S. Parks, Signor and Signora Rotoli, Mr. Frank Morse, Mr. Eugene de Danckwardt, Mr. John D. Williams, Captain Walker of the Pavonia, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Walker, and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Baldwin—the last two ladies the sisters of Madame Nordica.

—Mme. Nordica received a host of friends in the artist's room after the concert Thursday night, who stepped to congratulate her and say bon voyage and to partake of some delightful claret punch which was provided with the usual thoughtfulness which is one of that artist's characteristics. Mme. Nordica sailed yesterday in the Etruria for England.

Mme. Nordica sailed on the Etruria yesterday and will sing in London Feb. 8.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 1, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a wise proceeding to resuscitate Spohr, for the world at present passes him by with altogether too much superciliousness. Genius ought not to cause talent to be forgotten, and the overwhelming greatness of Beethoven in the symphonic field should not obliterate the sweetness and calm of Spohr's orchestral writings. The composer was not a reformer; he took the symphony just as Mozart had left it, and the influence of the "Jupiter" symphony may readily be perceived in the fugato of the finale of the symphony of Saturday. Of Beethoven and a broad and passionate school, Spohr desired to know nothing, his formalism was opposed to anything that seemed iconoclastic in music, at least in the instrumental forms, and ingenuity took the place of fervor in all his symphonies.

The symphony in C minor, given at this concert, has pretty themes, overflowing with melody, but its first movement has no real development, and there is a sameness in the first three movements that is not permissible in symphonic work, the Scherzo being anything but a good example of the character of this movement. The finale, however, makes some amends. The work was well played, not with great precision, but with a certain power and "schwung" that was effective. The work of the cellos and violas in the second movement, and the woodwind in the third, may be commended, and the fugato of the finale was quite clear and well balanced.

Mr. T. Adamowski deserves the heartiest congratulations on the success he achieved in Bruch's violin concerto; it was given with a breadth and yet a refinement that overtopped anything that he has yet achieved, and it suggested possibilities that I had not suspected, much as I have appreciated the poetic intelligence of the artist. A most sympathetic tone, a direct and manly interpretation quite in line with the work, a constant purity of intonation, and full and broad bowing, were a few of the many creditable points of the performance.

As to the work itself, this concert in G minor is the best instrumental composition of the master. It is far above the other two violin concertos that he has written (the third was played at Dusseldorf by Joachim this summer for the first time), and it may be ranked above the Mendelssohn concerto, which is the visiting card of every new comer that plays violin, and not so very far from the Beethoven concerto, with which it has this in common, it grows weaker towards the end, its chief beauty being in its first portions.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" was a disappointment; it began at once with a drone-bass, and gave a few bird-calls, that seemed to come direct from the Wagnerian scores, but it was rather bombastic than pastoral, and seemed either a dilution or a parody of "Waldweben" with most of the work transferred from the strings to the woodwind. Its scoring was ambitious enough, but its themes were rather vague, and even the instrumentation was paled by the Slavonic dances by Dvorak (why not spell this name "Dvorjak" and give some idea of its pronunciation?) which were spiced to the very brim with every kind of musical pepper known to the modern composer. In these Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element, and there was fire, yes even an entire conflagration, in the interpretation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 31.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Spohr's Symphony, No. 3, in C-minor, a genial composition and with less of that persistent chromatic modulation which characterizes Spohr generally and gives such mononony of effect to his work. This is solid music, clear as crystal, chaste in style and of infinite grace in melody and treatment. There is, perhaps, too much of smoothness and a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements, charming as they are; but the brilliant and fiery finale, with its spirited and clean cut fugato, makes amends. The finale is, on he whole, the best and most interesting movement. The first allegro is delightful in its easy flow. The largretto has no especial distinction except its purity of feeling and its suave melodiousness. The scherzo has scarcely the true scherzo spirit, and runs into a smoothness more befitting a minuet; but it is all solid music, exquisite in its finish, its warmth of sentiment, and its polished style. The work was admirably played, save for an occasional indecision in attack, a fault that seems to have become a permanency with the orchestra. The novelty of the programme was "A Pastoral Prelude," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. It is full of life, bright in its themes and ingesious and brilliant in its orchestration. We failed to discover the pastoral element in it, but that may have been a lack of perception on our part. Now and then we fancied we heard the gobbling of turkeys, the quacking of ducks, the crowing of cocks and the bleating of lambs; but the meaning of the work did not make itself clear to us, and it seemed a trifle over long for its themes. It was played with animation and emphasis, and was heartily applauded. The concert ended with an inspiring performance of three Slavonic dances by Dvorak which had been heard here before. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who played Bruch's violin concerto in G-minor, and with a finish and elegance of style and beauty of phrasing that were artistic in the best sense of the word. The adagio was given with notable warmth, and largeness of sentiment. On the whole the effort was the best and the most satisfying that the artist has made at these concerts. He was applauded with fervor, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time), and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Post
MOTTO:
With a Mission
—AND—
Without a Muzzle.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 1, 1892.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered at Music Hall last Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a particularly happy one, presenting Mr. Timothee Adamowski in Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, and a first hearing at these concerts of Spohr's third symphony in C minor and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude."

The symphony was very effective. The second and third movements offered continuous opportunities for delicate shading and harmonious blending of tones. The finale was given in all the perfection of rich harmonies and fine coloring which characterizes the composition.

Adamowski's rendition of Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to his friends. His improvement in touch, execution and breadth of style is marked, and he was particularly fortunate in choosing a work adapted in every way to his powers. His playing was characterized by purity of tone, refinement and expression, and was heartily appreciated by the audience, whose enthusiasm was only appeased after a second recall.

Mr. George W. Chadwick, the composer of "A Pastoral Prelude," had previously demonstrated his ability as a composer of rare merit, and the work so ably interpreted by Mr. Nikisch Saturday night bore testimony to his good taste in including the composition in his programme. It is full of color and built on the prescribed lines of pastoral music composition, is full of fine orchestral effects, and needs to be heard more than once to be properly appreciated.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvorak were a bright and fitting end to a delightful programme. They were rendered with a dash add spirit which are required to give brilliancy to such compositions.

If any doubts concerning Mr. Nikisch's superlative merits as a conductor had entered the minds of those accustomed to attend the Music Hall performances, they must have forever departed since comparing the work done by the orchestra at the Nordica concert and that of Saturday night.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert was as as follows:

Spohr: Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Bruch: Violin concerto No. 1, in G minor.
Chadwick: A pastoral prelude.
Dvorak: Three Slavonic dances.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

It is a refreshing thing to hear a work like the Spohr C minor symphony now and then; a work admirably organic in construction, in which everything makes for beauty, and in which the composer's musical invention does not go lame after the first step or two. It is in no sense the work of a giant, but it is eminently the work of a fine-feeling, cultivated and genially inspired musician. One cannot always be titanic, and Spohr's sweetly piping muse is excellent company at times. Only once in the whole symphony did we find anything actually commonplace: the theme of the fugato in the last movement—which fugato is admirably written, by the way—has all too much the air of having been picked out of some text-book in counterpoint. It is so nicely adapted to facile imitative development that, as if sure of its own contrapuntal suggestiveness, it seems to think it surperfluous really to say anything for itself. In the Larghetto one can hardly escape noticing the strong likeness between Spohr and Gounod, only that Spohr was Gounod plus something else. The symphony was beautifully played.

If Mr. Chadwick meant to give his audience a surprise by calling his latest orchestral work a pastoral, he certainly succeeded. One usually associates the lazy, dreamy, patulae-sub-tegminefagi side of country life with the word pastoral, and here we have a bright, lively, chattering movement, full enough of a certain rusticity, if you will, but in no wise suggestive of that peaceful repose of which it is conventional to seek in the country. But the music is none the worse for not being the conventional pastoral; it is bright, taking, cleverly written, and charming in effect.

The Dvorák dances are bustling, lively noisy pieces, rather vulgar in character and commonplace in effect. Only in the last one of the three, which might be entitled "Turkish March from the Ruins of Athens to Somerville," do we find any real piquancy of humor.

Mr. Adamowski surpassed himself in the Bruch concerto. For beauty of tone, supreme elegance and grace in phrasing, depth and poetic beauty of sentiment, his playing was beyond praise. Technically, too, it was exceedingly fine; but, in the presence of so much that belongs to the higher side of artistic performance, one does not care to talk about technique. Mr. Adamowski was rapturously applauded, as he desired to be, and was twice recalled.

The next programme is: Dvorák, symphonic variations; Floresheim, prelude and fugue; Berlioz, Symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie" (viola solo, by Mr. Kneisel).

[114]

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra makes a good programme, it is "very, very good," and when the reverse happens the old nursery rhyme can be completed with equal truth. Last evening's selection was of the "very, very good" sort, and the enjoyment of the audience was in keeping with the musical feast provided for the occasion.

Beginning his programme with Spohr's third symphony in C minor, Mr. Nikisch gave a delightful interpretation of the tuneful movements, in which the beauties of the ol-time forms and their graceful treatment were given in all their perfection, and this example of the genius and melodious fertility of the composer was thoroughly enjoyed.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was then heard in Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, a composition exactly suited to the player, and in which he made, by all odds, the happiest effort in his whole career in this city. His playing was characterized by a degree of excellence in purity of tone, expression and refinement that he has never equalled in these concerts, and he held his audience at his will throughout the concerto. The beautiful adagio was sung upon the instrument with wonderful expression, and the finale was played with splendid breadth and vigor. The audience responded to his efforts with hearty good will, and recalled their old-time favorite with great enthusiasm.

Mr. George W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" followed, having its first hearing here on this occasion. Mr. Chadwick's eminent attainments as a musician and his genius as a composer entitle him to the honor thus conferred upon him, and it is pleasant to have Mr. Nikisch recognize the rights of local composers in such a scheme of concerts. Concerning the prelude, it is difficult to express an opinion on a single hearing, especially as no key is given making it possible to "dilate with the right emotion" in its hearing. It has the traditional pastoral sounds which, however, are as unlike nature as they can well be, and undoubtedly to the imaginative mind its several movements present beautiful tone pictures. It is skilfully and gracefully scored, and is all in all a work worthy the hearing given it, and in keeping with the excellent record of this composer.

Three "Slavonic dances" by Dvorak brought the bright enjoyable programme to an end, and these numbers were splendidly played, the readings given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out all the spirit and dash of the compositions with brilliant effect.

Next Saturday evening the programme will include Dvorak's symphonic variation, Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue and Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Music Hall presented an extremely fine appearance on Thursday evening, when it was filled to its utmost capacity to wish Mme. Nordica "bon voyage," as it was her last appearance before sailing for Europe yesterday. Among the many familiar faces were Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Sig. and Mme. Auguste Ritoli, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. and Mrs. Jean Paul Selinger, Mrs. Macdonald ("Marie Stone"), Mr. Lyman Greenleaf, Mr. and Mrs. William Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. C. H. Washburn, and many others.

Miss Lou Stosch, the young violinist, who has been so warmly received the past week in Boston, will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Washington at their concert in February.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: Spohr's Symphony No. 3 in C minor (first time at these concerts), Bruch's violin concerto in G minor (played by Mr. Timothy Adamowski), Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Spohr in his autobiography says that, according to the best of his recollection, the symphony in C minor was played for the first time in June, 1828, at a musical festival in Halberstadt. He was invited there to direct his oratorio, "The Last Judgment." In a second concert he played a new violin concertino (op. 79); and it was at this same concert that he thinks the symphony was produced. Schumann once said that Spohr's instrumental compositions were nearly all alike, and that there was only a superficial difference between his first and third symphonies. And there is truth in this remark, in spite of Spohr's many attempts to invent new symphonic movements, for the invention rarely went beyond the choosing of a fantastic name as "The Consecration of Sound" or the arrangement of a programme which should be expressed by the music. Yet this third symphony is a delightful work. It is "old fashioned," and many who prefer modern striving after effect, and consequent unintelligibility, to old-fashioned clearness of melody and chasteness of treatment, hold their hands to their ears or doze patiently until the final chord. The first three movements are wanting, perhaps, in contrast; they are so gently melodious, so smooth, oily and refined. Yet the luxuriant melody of Spohr is refreshing in these days when themes sprout with difficulty and are forced and nurtured in the composer's hotbed. The finale is spirited enough to make amends, and it might have been written at a later date.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" is a perplexing composition. The natural question is, prelude to what? And, again, why should the word "Pastoral" be used? For even in the vague and unsatisfactory nomenclature of music the different meanings of "pastoral" are fairly defined. There are, it is true, occasional barn-yard imitations which are not beyond recognition, such as the crowing of cocks, etc.; the naiveté that is associated with the pastoral is absent. The themes are to the point, and they are characteristic, but in the middle of the composition there is not a little that is obscure and apparently without real meaning. The instrumentation shows a practiced hand and it is often very ingenious.

Mr. Adamowski gave a fine performance of the Bruch concerto. His mechanism was sure; his phrasing was musicianlike, and he played throughout with breadth, elegance and artistic finish. Nor was his sentiment finical, nor did it degenerate into mere prettiness. He was twice recalled.

The orchestral numbers were admirably played, and the Dvorak dances closed a concert that in spite of an occasional lack of precision of attack was worthy of the old reputation of the organization.

The programme of the next concert includes Dvorak's Symphonic Variations; Prelude and Fugue by Floersheim (first time); "Harold in Italy" by Hector Berlioz, in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Kneisel.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Welcome Novelties Played by Director Nikisch's Orchestra.

The attractions at the Symphony concert last night, besides Mr. Adamowski's solo, were Spohr's third symphony, in C minor, and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude," both of which were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitous in his interpretation of the scherzo, and the orchestra displayed their greatest skill and accuracy in harmony blending generally.

The symphony was very effective. It occasionally labored in construction, the delicate shadings, and growing harmonies of the second and third movement were delightfully pleasant, especially that shading and imperceptible blending of notes in the third movement of the finale resounding almost as a repeatedly distancing and dying echo.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Chadwick's prelude was equally satisfactory, brilliant at times, and replete with those delicate touches which make the themes, under his interpolations, so full of rich and lovely coloring.

The humorous and lively staccatti with which the theme is introduced excites the imagination to reflect scenes of picturesque rustic life, and the obtrusion of the wood winds in the midst of the vivacious harmonies produces a charming effect in the ensemble.

The orchestra played the "Pastoral Prelude" with excellent technique, and the comical introduction of the second horn here and there, mingling and echoing with higher notes of the flute, contributed very picturesque effects, and was exceedingly pleasing to the audience.

Mr. Adamowski, as soloist, had the opportunity of once more displaying his great command over the violin.

He played Bruch's concerto, in G minor, and if in the allegro he was somewhat stiff and abrupt in bowing, in the adagio he exhibited a wonderful capacity of producing the loveliest and most delicate tones of which the instrument is susceptible.

Three Slavonic dances from Dvorak, which concluded the concert, were played with vivacity and that abandonment in movement which is characteristic of Slavonic music and which seem to breathe that native fantastic, almost wild buoyancy, which was thrown into more conspicuous relief by the emphasis and vigor of the tempo in which they were played, and of which Mr. Nikisch is probably the most brilliant exponent in this country.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Symphonic variations, Dvorak; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. Mr. Franz Kneisel will play the viola solo.

—The farewell Nordica concert, Thursday night, was a fitting termination of that prima donna's exceptionally successful season, which Mr. Ellis has managed so well. The fact that not one vacant seat was seen on the floor or balconies and no space left to stand even, was an eloquent tribute to the deep interest Boston feels in its gifted townswoman. Mme. Nordica is in splendid form and fairly shone with smiles as she acknowledged her hearty and prolonged welcome. She never looked younger, handsomer or more queenly than she did as she came upon the stage in a Worth gown of heavy white satin, with gold embroidered panels and a broad gold band at the bottom of the skirt. The decollette bodice was bordered with the same rich band, and below it gleamed some brilliant jewels very artistically arranged. A diamond necklace, with turquoise pendants, was around the full white throat, and she wore some superb bracelets. In her hair were diamond pins. Two immense baskets, one of calla lilies and ferns and another of annunciation lilies, were passed up to her, and several loose clusters of roses. Mme. Scalchi looked unusually well in buttercup yellow satin, brocaded with flowers. She wore at the throat a large diamond cross, and some diamond ornaments in her hair. She was presented with a huge basket of red roses. The daintiest hit of the evening was the simple old English song which Mme. Nordica sang to an encore, and played her own accompaniment. It was exquisitely done. In the great audience among the throng of well-known people were Mrs. F. S. Watson, Miss Lucretia Abbot, Mr. Frank Beebe and party, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Little, and Mr. Arthur M. Little, Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Frank Jackson, Miss May Lockwood and Mr. William Gaston, Mr. Dwight Braman, the Misses Stackpole, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. W. G. Russell, Miss Russell and party, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott W. Pratt, Mrs. W. G. Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Jr., Mr. Isadore Braggiotti, Miss K. S. Parks, Signor and Signora Rotoli, Mr. Frank Morse, Mr. Eugene de Danckwardt, Mr. John D. Williams, Captain Walker of the Pavonia, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Walker, and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Baldwin—the last two ladies the sisters of Madame Nordica.

—Mme. Nordica received a host of friends in the artist's room after the concert Thursday night, who stopped to congratulate her and say bon voyage and to partake of some delightful claret punch which was provided with the usual thoughtfulness which is one of that artist's characteristics. Mme. Nordica sailed yesterday in the Etruria for England.

Mme. Nordica sailed on the Etruria yesterday and will sing in London Feb. 8.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 1, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a wise proceeding to resuscitate Spohr, for the world at present passes him by with altogether too much superciliousness. Genius ought not to cause talent to be forgotten, and the overwhelming greatness of Beethoven in the symphonic field should not obliterate the sweetness and calm of Spohr's orchestral writings. The composer was not a reformer; he took the symphony just as Mozart had left it, and the influence of the "Jupiter" symphony may readily be perceived in the fugato of the finale of the symphony of Saturday. Of Beethoven and a broad and passionate school, Spohr desired to know nothing, his formalism was opposed to anything that seemed iconoclastic in music, at least in the instrumental forms, and ingenuity took the place of fervor in all his symphonies.

The symphony in C minor, given at this concert, has pretty themes, overflowing with melody, but its first movement has no real development, and there is a sameness in the first three movements that is not permissible in symphonic work, the Scherzo being anything but a good example of the character of this movement. The finale, however, makes some amends. The work was well played, not with great precision, but with a certain power and "schwung" that was effective. The work of the celios and violas in the second movement, and the woodwind in the third, may be commended, and the fugato of the finale was quite clear and well balanced.

Mr. T. Adamowski deserves the heartiest congratulations on the success he achieved in Bruch's violin concerto; it was given with a breadth and yet a refinement that overtopped anything that he has yet achieved, and it suggested possibilities that I had not suspected, much as I have appreciated the poetic intelligence of the artist. A most sympathetic tone, a direct and manly interpretation quite in line with the work, a constant purity of intonation, and full and broad bowing, were a few of the many creditable points of the performance.

As to the work itself, this concert in G minor is the best instrumental composition of the master. It is far above the other two violin concertos that he has written (the third was played at Dusseldorf by Joachim this summer for the first time), and it may be ranked above the Mendelssohn concerto, which is the visiting card of every new comer that plays violin, and not so very far from the Beethoven concerto, with which it has this in common, it grows weaker towards the end, its chief beauty being in its first portions.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" was a disappointment; it began at once with a drone-bass, and gave a few bird-calls, that seemed to come direct from the Wagnerian scores, but it was rather bombastic than pastoral, and seemed either a dilution or a parody of "Waldweben" with most of the work transferred from the strings to the woodwind. Its scoring was ambitious enough, but its themes were rather vague, and even the instrumentation was paled by the Slavonic dances by Dvorak (why not spell this name "Dvorjak" and give some idea of its pronunciation?) which were spiced to the very brim with every kind of musical pepper known to the modern composer. In these Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element, and there was fire, yes even an entire conflagration, in the interpretation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 31.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Spohr's Symphony, No. 3, in C-minor, a genial composition and with less of that persistent chromatic modulation which characterizes Spohr generally and gives such mononony of effect to his work. This is solid music, clear as crystal, chaste in style and of infinite grace in melody and treatment. There is, perhaps, too much of smoothness and a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements, charming as they are; but the brilliant and fiery finale, with its spirited and clean cut fugato, makes amends. The finale is, on he whole, the best and most interesting movement. The first allegro is delightful in its easy flow. The largretto has no especial distinction except its purity of feeling and its suave melodiousness. The scherzo has scarcely the true scherzo spirit, and runs into a smoothness more befitting a minuet; but it is all solid music, exquisite in its finish, its warmth of sentiment, and its polished style. The work was admirably played, save for an occasional indecision in attack, a fault that seems to have become a permanency with the orchestra. The novelty of the programme was "A Pastoral Prelude," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. It is full of life, bright in its themes and ingenious and brilliant in its orchestration. We failed to discover the pastoral element in it, but that may have been a lack of perception on our part. Now and then we fancied we heard the gobbling of turkeys, the quacking of ducks, the crowing of cocks and the bleating of lambs; but the meaning of the work did not make itself clear to us, and it seemed a trifle over long for its themes. It was played with animation and emphasis, and was heartily applauded. The concert ended with an inspiring performance of three Slavonic dances by Dvorak which had been heard here before. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who played Bruch's violin concerto in G-minor, and with a finish and elegance of style and beauty of phrasing that were artistic in the best sense of the word. The adagio was given with notable warmth, and largeness of sentiment. On the whole the effort was the best and the most satisfying that the artist has made at these concerts. He was applauded with fervor, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time), and Berlicz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 1, 1892.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered at Music Hall last Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a particularly happy one, presenting Mr. Timothee Adamowski in Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, and a first hearing at these concerts of Spohr's third symphony in C minor and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude."

The symphony was very effective. The second and third movements offered continuous opportunities for delicate shading and harmonious blending of tones. The finale was given in all the perfection of rich harmonies and fine coloring which characterizes the composition.

Adamowski's rendition of Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to his friends. His improvement in touch, execution and breadth of style is marked, and he was particularly fortunate in choosing a work adapted in every way to his powers. His playing was characterized by purity of tone, refinement and expression, and was heartily appreciated by the audience, whose enthusiasm was only appeased after a second recall.

Mr. George W. Chadwick, the composer of "A Pastoral Prelude," had previously demonstrated his ability as a composer of rare merit, and the work so ably interpreted by Mr. Nikisch Saturday night bore testimony to his good taste in including the composition in his programme. It is full of color and built on the prescribed lines of pastoral music composition, is full of fine orchestral effects, and needs to be heard more than once to be properly appreciated.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvorak were a bright and fitting end to a delightful programme. They were rendered with a dash add spirit which are required to give brilliancy to such compositions.

If any doubts concerning Mr. Nikisch's superlative merits as a conductor had entered the minds of those accustomed to attend the Music Hall performances, they must have forever departed since comparing the work done by the orchestra at the Nordica concert and that of Saturday night.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert was as as follows:

Spohr: Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Bruch: Violin concerto No. 1, in G minor.
Chadwick: A pastoral prelude.
Dvorák: Three Slavonic dances.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

It is a refreshing thing to hear a work like the Spohr C minor symphony now and then; a work admirably organic in construction, in which everything makes for beauty, and in which the composer's musical invention does not go lame after the first step or two. It is in no sense the work of a giant, but it is eminently the work of a fine-feeling, cultivated and genially inspired musician. One cannot always be titanic, and Spohr's sweetly piping muse is excellent company at times. Only once in the whole symphony did we find anything actually commonplace: the theme of the fugato in the last movement—which fugato is admirably written, by the way—has all too much the air of having been picked out of some text-book in counterpoint. It is so nicely adapted to facile imitative development that, as if sure of its own contrapuntal suggestiveness. It seems to think it surperfluous really to say anything for itself. In the Larghetto one can hardly escape noticing the strong likeness between Spohr and Gounod, only that Spohr was Gounod plus something else. The symphony was beautifully played.

If Mr. Chadwick meant to give his audience a surprise by calling his latest orchestral work a pastoral, he certainly succeeded. One usually associates the lazy, dreamy, patulae-sub-tegminefagi side of country life with the word pastoral, and here we have a bright, lively, chattering movement, full enough of a certain rusticity, if you will, but in no wise suggestive of that peaceful repose of which it is conventional to seek in the country. But the music is none the worse for not being the conventional pastoral; it is bright, taking, cleverly written, and charming in effect.

The Dvorák dances are bustling, lively noisy pieces, rather vulgar in character and commonplace in effect. Only in the last one of the three, which might be entitled "Turkish March from the Ruins of Athens to Somerville," do we find any real piquancy of humor.

Mr. Adamowski surpassed himself in the Bruch concerto. For beauty of tone, supreme elegance and grace in phrasing, depth and poetic beauty of sentiment, his playing was beyond praise. Technically, too, it was exceedingly fine; but, in the presence of so much that belongs to the higher side of artistic performance, one does not care to talk about technique. Mr. Adamowski was rapturously applauded, as he desired to be, and was twice recalled.

The next programme is: Dvorák, symphonic variations; Floresheim, prelude and fugue; Berlioz, Symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie' (viola solo, by Mr. Kneisel).

[illegible] Traveller

[illegible], FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

[illegible]OPIES TWO CENTS

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties on the programme of the Symphony concert, Saturday evening, Symphony No. 3 in C-minor by Spohr and Mr. George Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude." The other numbers of the programme were Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G-minor, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist, and three Slavonic dances, Nos. 8, 6 and 5, which have not been heard in these concerts since Mr. Henschel played them.

The Spohr Symphony begins with an introduction, Andante Grave in C time in short phrases, commencing forte and ending piano or pianissimo and then reversing the dynmatics, nuances that demand sudden diminuendos and crescendos if the expression is to be observed.

Following comes an Allegro in six-eight time, a flowing theme, pianissimo, given to the first violins, with imitative passages on the other strings, taken up later on by the wind instruments in happy combination, and sustained unflagging to the end. The nuances are sudden and extreme in character, and require a most accurate rendering, at once delicate and then bold again, if the effect indicated by the composer is to be obtained.

A Larghetto follows in nine-eight time, a delightful cantabile with a second theme for the violins on the G string in unison with the 'celli. The Scherzo which follows is not in the form that the general acceptance of the term implies; at all events, it has not the effect that one would anticipate. It is in six-four time, and flows on in a legato manner with little or none of the detached form of treatment.

This movement also calls for some most delicate touches, the contrasts also being suddenly marked. The final movement has a bold theme which is carried out in imitations and fugue in the strings, with sustained harmonies occurring here and there in the wind instruments, the vigorous counterpoint between the violins and the basses being exhilarating in the extreme. There are delicate touches indicated in places, that in their episodical relation furnish a fine contrast to the boldness of other parts. Again in this movement is necessary the most careful and conscientious following of the composer's indications. The symphony as a whole upon the basis it is written is an interesting work, for it is beautifully melodious, pure in style, and devoid of the ultra-chromatic modulations that burden many of the composer's scores.

It is a work that requires the hand of a sensitive and delicately musical conductor to guide and control the orchestra in obtaining all the contrasts that crowd the score and relieve the monotony that otherwise must prevail. Mr. Nikisch laid too heavy a hand upon it, although the strings were most of the time well together and fairly observant of the dynamics. The wood-wind also was not so coarse as on last Saturday night, and the brass was less vehement. As an able contemporary says, speaking of the composition, "There was a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements." Now this lack was not in the composition but in the rendering, for which the conductor is responsible, not the author. Mr. Gericke would have given the touch to the nuances that would have revealed the beauties that were hidden and relieved the monotony that existed Saturday night in the rendering it received under the baton of his successor.

It is useless to deny that Mr. Nikisch has signally failed as an interpreter of the classics if the traditions that have been handed down so carefully by eminent musicians are of value in preserving the characteristics identical with the ideas of the composer, his period and the resources that then existed. The modernism of these conductors that would turn a Mozart or Beethoven Symphony into a Hungarian Fantasie or a Dvorak Slavonic Dance, and profane what should remain sacred, deserves constant and vigorous reproof. Since Mr. Nikisch first came here, when his rendering of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was little less than a musical bull fight, he has tempered his extravagances somewhat, but he yet indulges in a too wilful variation of the tempo, a too sentimental exaggeration of themes, and a coarseness of execution that is reprehensible in a conductor holding the exalted position he does—a position wherein he can educate a public or vitiate its taste. Had he an orchestra of players that had not been subjected to the rigid discipline of that superb drill master and conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and that had absorbed to a certain degree the refinement that Gericke demanded in their efforts, it is easy to imagine what the result might be. Well, the leopard cannot change his spots, and I don't believe Mr. Nikisch [illegible] ever change his characteristics [illegible]

[illegible] Adamowski's playing of the Bruch [illegible] calls for the highest praise. [illegible] was noble, the finish elegant, [illegible] intonation faultless. He gave [illegible] a warmth and beauty of [illegible] was charming. It was [illegible] that he has made [illegible] the most [illegible] can be said. The orchestra accompanied in a most discreet manner, aiding the soloist in every way, and gaining an almost perfect ensemble. Praise must be given the fine, artistic manner in which the first horn played the obligatos that occur in his part. The orchestra is fortunate in possessing so fine an artist upon this difficult instrument. When he has been absent he has been sadly missed.

Mr. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" proved to be an ingenious composition, showing the knowledge and skill of the writer in dealing with orchestral effects. The pastoral element, however, was a disappointment, some reminiscences of Siegfried's pipe and a few bucolic imitations embracing all that twanged of the woods or meadows. It was a little overwrought and bombastic at times, but that might have been the fault of the playing.

The Slavonic dances ended the programme, and being in the style of the conductor, were fired off with all the noise and brilliancy of a Fourth of July celebration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following skilfully varied and deeply interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 79. (Rhenish.)
Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).
a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor.
b. Brahams—Hungarian Dances.
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Dvorak—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played. She is a daughter of the Morgan who was so long organist of Trinity Church, New York, and who became known as the best Bach player and scholar in the country. Miss Morgan is quite young, and is a very attractive-looking girl. The sale of tickets will open on Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

Date 1-31

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE FOURTH CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following varied and interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 79, (Rhenish.)
Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).
a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor.
b. Brahms—Hungarian Dances.
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Dvorak—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1-31

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week, February 8. The programme is very interesting. It includes Schumann's Rhenish symphony, Richard Strauss' symphonied poem, "Don Juan," which has not been heard here, and Dvorak's Slavonic dances. The soloist is Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will make her first American appearance and will play Bruch's violin concerto, No. 3, which is new here, and some solos from Joachim and Brahms.

UBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

te 2nd

The next Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music is set down for Monday evening, the 8th inst. The symphony will be Schumann's third in E flat (the "Rhenish"). Other numbers are to include Bruch's violin concerto No. [illegible] (with Miss Geraldine Morgan, a débutante here, as soloist); Richard Strauss's symphonic poem of "Don Juan" and Dvorak's "Slavonic Dances." Miss Morgan will play a romanza in B minor by Joachim, and Hungarian Dances by Brahms.

The Independent

251 Broadway, opp. City Hall Park.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 12th, 1891.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert for the season, on Tuesday evening, drew as distinctive an audience in musical quality as has been the rule ever since the first series these welcome guests undertook in this city. The program offered instrumentally Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture, the energetic and complex brilliancy of which becomes singularly lucid and effective when interpreted under such conditions; a Bach Prelude Adagio and Gavotte, played by the string-orchestra with delightful smoothness and crispness; and Schumann's E flat ("Rhenish") Symphony, something that the Bostonians play so peculiarly well as to lead one to the enthusiastic opinion that Schumann's symphonies have no such interpreters anywhere else. This idea used to occur to the Schumannist when Mr. Gericke was the conductor. It has lost none of its insistency. Mrs. Lillian Nordica was the soloist—in Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" and "Thou Hall Beloved" in "Tannhäuser." Mrs. Nordica has a firm, fresh and rich soprano of excellent, if somewhat cold, quality. Her training has given her a superior ease in its use—her method is admirable. "Ah Perfido," however, exacts an absolute sincerity of musical and an artless, fervent, dramatic feeling, of a sort quite diverse from anything like the conventions of Italian opera art; and the Wagnerian air hardly less imperatively demands a spontaneous, a broad and noble style—one thoroughly German withal. To either selection anything like artistic self-consciousness is a capital fault that carries its own punishment. Mrs. Nordica would better have chosen other music than that in which her best traits as an artist could win for her relatively little success. She was cordially received and recalled several times after each appearance; but popular success is a mischievous friend sometimes. It is worth while to note that Chickering Hall's tricky atmosphere was kept at a most comfortable coolness and freshness during the evening.

On Thursday night and on Saturday afternoon the Messrs. Grünfeld, pianist and cellist, were heard in their third and fourth concerts of chamber-music, in the Madison Square Garden's Music Hall. Friday evening brought the first of another group of chamber-music entertainments, projected by the Kneisel Quartet, in whose work a special interest is justifiable. Sherry's new hall, in Fifth Avenue, is a convenient and pleasant place for the series; the audience was a most appreciative one. Mozart's Quartet in C Major (Köchel 465, Ed. Peters 17), the second movement from Tschaikowsky's D Major Quartet and the new Quartet Opus, 111, by Brahms, constructed a program given first and last, with that peculiar finish and fine balance of tone that one would expect from the Messrs. Kneisel and Roth, violins, Svecenski, viola, and Schroeder, violoncello. About the Brahms qnartet, the program's novelty and chief interest, it would be easy to write a great deal, so characteristically beautiful is it in spirit and so exquisite in execution. It is a small masterpiece from the composer who continues to prove himself a loftier mind, among all the lofty ones at work in music, with every year of his life and with each new work. That Brahms's mantle will have to be put into camphor after his death is more and more a probability; and no other composer in Germany or the world can fare his way or can wear his sandals. It is good to be reminded of it again, now and then. The Kneisel Club's next concert is December 11th.

Coincidence turned the week into almost a clean sweep for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No other Richmonds were in the field. In Brooklyn, on Saturday evening, they assumed the practical responsibility for the music to be expected in that city under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society there. So happy an arrangement seems to be regarded with as much popular favor in Brooklyn as critical satisfaction. The Academy of Music was crowded. The audience more than once became enthusiastic—not a matter of course in Brooklyn—over the band's performance, in an emphatic degree. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, Tschaikowsky's fascinating Suite Opus 55, and Wagner's "Mastersingers" prelude, with two vocal numbers sung by Mrs. Nordica, furnished the evening's bill. The favorite, Tschaikowsky Suite was played to perfection—the one work that, despite its length, is so overflowing in its store of melody, rhythm, and rich variety of orchestration that one would not object if a conductor, on concluding it, suddenly should imitate Dr. von Bülow and say to the orchestra: "Gentlemen, if you please—da capo!" Mrs. Nordica sang Gounod's stately air, "Plus Grand dans son Obscurité" extremely well—evidently entirely in her element in it. Her other selection was the Wagnerian air as on Tuesday's concert in this city. The next of these concerts, under the Brooklyn Philharmonic's auspices, comes December 11th, and Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist.

The calendar of music this week reaches tolerably well toward the contents of one in the winter's busiest term. On Tuesday a Seidl orchestra concert in Brooklyn, and a fifth Grünfeld chamber-concert, and the String Quartet's concert of chamber-music; on Wednesday an organ recital by Mr. W. E. Mulligan, at St. Mark's Church, and Miss Lena Little's song recital at Chickering Hall; on Friday and Saturday the first rehearsal and first concert of the Symphony Society of New York, in the Music Hall, Seventh Avenue.

The Musical Courier

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1892.

Really the most important musical event to the public at large was the Nordica-Scalchi concert, Thursday evening, in Music Hall. The audience, as might have been expected, was about as large numerically as it could be and still get in. Nordica, of course, was the attraction, and on this her final appearance before returning to London proved herself entitled to the glory of being beyond dispute America's greatest production in the way of soprano singers.

Concerning Mrs. Scalchi, we can scarcely dispose of her more truthfully than to quote Mr. B. E. Woolf, in the "Gazette." He says: "As usual she sang coarsely and without art. The breaks in her voice are still painfully apparent, and her three registers are yet in need of a friendly introduction to each other."

Part one of the program was of the genus miscellaneous and full blooded. In the second part, devoted to excerpts from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mrs. Nordica had the co-operation, or otherwise, of Mrs. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch and Mr. Döme. It was in this part that Nordica did her best work, throwing an umbrageous halo over her associates which well nigh obscured them altogether.

Nevertheless, the audience seemed satisfied, and as the audience "paid the bills" we presume they knew what they wanted and knew when they got it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With the exception of one number Mr. Nikisch's fourteenth programme was thoroughly acceptable, and it was all notably well played. He must not be blamed, however, because that other number—Mr. G. W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude"—was vague, half-shapeless, labored and non-correspondent to its name. So often have critics and laymen said that these concerts ought to keep abreast of the progress of composition all the world over, and should especially show what home writers are doing, that the first presentation of a new work by a well-esteemed Boston man should be set down to the director's credit, even though the work itself have small intrinsic value. Mr. Chadwick has written so freshly, thoughtfully and strongly heretofore, that one is disposed to condone the poor quality of these pages, but only on condition that he does better hereafter. Almost anything may be a prelude to something or other, and so the noun of Mr. Chadwick's title may pass; but why "Pastoral"? There is a little conventional oboe and horn phrase here and there, some rippling of flutes and some weaving of violins, but the general effect is noisy, uneasy and perturbing, and the occasional ingenuity and fulness of the scoring do little good for the listener to whom no satisfying fundamental thought has been supplied. Spohr's third symphony, new to these concerts, was heard with pleasure, even though the first three movements are too much alike in their sugary melodies and harmonic colorings. Spohr has his eminent value in the world of composers and he should not be allowed to slip into obscurity or lack appreciation because times and manners have changed. Three of Dvoràk's Slavonic dances ended the programme, and their brilliant, ever varying and exciting measures were led by Mr. Nikisch to the height of dramatic enthusiasm and instrumental splendor. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who chose Bruch's interesting concerto in G-minor and played it as we have never heard him play before. Always delicately sensitive, refined and tasteful, he now added breadth and dignity of phrasing, strong spirit, firm grasp of thought and turn of expression, with a technique enlarged and reinforced to meet the full measure of the composition and of his conception of it. If he continues in this right-upward path he will soon be a violinist to be honored as much as he has been admired.

The programme for tonight stands thus: Dvoràk's "Symphonic Variations"; a new prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim of New York, and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, the viola obbligato in which, representing the romantic pilgrim, will be played by Mr. Kneisel.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Philip Hale is no longer editing the programme-book, which has become as dry as dust as far as the special works named are concerned. But for the substitution of this tediousness for Mr. Hale's bright and helpful pages, Manager Ellis, we understand, is not responsible.

When Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch give their concert at Chickering's, some three weeks hence, they will introduce to Boston the boy violinist, Alexander Fledemann, a protégé of Brodsky.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1892.

SINGLE COPIES TWO CENTS

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties on the programme of the Symphony concert, Saturday evening, Symphony No. 3 in C-minor by Spohr and Mr. George Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude." The other numbers of the programme were Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G-minor, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist, and three Slavonic dances, Nos. 8, 6 and 5, which have not been heard in these concerts since Mr. Henschel played them.

The Spohr Symphony begins with an introduction, Andante Grave in C time in short phrases, commencing forte and ending piano or pianissimo and then reversing the dynmatics, nuances that demand sudden diminuendos and crescendos if the expression is to be observed.

Following comes an Allegro in six-eight time, a flowing theme, pianissimo, given to the first violins, with imitative passages on the other strings, taken up later on by the wind instruments in happy combination, and sustained unflagging to the end. The nuances are sudden and extreme in character, and require a most accurate rendering, at once delicate and then bold again, it the effect indicated by the composer is to be obtained.

A Larghetto follows in nine-eight time, a delightful cantabile with a second theme for the violins on the G string in unison with the 'celli. The Scherzo which follows is not in the form that the general acceptance of the term implies; at all events, it has not the effect that one would anticipate. It is in six-four time, and flows on in a legato manner with little or none of the detached form of treatment.

This movement also calls for some most delicate touches, the contrasts also being suddenly marked. The final movement has a bold theme which is carried out in imitations and fugue in the strings, with sustained harmonies occurring here and there in the wind instruments, the vigorous counterpoint between the violins and the basses being exhilarating in the extreme. There are delicate touches indicated in places, that in their episodical relation furnish a fine contrast to the boldness of other parts. Again in this movement is necessary the most careful and conscientious following of the composer's indications. The symphony as a whole upon the basis it is written is an interesting work, for it is beautifully melodious, pure in style, and devoid of the ultra-chromatic modulations that burden many of the composer's scores.

It is a work that requires the hand of a sensitive and delicately musical conductor to guide and control the orchestra in obtaining all the contrasts that crowd the score and relieve the monotony that otherwise must prevail. Mr. Nikisch laid too heavy a hand upon it, although the strings were most of the time well together and fairly observant of the dynamics. The wood-wind also was not so coarse as on last Saturday night, and the brass was less vehement. As an able contemporary says, speaking of the composition, "There was a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements." Now this lack was not in the composition but in the rendering, for which the conductor is responsible not the author. Mr. Gericke would have given the touch to the nuances that would have revealed the beauties that were hidden and relieved the monotony that existed Saturday night in the rendering it received under the baton of his successor.

It is useless to deny that Mr. Nikisch has signally failed as an interpreter of the classics if the traditions that have been handed down so carefully by eminent musicians are of value in preserving the characteristics identical with the ideas of the composer, his period and the resources that then existed. The modernism of these conductors that would turn a Mozart or Beethoven Symphony into a Hungarian Fantasie or a Dvoràk Slavonic Dance, and profane what should remain sacred, deserves constant and vigorous reproof. Since Mr. Nikisch first came here, when his rendering of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was little less than a musical bull fight, he has tempered his extravagances somewhat, but he yet indulges in a too wilful variation of the tempo, a too sentimental exaggeration of themes, and a coarseness of execution that is reprehensible in a conductor holding the exalted position he does—a position wherein he can educate a public or vitiate its taste. Had he an orchestra of players that had not been subjected to the rigid discipline of that superb drill master and conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and that had absorbed to a certain degree the refinement that Gericke demanded in their efforts, it is easy to imagine what the result might be. Well, the leopard cannot change his spots, and I don't believe Mr. Nikisch will ever change his characteristics either.

Mr. Adamowski's playing of the Bruch Concerto calls for the highest praise. The style was noble, the finish elegant, and the intonation faultless. He gave to the Adagio a warmth and beauty of expression that was charming. It was [illegible] the best effort that he has made [illegible] and one that satisfied the most [illegible] said? The orchestra accompanied in a most discreet manner, aiding the soloist in every way, and gaining an almost perfect ensemble. Praise must be given the fine, artistic manner in which the first horn played the obligatos that occur in his part. The orchestra is fortunate in possessing so fine an artist upon this difficult instrument. When he has been absent he has been sadly missed.

Mr. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" proved to be an ingenious composition, showing the knowledge and skill of the writer in dealing with orchestral effects. The pastoral element, however, was a disappointment, some reminiscences of Siegfried's pipe and a few bucolic imitations embracing all that twanged of the woods or meadows. It was a little overwrought and bombastic at times, but that might have been the fault of the playing.

The Slavonic dances ended the programme, and being in the style of the conductor, were fired off with all the noise and brilliancy of a Fourth of July celebration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following skilfully varied and deeply interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op, 79. (Rhenish.)

Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).
Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).

{ a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor. }
{ b. Brahams—Hungarian Dances. }
Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Dvorak—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played. She is a daughter of the Morgan who was so long organist of Trinity Church, New York, and who became known as the best Bach player and scholar in the country. Miss Morgan is quite young, and is a very attractive-looking girl. The sale of tickets will open on Monday at 1119 Chestnut street.

Date 1-31

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE FOURTH CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 8, when the following varied and interesting programme will be rendered:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 79, (Rhenish.)

Bruch—Concerto for Violin No. 3 (first time in Philadelphia).
Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem "Don Juan" (first time in Philadelphia).

{a. Joachim—Romanza in B minor.}
{b. Brahms—Hungarian Dances.}
Miss Geraldine Morgan.

Dvorak—Slavonic Dances.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will be heard for the first time in Philadelphia, is said to be a violinist of exceptional attainments and brilliant ability. She studied for several years with Shradick and Joachim, and has won golden opinions wherever she has played.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Pa. 1-31

ate

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week, February 8. The programme is very interesting. It includes Schumann's Rhenish symphony, Richard Strauss' symphonied poem, "Don Juan," which has not been heard here, and Dvorak's Slavonic dances. The soloist is Miss Geraldine Morgan, who will make her first American appearance and will play Bruch's violin concerto, No. 3, which is new here, and some solos from Joachim and Brahms.

UBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa. 2

te

The next Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music is set down for Monday evening, the 8th inst. The symphony will be Schumann's third in E flat (the "Rhenish"). Other numbers are to include Bruch's violin concerto No. 3 (with Miss Geraldine Morgan, a débutante here, as soloist); Richard Strauss's symphonic poem of "Don Juan" and Dvorak's "Slavonic Dances." Miss Morgan will play a romanza in B minor by Joachim, and Hungarian Dances by Brahms.

The Independent

251 Broadway, opp. City Hall Park.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 12th, 1891.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert for the season, on Tuesday evening, drew as distinctive an audience in musical quality as has been the rule ever since the first series these welcome guests undertook in this city. The program offered instrumentally Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture, the energetic and complex brilliancy of which becomes singularly lucid and effective when interpreted under such conditions; a Bach Prelude Adagio and Gavotte, played by the string-orchestra with delightful smoothness and crispness; and Schumann's E flat ("Rhenish") Symphony, something that the Bostonians play so peculiarly well as to lead one to the enthusiastic opinion that Schumann's symphonies have no such interpreters anywhere else. This idea used to occur to the Schumannist when Mr. Gericke was the conductor. It has lost none of its insistency. Mrs. Lillian Nordica was the soloist—in Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" and "Thou Hall Beloved" in "Tannhäuser." Mrs. Nordica has a firm, fresh and rich soprano of excellent, if somewhat cold, quality. Her training has given her a superior ease in its use—her method is admirable. "Ah Perfido," however, exacts an absolute sincerity of musical and an artless, fervent, dramatic feeling, of a sort quite diverse from anything like the conventions of Italian opera art; and the Wagnerian air hardly less imperatively demands a spontaneous, a broad and noble style—one thoroughly German withal. To either selection anything like artistic self-consciousness is a capital fault that carries its own punishment. Mrs. Nordica would better have chosen other music than that in which her best traits as an artist could win for her relatively little success. She was cordially received and recalled several times after each appearance; but popular success is a mischievous friend sometimes. It is worth while to note that Chickering Hall's tricky atmosphere was kept at a most comfortable coolness and freshness during the evening.

On Thursday night and on Saturday afternoon the Messrs. Grünfeld, pianist and cellist, were heard in their third and fourth concerts of chamber-music, in the Madison Square Garden's Music Hall. Friday evening brought the first of another group of chamber-music entertainments, projected by the Kneisel Quartet, in whose work a special interest is justifiable. Sherry's new hall, in Fifth Avenue, is a convenient and pleasant place for the series; the audience was a most appreciative one. Mozart's Quartet in C Major (Köchel 465, Ed. Peters 17), the second movement from Tschaikowsky's D Major Quartet and the new Quartet Opus, 111, by Brahms, constructed a program given first and last, with that peculiar finish and fine balance of tone that one would expect from the Messrs. Kneisel and Roth, violins, Svecenski, viola, and Schroeder, violoncello. About the Brahms quartet, the program's novelty and chief interest, it would be easy to write a great deal, so characteristically beautiful is it in spirit and so exquisite in execution. It is a small masterpiece from the composer who continues to prove himself a loftier mind, among all the lofty ones at work in music, with every year of his life and with each new work. That Brahms's mantle will have to be put into camphor after his death is more and more a probability; and no other composer in Germany or the world can fare his way or can wear his sandals. It is good to be reminded of it again, now and then. The Kneisel Club's next concert is December 11th.

Coincidence turned the week into almost a clean sweep for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No other Richmonds were in the field. In Brooklyn, on Saturday evening, they assumed the practical responsibility for the music to be expected in that city under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society there. So happy an arrangement seems to be regarded with as much popular favor in Brooklyn as critical satisfaction. The Academy of Music was crowded. The audience more than once became enthusiastic—not a matter of course in Brooklyn—over the band's performance, in an emphatic degree. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, Tschaikowsky's fascinating Suite Opus 55, and Wagner's "Mastersingers" prelude, with two vocal numbers sung by Mrs. Nordica, furnished the evening's bill. The favorite, Tschaikowsky Suite was played to perfection—the one work that, despite its length, is so overflowing in its store of melody, rhythm, and rich variety of orchestration that one would not object if a conductor, on concluding it, suddenly should imitate Dr. von Bülow and say to the orchestra: "Gentlemen, if you please—da capo!" Mrs. Nordica sang Gounod's stately air, "Plus Grand dans son Obscurité" extremely well—evidently entirely in her element in it. Her other selection was the Wagnerian air as on Tuesday's concert in this city. The next of these concerts, under the Brooklyn Philharmonic's auspices, comes December 11th, and Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist.

The calendar of music this week reaches tolerably well toward the contents of one in the winter's busiest term. On Tuesday a Seidl orchestra concert in Brooklyn, and a fifth Grünfeld chamber-concert, and the String Quartet's concert of chamber-music; on Wednesday an organ recital by Mr. W. E. Mulligan, at St. Mark's Church, and Miss Lena Little's song recital at Chickering Hall; on Friday and Saturday the first rehearsal and first concert of the Symphony Society of New York, in the Music Hall, Seventh Avenue.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1892.

Really the most important musical event to the public at large was the Nordica-Scalchi concert, Thursday evening, in Music Hall. The audience, as might have been expected, was about as large numerically as it could be and still get in. Nordica, of course, was the attraction, and on this her final appearance before returning to London proved herself entitled to the glory of being beyond dispute America's greatest production in the way of soprano singers.

Concerning Mrs. Scalchi, we can scarcely dispose of her more truthfully than to quote Mr. B. E. Woolf, in the "Gazette." He says: "As usual she sang coarsely and without art. The breaks in her voice are still painfully apparent, and her three registers are yet in need of a friendly introduction to each other."

Part one of the program was of the genus miscellaneous and full blooded. In the second part, devoted to excerpts from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mrs. Nordica had the co-operation, or otherwise, of Mrs. Scalchi, Mr. Kalisch and Mr. Döme. It was in this part that Nordica did her best work, throwing an umbrageous halo over her associates which well nigh obscured them altogether.

Nevertheless, the audience seemed satisfied, and as the audience "paid the bills" we presume they knew what they wanted and knew when they got it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With the exception of one number Mr. Nikisch's fourteenth programme was thoroughly acceptable, and it was all notably well played. He must not be blamed, however, because that other number—Mr. G. W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude"—was vague, half-shapeless, labored and non-correspondent to its name. So often have critics and laymen said that these concerts ought to keep abreast of the progress of composition all the world over, and should especially show what home writers are doing, that the first presentation of a new work by a well-esteemed Boston man should be set down to the director's credit, even though the work itself have small intrinsic value. Mr. Chadwick has written so freshly, thoughtfully and strongly heretofore, that one is disposed to condone the poor quality of these pages, but only on condition that he does better hereafter. Almost anything may be a prelude to something or other, and so the noun of Mr. Chadwick's title may pass; but why "Pastoral"? There is a little conventional oboe and horn phrase here and there, some rippling of flutes and some weaving of violins, but the general effect is noisy, uneasy and perturbing, and the occasional ingenuity and fulness of the scoring do little good for the listener to whom no satisfying fundamental thought has been supplied. Spohr's third symphony, new to these concerts, was heard with pleasure, even though the first three movements are too much alike in their sugary melodies and harmonic colorings. Spohr has his eminent value in the world of composers and he should not be allowed to slip into obscurity or lack appreciation because times and manners have changed. Three of Dvoràk's Slavonic dances ended the programme, and their brilliant, ever varying and exciting measures were led by Mr. Nikisch to the height of dramatic enthusiasm and instrumental splendor. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who chose Bruch's interesting concerto in G-minor and played it as we have never heard him play before. Always delicately sensitive, refined and tasteful, he now added breadth and dignity of phrasing, strong spirit, firm grasp of thought and turn of expression, with a technique enlarged and reinforced to meet the full measure of the composition and of his conception of it. If he continues in this right-upward path he will soon be a violinist to be honored as much as he has been admired.

The programme for tonight stands thus: Dvoràk's "Symphonic Variations"; a new prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim of New York, and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, the viola obbligato in which, representing the romantic pilgrim, will be played by Mr. Kneisel.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Philip Hale is no longer editing the programme-book, which has become as dry as dust as far as the special works named are concerned. But for the substitution of this tediousness for Mr. Hale's bright and helpful pages, Manager Ellis, we understand, is not responsible.

~~~ When Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch give their concert at Chickering's, some three weeks hence, they will introduce to Boston the boy violinist, Alexander Fledemann, a protégé of Brodsky.

[115]
~~~

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1892.

The programme for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal and concert at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon, and Saturday night is: Fuchs, Serenade for strings, No. 1; Otto Floersheim, Prelude and Fugue, first time; Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel;" Berlioz, symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel, solo viola.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1892.

There is no one left to complain of a lack of variety in the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the season advances. The old-fashioned, luscious melody of Spohr was heard last week in a programme which ranged forward to the very modern Slavonic dances of Dvorak and a so-called 'Pastoral Prelude' by Mr. Chadwick. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, giving a fine performance of Bruch's concerts in G-minor. At the concert this evening the programme is: Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Floersheim (first time); 'Harold in Italy,' Berlioz.

Clipping from Herald
Washington D.C.

Date 1-31

The Next Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert in the Washington series at the Congregational Church, corner of Tenth and G streets, on Wednesday evening, February 10. The programmes of this marvelous organization are of such wide interest, and the music is given such vivid and finished interpretation that its fame now overshadows any similar orchestra in the world. Paderewski even was compelled to say: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not even excepting that of the Conservatoire in Paris. Mr. Nickish is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire." In addition to the orchestral numbers there will be two soloists, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, prima donna, and Miss Leonore Von Stosch, violinist. Miss Von Stosch's excellence is already well known in Washington, and she needs no commendation to our musical peo-

---

Boston Musical Herald.

A Monthly Music-Review.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The program of the third concert in the series was a very agreeable one. It consisted of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," E. A. McDowell's suite in A minor, Tschaikowsky's "Fantaisie de Concert" for piano and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

The Tschaikowsky number was unfamiliar to the New York music lover, and its performance was awaited with some interest. The work is not all that the sincerest admirer of the famous Russian composer might wish. Tschaikowsky's symphonies are among the most admirable works of our time; his overtures are among the most admirable of all time. His piano compositions do not rank so high, and it is probable that this fantaisie will not be held as standing among the first of his compositions for the most popular of solo instruments. The work is in two movements, and is sufficiently clear in construction. It is Russian in character. Indeed, it has a good deal of the uncouthness and unrestrained force which we have been taught to associate with the moujik nature. Aggressiveness, however, is not a sufficient trait to sustain a musical work on a high plane. The fantaisie is deficient in depth of feeling, and the deficiency is not supplied by grace, piquancy, or gentleness of sentiment. The work is open to brilliant treatment, but not to a highly emotional interpretation. The long rhapsodical oration of the unaccompanied piano in the first part is simply tiresome. The work was correctly and intelligently performed, Mme. Julie Rivé-King playing the solo part with technical accuracy and an abundant display of power. It must be added, however, that the brittleness of her style and the stern coldness of her tone increased the general impression of hardness conveyed by the work itself.

Mr. MacDowell's suite, produced at the Worcester Musical Festival in September, has been played only once in this city. It is one of the gifted American composer's happiest inspirations. It is romantic in spirit, piquant in melodic ideas, and brilliant in instrumentation. The last movement is especially charming. As a medium for the display of the excellence of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's superb orchestra it was admirable, and the performance was in every way worthy of the work.

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony is not a symphony at all, but a series of highly-colored descriptive movements, resembling a suite, yet differing from the accepted form in the distribution of keys as well as in minor particulars.

Viewed simply as an orchestral virtuoso piece, the symphony affords plenty of scope for the display of good playing. The gentlemen of Boston did themselves ample justice by their superb performance of the work, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was another proof of his high and sympathetic mastery of all that is most significant in contemporaneous romantic music.

The chronicler this month has no temptation to dip his pen into rainbows. Common ink suffices.

The tenth Symphony concert, like its predecessor, was short, but it was not open to the charge of dulness. It began with what might be paradoxically called "an ancient novelty:" a concerto for strings and two wind orchestras (in F major), resurrected from Handel's buried treasures and re-arranged to meet the requirements of a modern orchestra and the taste of a modern audience. Rockstro places the date of its composition between 1737 and 1740, and, speaking of its incompleteness, says that a student well versed in the composer's style would have no difficulty in piecing the fragments together with varying forms from other works known to be like the missing movements. "It is much to be hoped that such a restoration will some day be given to the world," he adds, "for we can scarcely doubt that the work would produce a deep impression." It produced a pleasing if not deep impression by the quaintness of the forms and the fascinating, old-fashioned melodiousness that prevailed in it: the duet for two oboes, in the movement marked a tempo ordinario almost brought an encore. The prelude to "Parsifal" and Rubinstein's Ocean symphony, in its original version, made up the other numbers—as complete a contrast as could have been well devised.

At the eleventh Symphony concert the postponed symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart was given and proved to be no more curious than inspired. It was presented under the most favorable circumstances by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel (what a superb viola Mr. Kneisel had!), but who would care to hear it again? The pièce de resistance of the evening was the second Brahms symphony, and it proved so much of a resistance that a third of the audience left before it was finished. Let that be told fifty years hence! The other numbers were Goldmark's superbly scored overture "Prometheus Bound," and the exquisite Schubert entr'acte "Rosamunde."

The Kneisel Quartet on the evening of January 4 presented three novelties; a most fascinating though not deep quartet by the unfortunate Carl Von Dittersdorf (friend of Gluck), the clearness and beauty of which were a surprise; Beethoven's B flat major quartet (Op. 130)—a hard nut even for the musical—and Svendsen's octet for strings (Op. 3), a work of astounding freshness, variety, and beauty.

GAZETTE, Taunton, Mass.

Date 2/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Attention is called to the advertisement to-day of the great concert to be given at Fall River on the evening of Feb. 16. It is seldom that an opportunity is given us to hear this magnificent orchestra without a trip to Boston, where it is almost impossible to secure a seat. Mrs. Wyman, the celebrated Chicago contralto, will appear as soloist.

Arrangements will be made for railroad tickets at reduced rates, good to return by special train. The exact rate will be advertised later.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1892.

The programme for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal and concert at Music Hall tomorrow afternoon, and Saturday night is: Fuchs, Serenade for strings, No. 1; Otto Floersheim, Prelude and Fugue, first time; Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel;" Berlioz, symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel, solo viola.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1892.

There is no one left to complain of a lack of variety in the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the season advances. The old-fashioned, luscious melody of Spohr was heard last week in a programme which ranged forward to the very modern Slavonic dances of Dvorak and a so-called 'Pastoral Prelude' by Mr. Chadwick. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, giving a fine performance of Bruch's concerts in G-minor. At the concert this evening the programme is: Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Floersheim (first time); 'Harold in Italy,' Berlioz.

Clipping from Washington D.C.

Date 1-31

The Next Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert in the Washington series at the Congregational Church, corner of Tenth and G streets, on Wednesday evening, February 10. The programmes of this marvelous organization are of such wide interest, and the music is given such vivid and finished interpretation that its fame now overshadows any similar orchestra in the world. Paderewski even was compelled to say: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world—not even excepting that of the Conservatoire in Paris. Mr. Nickish is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire." In addition to the orchestral numbers there will be two soloists, Mrs. Julie M. Wyman, prima donna, and Miss Leonore Von Stosch, violinist. Miss Von Stosch's excellence is already well known in Washington, and she needs no commendation to our musical peo-

---

Boston Musical Herald.

A Monthly Music-Review.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The program of the third concert in the series was a very agreeable one. It consisted of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," E. A. McDowell's suite in A minor, Tschaikowsky's "Fantaisie de Concert" for piano and orchestra, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

The Tschaikowsky number was unfamiliar to the New York music lover, and its performance was awaited with some interest. The work is not all that the sincerest admirer of the famous Russian composer might wish. Tschaikowsky's symphonies are among the most admirable works of our time; his overtures are among the most admirable of all time. His piano compositions do not rank so high, and it is probable that this fantaisie will not be held as standing among the first of his compositions for the most popular of solo instruments. The work is in two movements, and is sufficiently clear in construction. It is Russian in character. Indeed, it has a good deal of the uncouthness and unrestrained force which we have been taught to associate with the moujik nature. Aggressiveness, however, is not a sufficient trait to sustain a musical work on a high plane. The fantaisie is deficient in depth of feeling, and the deficiency is not supplied by grace, piquancy, or gentleness of sentiment. The work is open to brilliant treatment, but not to a highly emotional interpretation. The long rhapsodical oration of the unaccompanied piano in the first part is simply tiresome. The work was correctly and intelligently performed, Mme. Julie Rivé-King playing the solo part with technical accuracy and an abundant display of power. It must be added, however, that the brittleness of her style and the stern coldness of her tone increased the general impression of hardness conveyed by the work itself.

Mr. MacDowell's suite, produced at the Worcester Musical Festival in September, has been played only once in this city. It is one of the gifted American composer's happiest inspirations. It is romantic in spirit, piquant in melodic ideas, and brilliant in instrumentation. The last movement is especially charming. As a medium for the display of the excellence of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's superb orchestra it was admirable, and the performance was in every way worthy of the work.

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony is not a symphony at all, but a series of highly-colored descriptive movements, resembling a suite, yet differing from the accepted form in the distribution of keys as well as in minor particulars.

Viewed simply as an orchestral virtuoso piece, the symphony affords plenty of scope for the display of good playing. The gentlemen of Boston did themselves ample justice by their superb performance of the work, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was another proof of his high and sympathetic mastery of all that is most significant in contemporaneous romantic music.

The chronicler this month has no temptation to dip his pen into rainbows. Common ink suffices.

The tenth Symphony concert, like its predecessor, was short, but it was not open to the charge of dulness. It began with what might be paradoxically called "an ancient novelty:" a concerto for strings and two wind orchestras (in F major), resurrected from Handel's buried treasures and re-arranged to meet the requirements of a modern orchestra and the taste of a modern audience. Rockstro places the date of its composition between 1737 and 1740, and, speaking of its incompleteness, says that a student well versed in the composer's style would have no difficulty in piecing the fragments together with varying forms from other works known to be like the missing movements. "It is much to be hoped that such a restoration will some day be given to the world," he adds, "for we can scarcely doubt that the work would produce a deep impression." It produced a pleasing if not deep impression by the quaintness of the forms and the fascinating, old-fashioned melodiousness that prevailed in it: the duet for two oboes, in the movement marked a tempo ordinario almost brought an encore. The prelude to "Parsifal" and Rubinstein's Ocean symphony, in its original version, made up the other numbers—as complete a contrast as could have been well devised.

At the eleventh Symphony concert the postponed symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart was given and proved to be no more curious than inspired. It was presented under the most favorable circumstances by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel (what a superb viola Mr. Kneisel had!), but who would care to hear it again? The pièce de resistance of the evening was the second Brahms symphony, and it proved so much of a resistance that a third of the audience left before it was finished. Let that be told fifty years hence! The other numbers were Goldmark's superbly scored overture "Prometheus Bound," and the exquisite Schubert entr'acte "Rosamunde."

The Kneisel Quartet on the evening of January 4 presented three novelties; a most fascinating though not deep quartet by the unfortunate Carl Von Dittersdorf (friend of Gluck), the clearness and beauty of which were a surprise; Beethoven's B flat major quartet (Op. 130)—a hard nut even for the musical—and Svendsen's octet for strings (Op. 3), a work of astounding freshness, variety, and beauty.

GAZETTE, Taunton, Mass.

Date 2/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Attention is called to the advertisement to-day of the great concert to be given at Fall River on the evening of Feb. 16. It is seldom that an opportunity is given us to hear this magnificent orchestra without a trip to Boston, where it is almost impossible to secure a seat Mrs. Wyman, the celebrated Chicago contralto, will appear as soloist.

Arrangements will be made for railroad tickets at reduced rates, good to return by special train. The exact rate will be advertised later.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia,

Monday Evening, February 8, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the remaining three concerts, and single tickets now on sale at 1119 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Congregational Church, - Corner Tenth and G Streets,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE MUSIC COMMITTEE.

Wednesday Evening, February 10, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at J. F. ELLIS & Co.'s, 937 Penna. Avenue.

Academy of Music, - Brooklyn.

Friday Afternoon, February 12, at 3 o'clock.
Saturday Evening, February 13, at 8.15 o'clock.

Under the auspices of the
PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, February 11, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, January 30. This was the programme:

Spohr.	Symphony No. 3, in C minor. Andante Grave; Allegro.—Larghetto.— Scherzo—Finale: Allegro. (First time at these concerts.)
Bruch.	Concerto for Violin, in G minor. Allegro moderato. — Adagio.— Finale; Allegro energico.
Chadwick.	A Pastoral Prelude. (First time.)
Dvoràk.	Three Slavonic Dances.

Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

It can well and conscientiously be said that this concert was charming in matter and execution. It is a long time since so worthy, so musical, so satisfactory a programme has been presented to the Symphony patrons, andit is a pleasure to note it.

Spohr, like nearly all the great composers in early life, met with many obstacles, but succeeded in overcoming them and rising to position, if not to wealth. Spohr was accounted a great violinist, one of the best of his time; he gave concerts in all the principal cities of Germany with marked success. He wrote much, though but little of it, beyond his violin school, a violin concerto, an overture and a couple of symphonies, is known. The symphony given at this concert is musical, in that it is melodious throughout, never introducing modern dissonances beyond the capacity of an average audience to appreciate or understand; and yet, there is nothing commonplace in the entire score. Of the five movements, the scherzo is least interesting. The larghetto is beautiful, and it was delightfully played, as was the first movement. The finale was well played, though it did appear that the tempo was taken at too rapid a gait. However, so long as the entire symphony was agreeable and furnished unalloyed pleasure to all, it would be ungenerous to find fault, even with the tempi.

The concerto of Bruch, as played by T. Adamowski, was listened to with rapt attention. The music of the concerto is fine; even when played by an ordinary violinist would prove interesting; but Mr. Adamowski, always good, outdid himself, playing better than we ever heard him before. He appeared suited with the music, and the music was suited to him. The adagio was colored with the richest tint of soulful feeling; the violin was made to sing, in soft, silken, clear intonation, the author's sweet music, in a very fascinating manner, creating a profound, sympathetic feeling on the part of the vast audience present towards both composer and artist. The finale was played with a strong, firm tone of which many thought Mr. Adamowski incapable. He may well feel proud of his work and success, for it will add another and more valuable feather to his cap.

Mr. Chadwick's prelude does not do him justice. The piece is orchestrated in a scholarly manner, like all Mr. Chadwick's compositions, but it is mainly deficient in ideas,—there is no connected thought or continuity of subject expressed. The orchestra did its poorest work on this prelude, which may in part account for the bad impression it gave. Mr. Chadwick has done many better things.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvoràk, which brought the concert to a close, were bright, well, brilliantly played, and sent the audience home in a contented and satisfied mood. More programmes of this kind would please the audience, accomplish more in the way of musical education, and better satisfy the critics.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is not a work of imperishable greatness. But it is great in certain respects. It is clear in form and treatment,—remarkably so, as compared with the "Fantasie Symphony";—it is wonderfully rich in rhythmic and orchestral effects; and, as a whole, it is fraught with poetic significance. Even the comparatively commonplace character of the melodic passages which are assigned to the viola is almost concealed by the fanciful and masterly manner in which they made to express the composer's ideas. It is probable that most lovers of music listen to it with no sense of weariness or of having to strain their imagination in order to associate the music with its "programme." They would not care for such music as a steady diet; but neither are poems of the "Childe Harold" class calculated to serve as daily food for the mental digestion. Such poems, however, are productive of much enjoyment and in a similar way "Harold symphonies are welcome diversions.

The symphony was given a splendid reading and performance. Mr. Kneisel's noble viola playing is too well-known to render it necessary to say anything more concerning it than that it was as noble as ever.

The programme of this fifteenth rehearsal and concert had for its opening number Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F, which was given with such success two or three weeks ago. Its repetition was by request, and it was as finely performed and as warmly received as before. A prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim and Saint-Saens's. "Le Rout d'Omphale" were the remaining numbers. Mr. Floersheim is well known as a composer of no ordinary ability, and this work, composed in 1883, gave much pleasure. The "bell tones" at the opening of the prelude are skilfully harmonized, and the development is broad and stately. The fugue is also treated in a musicianly style, and the orchestration of the entire work is both effective and discreet. It was well received. The Saint-Saens number was exquisitely played, and won the heartiest applause of all.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give one of their song recitals, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann (violin) on Wednesday evening, Feb. 24, at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet's fifth concert takes place at Union Hall, on Monday evening, Feb. 15. Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schweder are to be the soloists.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1891–92.

FEBRUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Feb. 7, at 12 midnight, Providence Depot.

Arrive New York Monday Feb. 8, at 7 A.M.

Leave New York Monday Feb. 8, at 9 A.M. via Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Feb. 8, at 11.30 A.M., 24th & Chestnut Sts.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Feb 9, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

Park Ave Hotel

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 10, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Feb. 11, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall. at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Feb. 11, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, Feb. 12, at 7 A.M.

Park Ave Hotel

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Feb. 13, at 8 P.M

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

Arrive Boston Sunday, Feb. 14, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, February 6, 1892.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Works of Handel, Floersheim, Saint-Saens and Berlioz Played.

The programme selected by Conductor Nikisch for last evening's Symphony concert gave his splendid band varied opportunities for displaying its resources, and a large audience expressed cordial commendation of all that was offered.

The first number was Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major. This was stated to have been given in response to a special request, presumably by some one of uncommon influence.

The work was played by the Symphony orchestra during Christmas week, and yesterday's performance, being an identical repetition, calls for no comment at this time further than to state that it proved very welcome to the audience.

Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue was played for the first time at these concerts, and made rather a favorable impression, although no demonstration of enjoyment followed its performance.

The composer is said to have gained his inspiration for the composition from being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded two notes, E and B, in a descending, and their continued regularity set his mind to harmonizing them.

These chimes are introduced in the prelude with impressive effect, and then follows a well developed theme of religious fervency which is finally moulded into a fugue, treated with modern orchestral effects. Mr. Nikisch read the work with expression of dignity and solemnity in keeping with the religious character of the composition.

Very dainty and beautiful was the orchestra's playing of Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." The music is rarely suggestive of the several themes which it so delightfully treats, and its hearing gave a deal of pleasure.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was one of the most attractive features of the programme, for in addition to the pleasure of listening to the beautiful harmonies of one of the greatest tone masters that France has ever given to the world there was the further pleasure of hearing Mr. Franz Kneisel as a viola soloist. As a violinist Mr. Kneisel probably ranks first among local players in the regard of the Boston musical public, and wherever he appears as a soloist he is assured of a most cordial welcome. He played the strangely sweet and expressive themes with delicious effect; especially delightful were the passages significant of the pilgrim's march. The orchestra work was also very commendable.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week, and the next concert will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, January 30. This was the programme:

Spohr. Symphony No. 3, in C minor. Andante Grave; Allegro.—Larghetto.— Scherzo—Finale: Allegro. (First time at these concerts.)
Bruch. Concerto for Violin, in G minor. Allegro moderato. — Adagio.— Finale; Allegro energico.
Chadwick. A Pastoral Prelude. (First time.)
Dvoràk. Three Slavonic Dances.
Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

It can well and conscientiously be said that this concert was charming in matter and execution. It is a long time since so worthy, so musical, so satisfactory a programme has been presented to the Symphony patrons, andit is a pleasure to note it.

Spohr, like nearly all the great composers in early life, met with many obstacles, but succeeded in overcoming them and rising to position, if not to wealth. Spohr was accounted a great violinist, one of the best of his time; he gave concerts in all the principal cities of Germany with marked success. He wrote much, though but little of it, beyond his violin school, a violin concerto, an overture and a couple of symphonies, is known. The symphony given at this concert is musical, in that it is melodious throughout, never introducing modern dissonances beyond the capacity of an average audience to appreciate or understand; and yet, there is nothing commonplace in the entire score. Of the five movements, the scherzo is least interesting. The larghetto is beautiful, and it was delightfully played, as was the first movement. The finale was well played, though it did appear that the tempo was taken at too rapid a gait. However, so long as the entire symphony was agreeable and furnished unalloyed pleasure to all, it would be ungenerous to find fault, even with the tempi.

The concerto of Bruch, as played by T. Adamowski, was listened to with rapt attention. The music of the concerto is fine; even when played by an ordinary violinist would prove interesting; but Mr. Adamowski, always good, outdid himself, playing better than we ever heard him before. He appeared suited with the music, and the music was suited to him. The adagio was colored with the richest tint of soulful feeling; the violin was made to sing, in soft, silken, clear intonation, the author's sweet music, in a very fascinating manner, creating a profound, sympathetic feeling on the part of the vast audience present towards both composer and artist. The finale was played with a strong, firm tone of which many thought Mr. Adamowski incapable. He may well feel proud of his work and success, for it will add another and more valuable feather to his cap.

Mr. Chadwick's prelude does not do him justice. The piece is orchestrated in a scholarly manner, like all Mr. Chadwick's compositions, but it is mainly deficient in ideas,—there is no connected thought or continuity of subject expressed. The orchestra did its poorest work on this prelude, which may in part account for the bad impression it gave. Mr. Chadwick has done many better things.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvoràk, which brought the concert to a close, were bright, well, brilliantly played, and, sent the audience home in a contented and satisfied mood. More programmes of this kind would please the audience, accomplish more in the way of musical education, and better satisfy the critics.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The fifth concert by the Kneisel quartette at Union hall will be given on Feb. 15, and the sixth concert on March 7. Subsequently the fourth concert, postponed from Jan. 25, will be given.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, January 30. This was the programme:

Spohr.	Symphony No. 3, in C minor. Andante Grave; Allegro.—Larghetto.— Scherzo—Finale; Allegro. (First time at these concerts.)
Bruch.	Concerto for Violin, in G minor. Allegro moderato. — Adagio.— Finale; Allegro energico.
Chadwick.	A Pastoral Prelude. (First time.)
Dvoràk.	Three Slavonic Dances.

Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

It can well and conscientiously be said that this concert was charming in matter and execution. It is a long time since so worthy, so musical, so satisfactory a programme has been presented to the Symphony patrons, andit is a pleasure to note it.

Spohr, like nearly all the great composers in early life, met with many obstacles, but succeeded in overcoming them and rising to position, if not to wealth. Spohr was accounted a great violinist, one of the best of his time; he gave concerts in all the principal cities of Germany with marked success. He wrote much, though but little of it, beyond his violin school, a violin concerto, an overture and a couple of symphonies, is known. The symphony given at this concert is musical, in that it is melodious throughout, never introducing modern dissonances beyond the capacity of an average audience to appreciate or understand; and yet, there is nothing commonplace in the entire score. Of the five movements, the scherzo is least interesting. The larghetto is beautiful, and it was delightfully played, as was the first movement. The finale was well played, though it did appear that the tempo was taken at too rapid a gait. However, so long as the entire symphony was agreeable and furnished unalloyed pleasure to all, it would be ungenerous to find fault, even with the tempi.

The concerto of Bruch, as played by T. Adamowski, was listened to with rapt attention. The music of the concerto is fine; even when played by an ordinary violinist would prove interesting; but Mr. Adamowski, always good, outdid himself, playing better than we ever heard him before. He appeared suited with the music, and the music was suited to him. The adagio was colored with the richest tint of soulful feeling; the violin was made to sing, in soft, silken, clear intonation, the author's sweet music, in a very fascinating manner, creating a profound, sympathetic feeling on the part of the vast audience present towards both composer and artist. The finale was played with a strong, firm tone of which many thought Mr. Adamowski incapable. He may well feel proud of his work and success, for it will add another and more valuable feather to his cap.

Mr. Chadwick's prelude does not do him justice. The piece is orchestrated in a scholarly manner, like all Mr. Chadwick's compositions, but it is mainly deficient in ideas,—there is no connected thought or continuity of subject expressed. The orchestra did its poorest work on this prelude, which may in part account for the bad impression it gave. Mr. Chadwick has done many better things.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvoràk, which brought the concert to a close, were bright, well, brilliantly played, and sent the audience home in a contented and satisfied mood. More programmes of this kind would please the audience, accomplish more in the way of musical education, and better satisfy the critics.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is not a work of imperishable greatness. But it is great in certain respects. It is clear in form and treatment,—remarkably so, as compared with the "Fantasie Symphony";—it is wonderfully rich in rhythmic and orchestral effects; and, as a whole, it is fraught with poetic significance. Even the comparatively commonplace character of the melodic passages which are assigned to the viola is almost concealed by the fanciful and masterly manner in which they made to express the composer's ideas. It is probable that most lovers of music listen to it with no sense of weariness or of having to strain their imagination in order to associate the music with its "programme." They would not care for such music as a steady diet; but neither are poems of the "Childe Harold" class calculated to serve as daily food for the mental digestion. Such poems, however, are productive of much enjoyment and in a similar way "Harold symphonies are welcome diversions.

The symphony was given a splendid reading and performance. Mr. Kneisel's noble viola playing is too well-known to render it necessary to say anything more concerning it than that it was as noble as ever.

The programme of this fifteenth rehearsal and concert had for its opening number Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F, which was given with such success two or three weeks ago. Its repetition was by request, and it was as finely performed and as warmly received as before. A prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim and Saint-Saens's. "Le Rout d'Omphale" were the remaining numbers. Mr. Floersheim is well known as a composer of no ordinary ability, and this work, composed in 1883, gave much pleasure. The "bell tones" at the opening of the prelude are skilfully harmonized, and the development is broad and stately. The fugue is also treated in a musicianly style, and the orchestration of the entire work is both effective and discreet. It was well received. The Saint-Saens number was exquisitely played, and won the heartiest applause of all.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will give one of their song recitals, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedemann (violin) on Wednesday evening, Feb. 24, at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel Quartet's fifth concert takes place at Union Hall, on Monday evening, Feb. 15. Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schweder are to be the soloists.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1891–92.

FEBRUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, Feb. 7, at 12 midnight, Providence Depot.

Arrive New York Monday Feb. 8, at 7 A.M.

Leave New York Monday Feb. 8, at 9 A.M. via Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Philadelphia Monday, Feb. 8, at 11.30 A.M., 24th & Chestnut Sts.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, Feb 9, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Streets.

Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.

Park Ave Hotel

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12.30 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P. M.

Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 10, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.

Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.

CARROLLTON HOTEL.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.

Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.

Leave Washington at 10.15 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday, Feb. 11, at noon.

Concert at Academy Concert Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Thursday, Feb. 11, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.

Arrive New York Friday, Feb. 12, at 7 A.M.

Park [illegible]

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, Feb. 13, at 8 P.M

Leave Brooklyn directly after the concert. Long Island Depot, corner Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

Arrive Boston Sunday, Feb 14, at 9 A.M. New York and New England Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, February 6, 1892.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Works of Handel, Floersheim, Saint-Saens and Berlioz Played.

The programme selected by Conductor Nikisch for last evening's Symphony concert gave his splendid band varied opportunities for displaying its resources, and a large audience expressed cordial commendation of all that was offered.

The first number was Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major. This was stated to have been given in response to a special request, presumably by some one of uncommon influence.

The work was played by the Symphony orchestra during Christmas week, and yesterday's performance, being an identical repetition, calls for no comment at this time further than to state that it proved very welcome to the audience.

Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue was played for the first time at these concerts, and made rather a favorable impression, although no demonstration of enjoyment followed its performance.

The composer is said to have gained his inspiration for the composition from being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded two notes, E and B, in a descending, and their continued regularity set his mind to harmonizing them.

These chimes are introduced in the prelude with impressive effect, and then follows a well developed theme of religious fervency which is finally moulded into a fugue, treated with modern orchestral effects. Mr. Nikisch read the work with expression of dignity and solemnity in keeping with the religious character of the composition.

Very dainty and beautiful was the orchestra's playing of Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." The music is rarely suggestive of the several themes which it so delightfully treats, and its hearing gave a deal of pleasure.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was one of the most attractive features of the programme, for in addition to the pleasure of listening to the beautiful harmonies of one of the greatest tone masters that France has ever given to the world there was the further pleasure of hearing Mr. Franz Kneisel as a viola soloist. As a violinist Mr. Kneisel probably ranks first among local players in the regard of the Boston musical public, and wherever he appears as a soloist he is assured of a most cordial welcome. He played the strangely sweet and expressive themes with delicious effect; especially delightful were the passages significant of the pilgrim's march. The orchestra work was also very commendable.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week, and the next concert will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

The fourteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, January 30. This was the programme:

Spohr. Symphony No. 3, in C minor. Andante Grave; Allegro.—Larghetto.— Scherzo—Finale; Allegro. (First time at these concerts.)
Bruch. Concerto for Violin, in G minor. Allegro moderato. — Adagio.— Finale; Allegro energico.
Chadwick. A Pastoral Prelude. (First time.)
Dvoràk. Three Slavonic Dances.
Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

It can well and conscientiously be said that this concert was charming in matter and execution. It is a long time since so worthy, so musical, so satisfactory a programme has been presented to the Symphony patrons, andit is a pleasure to note it.

Spohr, like nearly all the great composers in early life, met with many obstacles, but succeeded in overcoming them and rising to position, if not to wealth. Spohr was accounted a great violinist, one of the best of his time; he gave concerts in all the principal cities of Germany with marked success. He wrote much, though but little of it, beyond his violin school, a violin concerto, an overture and a couple of symphonies, is known. The symphony given at this concert is musical, in that it is melodious throughout, never introducing modern dissonances beyond the capacity of an average audience to appreciate or understand; and yet, there is nothing commonplace in the entire score. Of the five movements, the scherzo is least interesting. The larghetto is beautiful, and it was delightfully played, as was the first movement. The finale was well played, though it did appear that the tempo was taken at too rapid a gait. However, so long as the entire symphony was agreeable and furnished unalloyed pleasure to all, it would be ungenerous to find fault, even with the tempi.

The concerto of Bruch, as played by T. Adamowski, was listened to with rapt attention. The music of the concerto is fine; even when played by an ordinary violinist would prove interesting; but Mr. Adamowski, always good, outdid himself, playing better than we ever heard him before. He appeared suited with the music, and the music was suited to him. The adagio was colored with the richest tint of soulful feeling; the violin was made to sing, in soft, silken, clear intonation, the author's sweet music, in a very fascinating manner, creating a profound, sympathetic feeling on the part of the vast audience present towards both composer and artist. The finale was played with a strong, firm tone of which many thought Mr. Adamowski incapable. He may well feel proud of his work and success, for it will add another and more valuable feather to his cap.

Mr. Chadwick's prelude does not do him justice. The piece is orchestrated in a scholarly manner, like all Mr. Chadwick's compositions, but it is mainly deficient in ideas,—there is no connected thought or continuity of subject expressed. The orchestra did its poorest work on this prelude, which may in part account for the bad impression it gave. Mr. Chadwick has done many better things.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvoràk, which brought the concert to a close, were bright, well, brilliantly played, and sent the audience home in a contented and satisfied mood. More programmes of this kind would please the audience, accomplish more in the way of musical education, and better satisfy the critics.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The fifth concert by the Kneisel quartette at Union hall will be given on Feb. 15, and the sixth concert on March 7. Subsequently the fourth concert, postponed from Jan. 25, will be given.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1892.

First Performance of Mrs. Beach's Mass.

The Second Concert of the Handel and Haydn.

"Childe Harold" Played at the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major, Handel; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time at these concerts); "Le Rouet d' Omphale," Saint-Saens; symphony, "Harold en Italie," Berlioz. The solo viola in the symphony was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

⁂

The concerto of Handel was played for the first time in this city at the tenth Symphony Concert of this season. A second hearing confirms the opinion that was then expressed in The Journal: It is a remarkably fresh and vigorous work, rich in melody, interesting throughout to amateur and to pedagogue, and, above all —remember that it is at least one hundred and fifty years old—most ingeniously scored. There are many anticipations of modern instrumentation, such as the frequent antiphonal employment of contrasting instrumental families. There is a constant appreciation of the characteristic qualities of various instruments, and there is the knowledge of gaining effects by apparently simple means. The concerto was heartily enjoyed by the audience, although the performance by the orchestra was not equal to that of December in precision, purity or frankness.

⁂

This concerto of Handel was in all probability written before 1750; the Berlioz symphony, "Harold," was first played in 1834; and yet the concerto seems to-day the younger and fresher work. It was in December, 1833, that Hector Berlioz, coming out of a concert hall where his "Symphonie Fantastique" had just been performed, saw in the crowd a very tall man, whose black hair fell in neglected curls on his shoulders, "and formed a dark frame round the pale, cadaverous face, on which sorrow, genius and hell had engraved their indestructible lines." The strange being stopped him, seized his hand and poured out words of extravagant praise. It was Nicolo Paganini. Some weeks after Paganini called on him. "I have a marvelous viola," he said, "a wonderful Stradivarius, and I wish to play on it in public. I have no music. Will you write a solo for viola? I would trust you with it, and you alone." Berlioz wrote "Harold." The first movement was finished and Paganini saw it. He counted the rests in the allegro. "No, no," he cried, "I am silent there too long; I must play without ceasing." A few days after he went to Nice, a sick man. Berlioz then conceived the idea of writing four orchestral scenes, in which the viola should take part as a more or less active personage, preserving always the individuality. The symphony was first given Nov. 23, 1834. The march was repeated; the other movements were coolly received. Soon after this performance a writer in Paris began his criticism with the following pleasantry: "Ha! ha! ha!—haro! haro! Harold!" And in an anonymous letter the composer was asked why he did not have courage enough to blow out his brains.

⁂

"Harold" has been called a viola symphony, an opera without words, a viola concerto. Berlioz believed implicitly in the supreme power of orchestral instruments. He seemed to disdain the human voice. Now, as Henri Lavoix once wrote, "the singer is the most ignorant, the most rebellious of performers, but you cannot pass him by; he is a necessary evil, and you must admit that to express love and passion there is no instrument more beautiful, more tender, more moving than the human voice." The man, Childe Harold, as represented by a viola, does not appeal directly to the hearer; the composition "Harold" must then be considered as music pure and simple; and, with the exception of the first viola theme and the march, the genuine musical thought is of slight value. I do not speak now of the work as a symphony. Accept the ideas of Berlioz as presented by him; they are few and commonplace, although he tries to command the attention of the hearer by extraordinary means. This symphony with its feeble musical body covered by a gorgeous instrumental dress is not unlike Thackeray's two portraits of Louis XIV. as seen by the Court and by the valet. Strip the stately monarch of his wig and sword, purple and fine linen, lace, pads and high-heeled boots, and you find a bald little man, with a dull face and immaterial legs, supporting himself by a cane. Furthermore the dress that Berlioz so carefully ornamented has lost its dazzling hues. In these days composers think more of color than of drawing; and orchestral combinations that startled in 1834 appear now almost conventional, and are in fact expected. Neither is the Berlioz of "Harold," the great Berlioz of "Romeo" and "La Damnation de Faust."

⁂

Again, Berlioz, like the man in the Bible that fell down and worshiped the idol hewn by him, bows before his work and rashly calls it good. Here, the insanity of genius is conquered by the sanity of talent; for Saint-Saens, a man of talent rather than genius, stands by his musical machine and watches with you the workings of it. Do you hear Omphale's wheel? Clever instrumentation, is it not? If you reply, "Yes, but you are wrong. The spinning wheel was unknown in Queen Omphale's time; you should have represented her with a distaff"—Saint-Saens would say, with an ironical smile, "Very true; but what do we care in music for synchronism? If I were strictly accurate, you would have no whir. By the way, just listen to Hercules. I think he should groan a little louder."

⁂

The symphony and the symphonic poem were very well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Kneisel played the viola part in the symphony with exceeding taste and skill.

Mr. Nikisch directed conscientiously the prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim. The prelude, with its imitation of church bells, contains the elements of popularity, and will no doubt always be a pleasing number in concerts of a lighter nature. The fugue, according to the programme book of Saturday evening, is an attempt to clothe "the old form with modern [illegible] and the glorious garb of the [illegible] orchestra." In this attempt Mr. Floer[illegible] entirely successful. The fugue is a [illegible] of the Muse, and it does not [illegible] to such radically modern [illegible] Floersheim has shown in [illegible] and it must be re[illegible] for himself a difficult [illegible]

The Handel and Haydn Society gave last evening in Music Hall the second concert of this season, under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn. The society was assisted by Mrs. Patrick-Walker, Mrs. Alves and Messrs. Campanini and Fischer. The orchestra was made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Kneisel as principal. Mr. Lang was the organist. The programme included a mass in E flat, composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, in which Mrs. Beach played the pianoforte part.

⁂

This mass was composed by Mrs. Beach in 1889, when she was 22 years old. It is a work of long breath. It shows knowledge, skill, and, above all, application, patience and industry. She has not followed closely an illustrious predecessor; she has had fixed ideas of her own, and she has not hesitated to carry them out. Her treatment of the text is modern. She has treated it subjectively and objectively; hence we find mysticism that is intended to suggest to the hearer a mood, and we also find direct dramatic appeals. There is the natural exaggeration of youth. The mysticism at times approaches obscurity, the dramatic appeals are occasionally unduly emphasized. Nor is Mrs. Beach always successful when she is most ambitious. The comparative simplicity of the "Kyrie" and the "Sanctus," the unaffected solemnity of the "Et in Spiritum Sanctum," the peaceful close of the work—these are more effective than certain passages where the composer apparently strained every nerve.

⁂

When there is so much that is creditable to the composer in this work, and when, considering her age, there is much that is remarkable, it seems almost ungenerous to speak of a few defects. The voices are at times treated as orchestral instruments. This is particularly true of certain passages given to the solo voices; and it may here be said that the solos, with the possible exception of the "Gratias agimus," are the weakest portions of the work, and they are wanting in defined and balanced melody. There is excessive modulation. Nor has the composer yet learned the fact that orchestral effects are gained by economy rather than by extravagance in handling orchestral resources. Instead of insisting upon these points, it is a pleasure to praise the sincerity of the composer's purpose, to admit gladly the many excellences of the work, and to welcome it as an interesting contribution to the musical literature of the United States, presented by a woman of this town.

⁂

The performance was, as a whole, eminently satisfactory. The chorus-work was excellent throughout, in attack, in volume, and in appreciation of the desired expression. The trio that opens the "Laudamus te" was poorly sung, but the task was not an easy one, and with this exception the solo singers were more than adequate. When Mrs. Beach came upon the stage she was greeted with long-continued and enthusiastic applause; and the applause did not cease until she struck the opening chords of the Beethoven Fantasia. When this Fantasia was first given in Vienna, with Beethoven at the pianoforte, the concert lasted from 6.30 until 10.30; the cold was intense and the theatre was not heated; the orchestra played so badly that Beethoven left the pianoforte, complained bitterly, and then insisted upon a fresh start from the very beginning. There was no such combination of circumstances last evening to annoy Mrs. Beach: and the work, which is now chiefly interesting as a species of sketch for the Ninth Symphony, brought the concert to a close.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, opened with selections from the Handel concerto, in F, for strings and two wind choirs, heard at a recent concert. It was a genuine delight to listen to this old but still fresh and vigorous music again. It was finely played throughout and with an admirable appreciation of its true character; and was heartily enjoyed, as was evidenced by the cordial applause that attended it. The last movement, with its pretty and brilliant oboe bravura, which by the way, was exquisitely performed, met with special favor. Then followed a prelude and Fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim, which was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It is the most musicianly of the works we have heard by this composer, is richly scored and with a thorough knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra. In fact the work is well-written throughout, but the "fugue" is not a fugue in any sense that we have hitherto understood a fugue. After the subject has been fully entered, the movement resolves itself into a succession of imitations on various degrees of the scale, with now and then an episode suggesting a Wagnerian influence, and anything but a fugal style. The theme is always prominent, but the counterpoint that accompanies it never brought distinctly to the surface, and of double counterpoint and other fugal devices there was nothing that was recognizable as such. There is likewise no stretto. We doubt if the movement would bear analyzing as a fugue. However, it shows excellent musicianship, is ingenious and skilful in its harmonies, and, as we have said, admirable in its instrumental effects. It was interesting in the hearing, and we think would have been heard with still better results if it had been played with something more of flexibility. The charming Saint-Saëns "Spinning Wheel of Omphale" was beautifully read and performed and obtained the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert ended with Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy." The work is not as impressive as it once was. The first movement and the last are felt to be too long, and the only movement to which the interest still clings is the March of the Pilgrims. It is curious to reflect that a work which was once lauded for its fire and brilliancy, should have become so tame and dull. It was well read and efficiently played, Mr. Kneisel performing the viola solo in a style of great finish, but without that largeness of tone that is necessary to make the solo part stand out with due prominence. The programme for the next concert is Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; Symphonic Suite, Busoni, (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The soloist is Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The programme books, by the way, are becoming almost useless, for all the information they afford of the works performed. Not a word was devoted to the Berlioz symphony, but there was a ridiculous portrait of the emperor, a gushing sonnet made up of threadbare commonplaces, meaning nothing in particular, and the well-worn story of the composer's life. To the Handel work there was not even an allusion.

This evening the Handel and Haydn Society will give the long-heralded Mass by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, in which the most profound interest has been manifested by the music-loving public. It will be performed by the full chorus of the society, assisted by a large orchestra under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, and the following soloists: Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Italo Campanini, and Mr. Emil Fischer. In addition, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia will be given, Mrs. Beach playing the piano solo. The occasion is a notable one, and will doubtless be emphasised by the attendance of a large, friendly, and critical audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to give a recital on Wednesday evening, February 24th, at Chickering Hall, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedeman on the violin

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1892.

The Handel and Haydn Concert—The Symphony Concert.

Music Hall was crowded last evening on the occasion of the 681st concert of the Handel and Haydn society. A mass by Mrs. Amy Marcy Cheney-Beach and the "Choral Fantasia" by Beethoven constituted the programme. The soloists were, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass, and Mrs. Beach, pianist. Mr. Zerrahn conducted and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

This concert possessed more than ordinary interest because of the production of the new Mass by Mrs. Beach. The event has been looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the many friends of the composer, and the audience of last evening seemed to demonstrate the fact that they were more than pleased. This is the first work of large proportions by a resident lady composer that the Boston public has had an opportunity to hear, and the fact that she has made a favorable impression should encourage her to redouble her zeal and broaden her possibilities to the fullest extent. The Mass produced on this occasion is a work that is constructed after good models and is well put together; some persons may long for more and greater contrapuntal work than was shown in this composition, but the fact remains that the work is melodious, singable and effective to a marked degree. There are many really beautiful passages in the choral numbers, and many of the themes are strong, vigorous, and well-adapted for large effects; in this respect the "Credo" for soprano and chorus was specially good, the theme is a good one, of vigorous character and well worked out, the orchestration of this number being one of the best bits of work in the whole Mass for the breadth and virility which characterized its treatment. The soprano solo of this portion of the work was admirably sung by Mrs. Walker, her broad style, large tone, and general artistic conception of the music being worthy of special commendation. Mrs. Carl Alves sang the alto solo in the Laudamus with good effect; she has a voice of good quality and power, and uses it with excellent judgment. Her work was well received by the audience, and deservedly so.

The "Quoniam tu solus" for quartette and chorus, was excellently rendered. The theme of this number is strong and capable of good treatment but it impresses one upon a first hearing as being more trivial in character than the other portions of the work. Mr. Campanini sang the "Graduale" with effect, the breadth and nobility of style and the dramatic fervor of his interpretation winning for him most enthusiastic plaudits; it was one of the strongest solo numbers of the evening. The "Benedictus" for brass solo and chorus is well written and was superbly sung by Mr. Fischer. This artist wins new friends every time he is heard, and his work last evening was as usual, thoroughly enjoyed and most cordially recognized by both audience and chorus. Mrs. Beach has shown considerable ability in her orchestration and her generally judicious use of the instruments and the resultant effect was somewhat of a surprise to the majority of the audience.

Taken as a whole, the Mass is a very creditable work; it has some few faults, but these are not of such a glaring character as to call for any magnified comment; in fact it is very seldom that an early work of this magnitude comes from the pen of so young a composer with as few really bad faults, and experience in this line of work should broaden and expand her capabilities as a writer to an extent which will some day win for her a high position as a composer.

The beautiful choral fantasia by Beethoven was splendidly given. Mrs. Beach played the piano part and her entrance was the signal for a royal ovation, the chorus rising at her "en masse," with waving of handkerchiefs and clapping of hands, while several massive floral designs were handed to her. It was small wonder that she was slightly nervous in the opening bars of the fantasia; this, however, soon wore off and she played with excellent results. Her technique and the conception of the music were both intelligent and artistic and judiciously tempered to the requisite ensemble between piano and orchestra. The chorus did good work throughout the evening and the orchestra, which was picked from the Symphony Orchestra, was better than usual at these concerts; possibly because of the fact that a new work was produced, which necessitated more extended rehearsing than is generally accorded the players at oratario concerts.

C. F. DENNEE.

The Symphony Concert.

The 15th symphony concert was given last Saturday evening with a programme including a concerto by Handel for strings and two wind choirs, and a prelude and fugue by Otto Floerscheim. The performance of the old Handel concerto was a source of genuine enjoyment to the audience, and the hearty spontaneous applause which attended it was well-merited. The strings were at their best, the precision of attack, the shading and general effect being admirable. The work of the horns was excellent and the whole concerto was played in strict accordance with the character and demands of the music. The difficult passages for the oboes, in the last movement, were exquisitely rendered and the audience was not slow in evincing their keen appreciation of the fact.

The prelude and fugue, by Otto Floerscheim, is by far the best and most mature work we have yet heard by this talented composer. It opens with two notes, E and B, in a descending fourth, sounded by the bells (glockenspiel), repeated with continued regularity and harmonized in a very clever manner. This effect was suggested to the composer by being awakened one Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church, whose constant reiteration of two tones set his mind to harmonizing them almost unconsciously. After this ceases a broad theme is introduced, which is worked up with much fervency and richness of orchestral coloring to a sonorous climax, followed again by the chimes and gradually dying away until it ends on one long sustained note for a single flute, a very clever and effective device. The fugue is constructed on the broad theme of the prelude, only this time it is in 4-4 time, where as in the prelude it was 6-4 time. The programme states that the fugue is written in a rigorously strict style, but it must be confessed that a first hearing of the work does not bear out this statement. The work is admirably written and shows a master hand in the technique of orchestral writing, all the wealth of rich and noble effects of the modern orchestral school being brought into the treatment of it. This fact, coupled with the rather stiff manner in which the orchestra played the composition, may have obscured many of the contrapuntal effects intended by the composer, but the impression left by the performance was, that it was a most admirable and musicianly composition in free fugal style, rather than a "strict fugue." The noble climax rising in the strings in the middle portion was cleverly managed and very effective. The work deserved far greater recognition than it received.

The Saint-Saens "Spinning Wheel" was delightfully done, and here again the fine work of the strings deserves praise; in fact, the work of the whole orchestra in this number was the best effort of the evening and received the most hearty and prolonged applause.

The Berlioz symphony has been heard too often to elicit extended comment; it was played with the requisite fire and brilliancy but the extreme length of the first and last movements seemed to impress one more than usual on this occasion, possibly from the fact that it followed the bright Saint Saens number, with its beauty of treatment and ingenuity of orchestration.

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo in a thoroughly finished and artistic manner.

C. F. D.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 38.

SUNDAY, Feb. 7, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch gave a somewhat odd combination of works at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but his choice appeared to meet with the hearty approval of the house full of patrons.

The first number was the concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major by Handel, this being played "by special request." The work has interesting characteristics in the way of an orchestral study; and, as it was played with most admirable skill throughout, it may be well to accept it as a contribution to the educational interests of the season.

Mr. Otto Floersheim's "Prelude and Fugue" followed, and proved a most scientific piece of musical composition, showing the ingenuity and remarkable skill of this composer who, upon the suggestion of the tones of two bells of a chime, heard on Easter morning, has built this prelude and fugue in a way to give a splendid chance for analytical study. The use of the modern substitutes for bells, steel bars instead of the glockenspiel, would give a more impressive character to the introduction, but the full orchestra of today has been employed otherwise in the most masterly manner in this strikingly original composition.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," followed, and a more thoroughly pleasing performance of the work has seldom been had here. Mr. Nikisch showed off the string department of the orchestra in splendid shape in this number, the final pianissimo being brought down to the veriest whisper of a tone.

Whatever was dull and uninteresting in the beginning of the programme was made good in its finish, for it ended with Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Nikisch gave a charming interpretation of the brilliant work done by the composer throughout the four movements, and aroused his audience to repeated demonstrations of approval by the way in which he brought out the beauties of the work, and Mr. Kneisel gave him splendid aid in his solo playing.

The orchestra go on a tour the coming week, returning for the 16th concert on Feb. 20, when Mr. W. H. Sherwood will be the soloist.

The production of the mass in E flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach by the Handel and Haydn Society at Music Hall this evening will mark a notable departure of this organization, the production of such a work by a native woman composer never having been known in the annals of this society.

In selecting Mrs. Beach's mass as the novelty of the season, the board of government of the Handel and Haydn have done a most commendable action and one strictly in line with the objects for which the society was originally intended. Mrs. Beach is to be congratulated upon the opportunity thus afforded for a hearing of her work as it would be difficult to find, in any city at home or abroad, a better combination of musical ferver, or a more talented and experienced direction than will participate in the first production of this mass.

In commenting upon the performance nounced the secretary of the society says: "The announcement of the completion of the mass has been received in the community with the keenest interest: and those who have obtained acquaintance with it are unanimous in their admiration of its beauty, brilliancy and strength. A work of such magnitude by a woman makes a positive addition to the history of music, and its approaching production will not only be an event of capital importance in the musical life of the city, but will have a far more than local interest and significance."

In addition to the mass, the evening's programme will include Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia." The great chorus of the society will have the assistance of Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

The Symphony orchestra will be away from Boston next week, and the next concert in the Music Hall series will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. Particulars will be duly announced. Eugen d'Albert will play at the rehearsal and concert March 11 and 12.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1892.

First Performance of Mrs. Beach's Mass.

The Second Concert of the Handel and Haydn.

"Childe Harold" Played at the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major, Handel; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time at these concerts); "Le Rouet d' Omphale," Saint-Saens; symphony, "Harold en Italie," Berlioz. The solo viola in the symphony was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

⁂

The concerto of Handel was played for the first time in this city at the tenth Symphony Concert of this season. A second hearing confirms the opinion that was then expressed in The Journal: It is a remarkably fresh and vigorous work, rich in melody, interesting throughout to amateur and to pedagogue, and, above all—remember that it is at least one hundred and fifty years old—most ingeniously scored. There are many anticipations of modern instrumentation, such as the frequent antiphonal employment of contrasting instrumental families. There is a constant appreciation of the characteristic qualities of various instruments, and there is the knowledge of gaining effects by apparently simple means. The concerto was heartily enjoyed by the audience, although the performance by the orchestra was not equal to that of December in precision, purity or frankness.

⁂

This concerto of Handel was in all probability written before 1750; the Berlioz symphony, "Harold," was first played in 1834; and yet the concerto seems to-day the younger and fresher work. It was in December, 1833, that Hector Berlioz, coming out of a concert hall where his "Symphonie Fantastique" had just been performed, saw in the crowd a very tall man, whose black hair fell in neglected curls on his shoulders, "and formed a dark frame round the pale, cadaverous face, on which sorrow, genius and hell had engraved their indestructible lines." The strange being stopped him, seized his hand and poured out words of extravagant praise. It was Nicolo Paganini. Some weeks after Paganini called on him. "I have a marvelous viola," he said, "a wonderful Stradivarius, and I wish to play on it in public. I have no music. Will you write a solo for viola? I would trust you with it, and you alone." Berlioz wrote "Harold." The first movement was finished and Paganini saw it. He counted the rests in the allegro. "No, no," he cried, "I am silent there too long; I must play without ceasing." A few days after he went to Nice, a sick man. Berlioz then conceived the idea of writing four orchestral scenes, in which the viola should take part as a more or less active personage, preserving always the individuality. The symphony was first given Nov. 23, 1834. The march was repeated; the other movements were coolly received. Soon after this performance a writer in Paris began his criticism with the following pleasantry: "Ha! ha! ha!—haro! haro! Harold!" And in an anonymous letter the composer was asked why he did not have courage enough to blow out his brains.

⁂

"Harold" has been called a viola symphony, an opera without words, a viola concerto. Berlioz believed implicitly in the supreme power of orchestral instruments. He seemed to disdain the human voice. Now, as Henri Lavoix once wrote, "the singer is the most ignorant, the most rebellious of performers, but you cannot pass him by; he is a necessary evil, and you must admit that to express love and passion there is no instrument more beautiful, more tender, more moving than the human voice." The man, Childe Harold, as represented by a viola, does not appeal directly to the hearer; the composition "Harold" must then be considered as music pure and simple; and, with the exception of the first viola theme and the march, the genuine musical thought is of slight value. I do not speak now of the work as a symphony. Accept the ideas of Berlioz as presented by him; they are few and commonplace, although he tries to command the attention of the hearer by extraordinary means. This symphony with its feeble musical body covered by a gorgeous instrumental dress is not unlike Thackeray's two portraits of Louis XIV. as seen by the Court and by the valet. Strip the stately monarch of his wig and sword, purple and fine linen, lace, pads and high-heeled boots, and you find a bald little man, with a dull face and immaterial legs, supporting himself by a cane. Furthermore the dress that Berlioz so carefully ornamented has lost its dazzling hues. In these days composers think more of color than of drawing; and orchestral combinations that startled in 1834 appear now almost conventional, and are in fact expected. Neither is the Berlioz of "Harold," the great Berlioz of "Romeo" and "La Damnation de Faust."

⁂

Again, Berlioz, like the man in the Bible that fell down and worshiped the idol hewn by him, bows before his work and rashly calls it good. Here, the insanity of genius is conquered by the sanity of talent; for Saint-Saens, a man of talent rather than genius, stands by his musical machine and watches with you the workings of it. Do you hear Omphale's wheel? Clever instrumentation, is it not? If you reply, "Yes, but you are wrong. The spinning wheel was unknown in Queen Omphale's time; you should have represented her with a distaff"—Saint-Saens would say, with an ironical smile, "Very true; but what do we care in music for synchronism? If I were strictly accurate, you would have no whir. By the way, just listen to Hercules. I think he should groan a little louder."

⁂

The symphony and the symphonic poem were very well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Kneisel played the viola part in the symphony with exceeding taste and skill.

Mr. Nikisch directed conscientiously the prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim. The prelude, with its imitation of church bells, contains the elements of popularity, and will no doubt always be a pleasing number in concerts of a lighter nature. The fugue, according to the programme book of Saturday evening, is an attempt to clothe "the old form with modern harmonization and the glorious garb of the modern orchestra." In this attempt Mr. Floersheim is not entirely successful. The fugue is a stiff-necked child of the Muse, and it does not lend itself gracefully to such radically modern treatment. Still Mr. Floersheim has shown in this work much ingenuity, and it must be remembered that he set for himself a difficult an ungrateful task.

⁂

The Handel and Haydn Society gave last evening in Music Hall the second concert of this season, under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn. The society was assisted by Mrs. Patrick-Walker, Mrs. Alves and Messrs. Campanini and Fischer. The orchestra was made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Kneisel as principal. Mr. Lang was the organist. The programme included a mass in E flat, composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, in which Mrs. Beach played the pianoforte part.

⁂

This mass was composed by Mrs. Beach in 1889, when she was 22 years old. It is a work of long breath. It shows knowledge, skill, and, above all, application, patience and industry. She has not followed closely an illustrious predecessor; she has had fixed ideas of her own, and she has not hesitated to carry them out. Her treatment of the text is modern. She has treated it subjectively and objectively; hence we find mysticism that is intended to suggest to the hearer a mood, and we also find direct dramatic appeals. There is the natural exaggeration of youth. The mysticism at times approaches obscurity, the dramatic appeals are occasionally unduly emphasized. Nor is Mrs. Beach always successful when she is most ambitious. The comparative simplicity of the "Kyrie" and the "Sanctus," the unaffected solemnity of the "Et in Spiritum Sanctum," the peaceful close of the work—these are more effective than certain passages where the composer apparently strained every nerve.

⁂

When there is so much that is creditable to the composer in this work, and when, considering her age, there is much that is remarkable, it seems almost ungenerous to speak of a few defects. The voices are at times treated as orchestral instruments. This is particularly true of certain passages given to the solo voices; and it may here be said that the solos, with the possible exception of the "Gratias agimus," are the weakest portions of the work, and they are wanting in defined and balanced melody. There is excessive modulation. Nor has the composer yet learned the fact that orchestral effects are gained by economy rather than by extravagance in handling orchestral resources. Instead of insisting upon these points, it is a pleasure to praise the sincerity of the composer's purpose, to admit gladly the many excellences of the work, and to welcome it as an interesting contribution to the musical literature of the United States, presented by a woman of this town.

⁂

The performance was, as a whole, eminently satisfactory. The chorus-work was excellent throughout, in attack, in volume, and in appreciation of the desired expression. The trio that opens the "Laudamus te" was poorly sung, but the task was not an easy one, and with this exception the solo singers were more than adequate. When Mrs. Beach came upon the stage she was greeted with long-continued and enthusiastic applause; and the applause did not cease until she struck the opening chords of the Beethoven Fantasia. When this Fantasia was first given in Vienna, with Beethoven at the pianoforte, the concert lasted from 6.30 until 10.30; the cold was intense and the theatre was not heated; the orchestra played so badly that Beethoven left the pianoforte, complained bitterly, and then insisted upon a fresh start from the very beginning. There was no such combination of circumstances last evening to annoy Mrs. Beach; and the work, which is now chiefly interesting as a species of sketch for the Ninth Symphony, brought the concert to a close.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, opened with selections from the Handel concerto, in F, for strings and two wind choirs, heard at a recent concert. It was a genuine delight to listen to this old but still fresh and vigorous music again. It was finely played throughout and with an admirable appreciation of its true character; and was heartily enjoyed, as was evidenced by the cordial applause that attended it. The last movement, with its pretty and brilliant oboe bravura, which by the way, was exquisitely performed, met with special favor. Then followed a prelude and Fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim, which was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It is the most musicianly of the works we have heard by this composer, is richly scored and with a thorough knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra. In fact the work is well-written throughout, but the "fugue" is not a fugue in any sense that we have hitherto understood a fugue. After the subject has been fully entered, the movement resolves itself into a succession of imitations on various degrees of the scale, with now and then an episode suggesting a Wagnerian influence, and anything but a fugal style. The theme is always prominent, but the counterpoint that accompanies it never brought distinctly to the surface, and of double counterpoint and other fugal devices there was nothing that was recognizable as such. There is likewise no stretto. We doubt if the movement would bear analyzing as a fugue. However, it shows excellent musicianship, is ingenious and skilful in its harmonies, and, as we have said, admirable in its instrumental effects. It was interesting in the hearing, and we think would have been heard with still better results if it had been played with something more of flexibility. The charming Saint-Saëns "Spinning Wheel of Omphale" was beautifully read and performed and obtained the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert ended with Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy." The work is not as impressive as it once was. The first movement and the last are felt to be too long, and the only movement to which the interest still clings is the March of the Pilgrims. It is curious to reflect that a work which was once lauded for its fire and brilliancy, should have become so tame and dull. It was well read and efficiently played, Mr. Kneisel performing the viola solo in a style of great finish, but without that largeness of tone that is necessary to make the solo part stand out with due prominence. The programme for the next concert is Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; Symphonic Suite, Busoni, (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The soloist is Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The programme books, by the way, are becoming almost useless, for all the information they afford of the works performed. Not a word was devoted to the Berlioz symphony, but there was a ridiculous portrait of the emperor, a gushing sonnet made up of threadbare commonplaces, meaning nothing in particular, and the well-worn story of the composer's life. To the Handel work there was not even an allusion.

This evening the Handel and Haydn Society will give the long-heralded Mass by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, in which the most profound interest has been manifested by the music-loving public. It will be performed by the full chorus of the society, assisted by a large orchestra under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, and the following soloists: Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Italo Campanini, and Mr. Emil Fischer. In addition, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia will be given, Mrs. Beach playing the piano solo. The occasion is a notable one, and will doubtless be emphasised by the attendance of a large, friendly, and critical audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch are to give a recital on Wednesday evening, February 24th, at Chickering Hall, assisted by Master Alexander Fiedeman on the violin

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1892.

The Handel and Haydn Concert—The Symphony Concert.

Music Hall was crowded last evening on the occasion of the 681st concert of the Handel and Haydn society. A mass by Mrs. Amy Marcy Cheney-Beach and the "Choral Fantasia" by Beethoven constituted the programme. The soloists were, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass, and Mrs. Beach, pianist. Mr. Zerrahn conducted and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

This concert possessed more than ordinary interest because of the production of the new Mass by Mrs. Beach. The event has been looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the many friends of the composer, and the audience of last evening seemed to demonstrate the fact that they were more than pleased. This is the first work of large proportions by a resident lady composer that the Boston public has had an opportunity to hear, and the fact that she has made a favorable impression should encourage her to redouble her zeal and broaden her possibilities to the fullest extent. The Mass produced on this occasion is a work that is constructed after good models and is well put together; some persons may long for more and greater contrapuntal work than was shown in this composition, but the fact remains that the work is melodious, singable and effective to a marked degree. There are many really beautiful passages in the choral numbers, and many of the themes are strong, vigorous, and well-adapted for large effects; in this respect the "Credo" for soprano and chorus was specially good, the theme is a good one, of vigorous character and well worked out, the orchestration of this number being one of the best bits of work in the whole Mass for the breadth and virility which characterized its treatment. The soprano solo of this portion of the work was admirably sung by Mrs. Walker, her broad style, large tone, and general artistic conception of the music being worthy of special commendation. Mrs. Carl Alves sang the alto solo in the Laudamus with good effect; she has a voice of good quality and power, and uses it with excellent judgment. Her work was well received by the audience, and deservedly so.

The "Quoniam tu solus" for quartette and chorus, was excellently rendered. The theme of this number is strong and capable of good treatment but it impresses one upon a first hearing as being more trivial in character than the other portions of the work. Mr. Campanini sang the "Graduale" with effect, the breadth and nobility of style and the dramatic fervor of his interpretation winning for him most enthusiastic plaudits; it was one of the strongest solo numbers of the evening. The "Benedictus" for brass solo and chorus is well written and was superbly sung by Mr. Fischer. This artist wins new friends every time he is heard, and his work last evening was as usual, thoroughly enjoyed and most cordially recognized by both audience and chorus. Mrs. Beach has shown considerable ability in her orchestration and her generally judicious use of the instruments and the resultant effect was somewhat of a surprise to the majority of the audience.

Taken as a whole, the Mass is a very creditable work; it has some few faults, but these are not of such a glaring character as to call for any magnified comment; in fact it is very seldom that an early work of this magnitude comes from the pen of so young a composer with as few really bad faults, and experience in this line of work should broaden and expand her capabilities as a writer to an extent which will some day win for her a high position as a composer.

The beautiful choral fantasia by Beethoven was splendidly given. Mrs. Beach played the piano part and her entrance was the signal for a royal ovation, the chorus rising at her "en masse," with waving of handkerchiefs and clapping of hands, while several massive floral designs were handed to her. It was small wonder that she was slightly nervous in the opening bars of the fantasia; this, however, soon wore off and she played with excellent results. Her technique and the conception of the music were both intelligent and artistic and judiciously tempered to the requisite ensemble between piano and orchestra. The chorus did good work throughout the evening and the orchestra, which was picked from the Symphony Orchestra, was better than usual at these concerts; possibly because of the fact that a new work was produced, which necessitated more extended rehearsing than is generally accorded the players at oratario concerts.

C. F. DENNEE.

The Symphony Concert.

The 15th symphony concert was given last Saturday evening with a programme including a concerto by Handel for strings and two wind choirs, and a prelude and fugue by Otto Floerscheim. The performance of the old Handel concerto was a source of genuine enjoyment to the audience, and the hearty spontaneous applause which attended it was well-merited. The strings were at their best, the precision of attack, the shading and general effect being admirable. The work of the horns was excellent and the whole concerto was played in strict accordance with the character and demands of the music. The difficult passages for the oboes, in the last movement, were exquisitely rendered and the audience was not slow in evincing their keen appreciation of the fact.

The prelude and fugue, by Otto Floerscheim, is by far the best and most mature work we have yet heard by this talented composer. It opens with two notes, E and B, in a descending fourth, sounded by the bells (glockenspiel), repeated with continued regularity and harmonized in a very clever manner. This effect was suggested to the composer by being awakened one Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church, whose constant reiteration of two tones set his mind to harmonizing them almost unconsciously. After this ceases a broad theme is introduced, which is worked up with much fervency and richness of orchestral coloring to a sonorous climax, followed again by the chimes and gradually dying away until it ends on one long sustained note for a single flute, a very clever and effective device. The fugue is constructed on the broad theme of the prelude, only this time it is in 4-4 time, where as in the prelude it was 6-4 time.

The programme states that the fugue is written in almost religiously strict style, but it must be confessed that a first hearing of the work does not bear out this statement. The work is admirably written and shows a master hand in the technique of orchestral writing, all the wealth of rich and noble effects of the modern orchestral school being brought into the treatment of it. This fact, coupled with the rather stiff manner in which the orchestra played the composition, may have obscured many of the contrapuntal effects intended by the composer, but the impression left by the performance was, that it was a most admirable and musicianly composition in free fugal style, rather than a "strict fugue." The noble climax rising in the strings in the middle portion was cleverly managed and very effective. The work deserved far greater recognition than it received.

The Saint-Saens "Spinning Wheel" was delightfully done, and here again the fine work of the strings deserves praise; in fact, the work of the whole orchestra in this number was the best effort of the evening and received the most hearty and prolonged applause.

The Berlioz symphony has been heard too often to elicit extended comment; it was played with the requisite fire and brilliancy but the extreme length of the first and last movements seemed to impress one more than usual on this occasion, possibly from the fact that it followed the bright Saint Saens number, with its beauty of treatment and ingenuity of orchestration.

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo in a thoroughly finished and artistic manner.

C. F. D.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 38.

SUNDAY, Feb. 7, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch gave a somewhat odd combination of works at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but his choice appeared to meet with the hearty approval of the house full of patrons.

The first number was the concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major by Handel, this being played "by special request." The work has interesting characteristics in the way of an orchestral study; and, as it was played with most admirable skill throughout, it may be well to accept it as a contribution to the educational interests of the season.

Mr. Otto Floersheim's "Prelude and Fugue" followed, and proved a most scientific piece of musical composition, showing the ingenuity and remarkable skill of this composer who, upon the suggestion of the tones of two bells of a chime, heard on Easter morning, has built this prelude and fugue in a way to give a splendid chance for analytical study. The use of the modern substitutes for bells, steel bars instead of the glockenspiel, would give a more impressive character to the introduction, but the full orchestra of today has been employed otherwise in the most masterly manner in this strikingly original composition.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," followed, and a more thoroughly pleasing performance of the work has seldom been had here. Mr. Nikisch showed off the string department of the orchestra in splendid shape in this number, the final pianissimo being brought down to the veriest whisper of a tone.

Whatever was dull and uninteresting in the beginning of the programme was made good in its finish, for it ended with Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Nikisch gave a charming interpretation of the brilliant work done by the composer throughout the four movements, and aroused his audience to repeated demonstrations of approval by the way in which he brought out the beauties of the work, and Mr. Kneisel gave him splendid aid in his solo playing.

The orchestra go on a tour the coming week, returning for the 16th concert on Feb. 20, when Mr. W. H. Sherwood will be the soloist.

The production of the mass in E flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach by the Handel and Haydn Society at Music Hall this evening will mark a notable departure of this organization, the production of such a work by a native woman composer never having been known in the annals of this society.

In selecting Mrs. Beach's mass as the novelty of the season, the board of government of the Handel and Haydn have done a most commendable action and one strictly in line with the objects for which the society was originally intended. Mrs. Beach is to be congratulated upon the opportunity thus afforded for a hearing of her work as it would be difficult to find, in any city at home or abroad, a better combination of musical ferver, or a more talented and experienced direction than will participate in the first production of this mass.

In commenting upon the performance nounced the secretary of the society says: "The announcement of the completion of the mass has been received in the community with the keenest interest: and those who have obtained acquaintance with it are unanimous in their admiration of its beauty, brilliancy and strength. A work of such magnitude by a woman makes a positive addition to the history of music, and its approaching production will not only be an event of capital importance in the musical life of the city, but will have a far more than local interest and significance."

In addition to the mass, the evening's programme will include Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia." The great chorus of the society will have the assistance of Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

The Symphony orchestra will be away from Boston next week, and the next concert in the Music Hall series will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. Particulars will be duly announced. Eugen d'Albert will play at the rehearsal and concert March 11 and 12.

MONDAY, FEB. 8.

HANDEL AND HAYDN.

Great Success of the New Mass in E Flat Written by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach—Choral Fantasia of Beethoven.

Our great local musical organization, the Handel and Haydn Society, gave its second concert this season at Music Hall last evening, the performance being the 681st since its organization.

The occasion will always be remembered by musicians and friends of the society as a memorable event in the history of this famous organization, for the merits of a woman as a composer of importance was recognized, and a work was performed which for magnitude and beauty has probably never been surpassed by one of her sex, certainly not in this country.

The original production of the mass in E-flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach of this city was an occurrence of more than local interest, and in the immense audience gathered in honor of the event were many critics and lovers of music from other cities, drawn hither by the announcement of the evening's performance.

Mrs. Beach was fortunate in having such a company of experienced musicians to interpret her brilliant work. A trained chorus, an orchestra composed of Symphony men, Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist, and for a quartet, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italio Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass. A better ensemble it would be difficult to find.

The mass is divided into 10 parts and was composed in 1889. The first number, introduced by the organ, is a simple theme which is soon taken up by the strings, and then the quartet and chorus are heard in "Lord have mercy." The movement following begins with the brasses, followed by a tenor solo and chorus, "Glory to God," accompanied by the full orchestra. The theme here is repeated several times on the horns and ends somewhat abruptly.

The trio, an alto solo, "We Praise Thee," in the third, is charmingly arranged, mainly for string and the wood-winds, and Mrs. Alves' rendition of the number was excellent. The harp is quite prominently introduced here. The strings open the fourth number, and the unaccompanied quartet, "Thou That Takest Away," was delightfully sung.

In the fifth the drums are first used, and the chorus swells in a grand volume of harmony. This number is finely orchestrated, and here the chorus did its best work of the evening in "Thou Alone Art Holy." The sopranos were a trifle off the key at first, but the defect was quickly remedied.

Campanini's solo, "Blessed Art Thou," was sung with great fervor and excellent shades of expression. He is an artist always, and the audience greeted him most heartily. In the seventh number Mrs Walker's beautiful, sympathetic voice was heard in the solo, "True God of True God." The orchestration of this piece is the most elaborate of the whole composition and shows much originality in treatment.

The quartet and chorus of "Holy Lord God of Sabaoth" in the eighth and "The Lamb of God" in the tenth were well sung. Mr. Fischer's bass solo, "Blessed is He," displayed his great artistic abilities, and he was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times.

Mrs. Beach has written a work of great beauty and force. The charm of the music lies in the simple treatment of many of the themes. The music is thoroughly in harmony with the scriptural subjects upon which it is based, and the choruses are grandly developed. With one or two exceptions there is but a slight attempt to utilize the organ, which, perhaps, was just as well in the present instance, for the location of the instrument in Music Hall does not greatly enhance its value as an orchestral adjunct.

Beethoven's choral fantasia closed the performance, the talented composer, Mrs. Beach, playing the piano score. When she appeared upon the platform she was greeted with plaudits long and loud, and it was some moments before she was able to begin her part of the work in the Beethoven number. The floral tributes were profuse and elegant.

In the fantasia Miss Priscilla White and Col. I. F. Kingsbury completed the sextet.

The "Messiah" will be given April 13, the 150th anniversary of its first production by Handel, in Dublin.

MOTTO:

With a Mission

AND

Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1892.

The programme offered at Music Hall, Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was varied in nature, but proved to be an enjoyable one. By special request the Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major, given for the first time Dec. 26, was included in the programme. It is difficult and taxes the powers of the performers to their utmost, as great precision, clearness and delicacy of shading are necessary to a perfect rendition.

The prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim was a novelty. Mr. Nikisch has given us other compositions by this composer, but nothing that equals it. It is the first of a cycle of religious pieces, and was suggested to the composer by the chimes of a neighboring church, which disturbed his slumber on Easter Sunday morning. The theme springs from the two notes E and B, which reappear at the close of the prelude. The fugue is constructed with considerable skill, is severe but noble in form, and has been successfully adapted to modern harmonization.

The symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," by Saint-Saens, was a gem of harmony and melody and offered rare opportunities for fine string effects, the final pianissimo being specially well done.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was a grand ending to the programme. Mr. Franz Kneisel gave added beauty to the work by his artistic rendering of the viola solos throughout the four parts, which range from melancholy through happiness and joy, a march of the pilgrims singing the evening prayer, a serenade of a mountaineer and the orgy of the brigands. The work is full of beauty, of individuality, and requires an orchestra like the Symphony to bring forth its entire charm.

There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra left Boston last night for a series of concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The Beach Mass.

The mass in E flat, written by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and eagerly looked forward to by the friends of the composer and musicians and composers throughout the city, was given in Music Hall last evening by the Handel and Haydn Society and a famous list of talent, comprising Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Avles, alto; Mr. Italo] Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist, and an orchestra made up of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Franz Kneisel, principal—all under the leadership of Mr. Carl Zerrahn.

Speculation has been rife concerning the merits of the mass since the public received its first notification of its adoption—for the time being—by Mr. Zerrahn and the society whose musical taste he represents. Mrs. Beach's reputation as a thorough student of music had partially prepared the audience, but it was necessary to hear the work in order to fairly judge its merits. It is full of beauty, brilliancy and strength, and introduces equal opportunities for all the soloists, with a trio and several quartets. The chorus work is the principal feature and calls for thorough knowledge of vocal effects, for keenness of the ear and clear idea of the elements of that kind of composition. All these requisites are found in the members of the Handel and Haydn Society, whose excellent work has become a tradition.

The soloists were all admirable in every number, but Campanini's second solo, "Graduale," was the gem of the whole performance. He sang it superbly, with all the feeling and beauty which the words, "Blessed art thou, Virgin Mary," can express.

Beethoven's choral fantasie, introducing Mrs. Beach as pianist, and Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Col. T. F. Kingsbury, tenor, in connection with the other soloists, was an enjoyable addition to the programme. The appearance of Mrs. Beach was greeted with continued applause and several floral offerings bore testimony to the appreciation of her many friends.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. [illegible]

MONDAY, FEB. 8, 1892.

First Production of the Beach Mass at Music Hall.

The Work Received with Admiration on All Sides—A Grand Ovation Given Mrs. Beach—A Notable Triumph for a Woman Composer—The Choral Union Concert at Mechanics' Hall.

The second of the season's concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society, at Music Hall, last evening, made a most important event, from the fact of its being the occasion of the first production of the mass in E flat recently composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, heretofore more prominently known as a pianist of local fame, and the composer of songs and smaller pieces for the piano.

The action of the music committee of the society in selecting this work by a local composer is to be most highly commended, and it may be said at once that the results attending last evening's performance fully justified the action of the committee, and reflected high credit upon the composer and those taking part in the performance of the mass.

Mrs. Beach's decision in choosing to first test her skill in writing for the church service shows a worthy ambition, and the sincerity of her efforts commands respect and admiration. Mrs. Beach is the first of her sex to gain the honor shown her by the Handel and Haydn Society, and the first of the women composers of Boston to put before the public a work of such proportions as that of last evening's concert.

The Beach mass is a composition that is well worth the study of those who decry the ability of women in the field of music, and the evidences it gives of thorough musical training, genius in the line of composition, melodious ideas, skill in the development and elaboration of themes and command of the modern orchestra demand generous praise for its composer.

The several movements of the mass are very effectively assigned, and the use made of the quartet and chorus shows a rare degree of skill and good taste. The orchestral scoring commands high praise, for the modern instrumentation of the work has been made with much originality in the combinations, and with admirable judgment.

The forms followed are in the main those of the old Italian school, but these have been treated in modern style, and have all the charm of the latter day in their elaboration, with the tunefulness of the older composers. There are portions of the work which seem entirely beyond the ability of a writer of such limited experience as Mrs. Beach, and there is a bold, free style in other portions of the work which it is difficult to associate with a woman's hand. The "Quoniam" is an especial example of this latter characteristic, and this movement, with the following tenor solo, would not be discreditable to a veteran composer of the male sex. The setting of the "Credo" for soprano solo and chorus is a fine example of mass music of the best class, and the solo voice is used with charming effect throughout this movement. The "Benedictus," for bass solo and chorus, is still another strongly masculine effort, and the concluding "Agnus Dei" is worked out with a degree of skill and a masterly use of the quartet, chorus and orchestra that fairly electrified the audience.

The chorus of the society had the assistance of a most capable quartet of soloists in last evening's production of this work, the singers being Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass, the organ part being played as usual by Mr. B. J. Lang.

The solo voices proved finely suited to the numbers assigned them, and all the singers were in fine form. Mrs. Walker made an especially artistic success in the "Credo," and Mrs. Alves' singing in the "Laudamus" was another evidence of her rare gifts in interpreting this class of compositions. Mr. Campanini had a very grateful solo in the "Graduale," which he sung with splendid effect, and he met with equal success in the opening of the "Gloria." The "Benedictus" displayed the grand tones of Mr. Fischer's voice to eminent advantage, and the four voices of the quartet harmonized finely in all their work.

It was clearly evident that the chorus had given careful and extended study in their preparation for the performance, and, under the watchful guidance of their veteran leader, Carl Zerrahn, they sung the chorus numbers with splendid effect. Especially good work was done by the society in the "Kyrie," and in the "Qui Tollis," this latter number making the brilliant gem of the work.

The Beach mass was followed by a performance, the second in the society's record, of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" for piano, orchestra, sextet and chorus, the singers of the solo parts in the mass being assisted in the sextet by Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Col. I. F. Kingsbury, tenor, and the piano part being played by Mrs. Beach.

When Mrs. Beach entered the hall, leaning upon the arm of Secretary Stone, to take her place at the piano, she was greeted with rising honors, in which the chorus and audience generally joined, the ladies of the society waving their handkerchiefs, while the sterner sex made a more noisy demonstratration of their recognization of the triumph of the young composer. Mrs. Beach bowed her acknowledgments in her own gracious fashion, and was subsequently well nigh hidden from view by the offerings to her genius in the form of elaborate floral tributes. The familiar fantasia was given a delightful performance, in which Mrs. Beach's playing made an important factor, and the audience responded in the most enthusiastic fashion at its conclusion.

An announcement is made that the society will give a memorial performance of the "Messiah" on the evening of Wednesday, April 13, the 150th anniversary of its original production in Dublin by the composer. Mrs. Bishop and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney are already engaged as three of the soloists for this performance, which is outside the series named at the beginning of the season.

N. Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY.

Sonnabend, den 6. Februar 1892.

Das „Boston Symphony Orchestra“ gab ſein viertes Concert und ſpielte daſſelbe bis zur feinſten Ausdrucksfähigkeit, ſo daß die überraſchenden Klangeffecte und der hinreißende Geſammteindruck als ganz natürlich erſchienen. In dem vorletzten „Star Course“ Concert ließ ſich das bekannte Boſtoner „Kneiſel Quartett“ mit vielem Erfolge hören.

Der gegenwärtig in Amerika beſonderes Aufſehen erregende Pianiſt Paderewsky giebt hier am 24. Februar ein ſogenanntes „Farewell Recital“.

Ein Künſtler Quartett, beſtehend aus der Sängerin Mary Howe, der Violiniſtin Maud Powell, dem Sänger W. J. Lavin und dem wohlbekannten Pianiſten Franz Rummel, wird ſich am 1. März in Infantry Hall in einem großen Concert hören laſſen. Wir freuen uns beſonders, Herrn Rummel, welchen wir ſeit langer Zeit nicht gehört haben, hier in unſerem Concertſaal begrüßen zu können.

Unter den hieſigen muſikaliſchen Größen gebührt einem jungen Violiniſten entſchieden eine der erſten Stellungen. Es iſt dies Herr Felix Wendelſchäfer, ein Sohn des wohlbekannten New-Yorker Muſikers gleichen Namens. Der noch junge Geiger iſt der Kapellmeiſter des hieſigen ſehr guten „Opera House Orchestra“ und er hat eine ausgezeichnete muſikaliſche Bildung und eine umfaſſende Technik und Tonfülle auf ſeiner Geige. Das „Opera House Orchestra“ wird am 14. Februar unter ſeiner Leitung das erſte große Concert im Opera House geben.

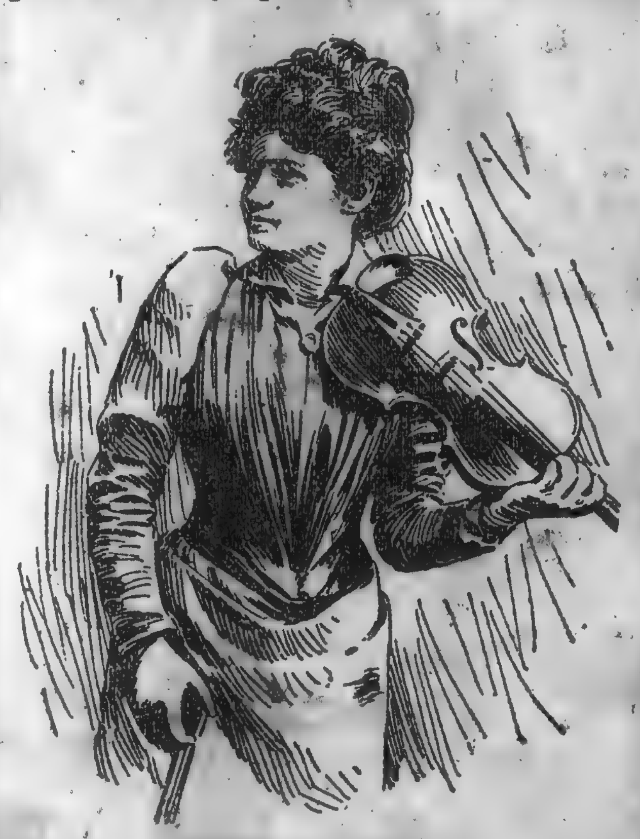
Herm. Mueller.

Times
Philadelphia
Feby 6

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

The Next Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

To-morrow night at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a programme filled with interesting numbers. Three are by modern composers, two are to be heard for the first time in Philadelphia and the symphony—Schumann's No. 3,



GERALDINE MORGAN.

the Rhenish, has not been played here for several seasons, although it is one that presents some of the most enjoyable tone pictures of this great composer. Its production in other cities this winter has been one of the special triumphs of this magnificent organization and its conductor. The solo attraction will be the young lady violinist, Miss Geraldine Morgan, who has just returned from Europe, where she has been studying for eight years with Joachim, and who was introduced to the musical public of Berlin and London by her distinguished teacher, who played with her the double Bach concerto. She makes her debut here in the D minor concerto of Max Bruch, which she was selected to play at the composer's concert in Berlin. The other orchestral numbers are Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, FEB. 8.

HANDEL AND HAYDN.

Great Success of the New Mass in E Flat Written by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach—Choral Fantasia of Beethoven.

Our great local musical organization, the Handel and Haydn Society, gave its second concert this season at Music Hall last evening, the performance being the 681st since its organization.

The occasion will always be remembered by musicians and friends of the society as a memorable event in the history of this famous organization, for the merits of a woman as a composer of importance was recognized, and a work was performed which for magnitude and beauty has probably never been surpassed by one of her sex, certainly not in this country.

The original production of the mass in E-flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach of this city was an occurrence of more than local interest, and in the immense audience gathered in honor of the event were many critics and lovers of music from other cities, drawn hither by the announcement of the evening's performance.

Mrs. Beach was fortunate in having such a company of experienced musicians to interpret her brilliant work. A trained chorus, an orchestra composed of Symphony men, Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist, and for a quartet, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Italio Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass. A better ensemble it would be difficult to find.

The mass is divided into 10 parts and was composed in 1889. The first number, introduced by the organ, is a simple theme which is soon taken up by the strings, and then the quartet and chorus are heard in "Lord have mercy." The movement following begins with the brasses, followed by a tenor solo and chorus, "Glory to God," accompanied by the full orchestra. The theme here is repeated several times on the horns and ends somewhat abruptly.

The trio, an alto solo, "We Praise Thee," in the third, is charmingly arranged, mainly for string and the wood-winds, and Mrs. Alves' rendition of the number was excellent. The harp is quite prominently introduced here. The strings open the fourth number, and the unaccompanied quartet, "Thou That Takest Away," was delightfully sung.

In the fifth the drums are first used, and the chorus swells in a grand volume of harmony. This number is finely orchestrated, and here the chorus did its best work of the evening in "Thou Alone Art Holy." The sopranos were a trifle off the key at first, but the defect was quickly remedied.

Campanini's solo, "Blessed Art Thou," was sung with great fervor and excellent shades of expression. He is an artist always, and the audience greeted him most heartily. In the seventh number Mrs Walker's beautiful, sympathetic voice was heard in the solo, "True God of True God." The orchestration of this piece is the most elaborate of the whole composition and shows much originality in treatment.

The quartet and chorus of "Holy Lord God of Sabaoth" in the eighth and "The Lamb of God" in the tenth were well sung. Mr. Fischer's bass solo, "Blessed is He," displayed his great artistic abilities, and he was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times.

Mrs. Beach has written a work of great beauty and force. The charm of the music lies in the simple treatment of many of the themes. The music is thoroughly in harmony with the scriptural subjects upon which it is based, and the choruses are grandly developed. With one or two exceptions there is but a slight attempt to utilize the organ, which, perhaps, was just as well in the present instance, for the location of the instrument in Music Hall does not greatly enhance its value as an orchestral adjunct.

Beethoven's choral fantasia closed the performance, the talented composer, Mrs. Beach, playing the piano score. When she appeared upon the platform she was greeted with plaudits long and loud, and it was some moments before she was able to begin her part of the work in the Beethoven number. The floral tributes were profuse and elegant.

In the fantasia Miss Priscilla White and Col. I. F. Kingsbury completed the sextet.

The "Messiah" will be given April 13, the 150th anniversary of its first production by Handel, in Dublin.

Boston Post.

MOTTO:
With a Mission
AND
Without a Muzzle.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1892.

The programme offered at Music Hall, Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was varied in nature, but proved to be an enjoyable one. By special request the Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major, given for the first time Dec. 26, was included in the programme. It is difficult and taxes the powers of the performers to their utmost, as great precision, clearness and delicacy of shading are necessary to a perfect rendition.

The prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim was a novelty. Mr. Nikisch has given us other compositions by this composer, but nothing that equals it. It is the first of a cycle of religious pieces, and was suggested to the composer by the chimes of a neighboring church, which disturbed his slumber on Easter Sunday morning. The theme springs from the two notes E and B, which reappear at the close of the prelude. The fugue is constructed with considerable skill, is severe but noble in form, and has been successfully adapted to modern harmonization.

The symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," by Saint-Saens, was a gem of harmony and melody and offered rare opportunities for fine string effects, the final pianissimo being specially well done.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was a grand ending to the programme. Mr. Franz Kneisel gave added beauty to the work by his artistic rendering of the viola solos throughout the four parts, which range from melancholy through happiness and joy, a march of the pilgrims singing the evening prayer, a serenade of a mountaineer and the orgy of the brigands. The work is full of beauty, of individuality, and requires an orchestra like the Symphony to bring forth its entire charm.

There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra left Boston last night for a series of concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

The Beach Mass.

The mass in E flat, written by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and eagerly looked forward to by the friends of the composer and musicians and composers throughout the city, was given in Music Hall last evening by the Handel and Haydn Society and a famous list of talent, comprising Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Avles, alto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor; Mr. Emil Fischer, bass; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist, and an orchestra made up of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Franz Kneisel, principal—all under the leadership of Mr. Carl Zerrahn.

Speculation has been rife concerning the merits of the mass since the public received its first notification of its adoption—for the time being—by Mr. Zerrahn and the society whose musical taste he represents. Mrs. Beach's reputation as a thorough student of music had partially prepared the audience, but it was necessary to hear the work in order to fairly judge its merits. It is full of beauty, brilliancy and strength, and introduces equal opportunities for all the soloists, with a trio and several quartets. The chorus work is the principal feature and calls for thorough knowledge of vocal effects, for keenness of the ear and clear idea of the elements of that kind of composition. All these requisites are found in the members of the Handel and Haydn Society, whose excellent work has become a tradition.

The soloists were all admirable in every number, but Campanini's second solo, "Graduale," was the gem of the whole performance. He sang it superbly, with all the feeling and beauty which the words, "Blessed art thou, Virgin Mary," can express.

Beethoven's choral fantasie, introducing Mrs. Beach as pianist, and Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Col. T. F. Kingsbury, tenor, in connection with the other soloists, was an enjoyable addition to the programme. The appearance of Mrs. Beach was greeted with continued applause and several floral offerings bore testimony to the appreciation of her many friends.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 39.

MONDAY, FEB. 8, 1892.

First Production of the Beach Mass at Music Hall.

The Work Received with Admiration on All Sides—A Grand Ovation Given Mrs. Beach—A Notable Triumph for a Woman Composer—The Choral Union Concert at Mechanics' Hall.

The second of the season's concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society, at Music Hall, last evening, made a most important event, from the fact of its being the occasion of the first production of the mass in E flat recently composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, heretofore more prominently known as a pianist of local fame, and the composer of songs and smaller pieces for the piano.

The action of the music committee of the society in selecting this work by a local composer is to be most highly commended, and it may be said at once that the results attending last evening's performance fully justified the action of the committee, and reflected high credit upon the composer and those taking part in the performance of the mass.

Mrs. Beach's decision in choosing to first test her skill in writing for the church service shows a worthy ambition, and the sincerity of her efforts commands respect and admiration. Mrs. Beach is the first of her sex to gain the honor shown her by the Handel and Haydn Society, and the first of the women composers of Boston to put before the public a work of such proportions as that of last evening's concert.

The Beach mass is a composition that is well worth the study of those who decry the ability of women in the field of music, and the evidences it gives of thorough musical training, genius in the line of composition, melodious ideas, skill in the development and elaboration of themes and command of the modern orchestra demand generous praise for its composer.

The several movements of the mass are very effectively assigned, and the use made of the quartet and chorus shows a rare degree of skill and good taste. The orchestral scoring commands high praise, for the modern instrumentation of the work has been made with much originality in the combinations, and with admirable judgment.

The forms followed are in the main those of the old Italian school, but these have been treated in modern style, and have all the charm of the latter day in their elaboration, with the tunefulness of the older composers. There are portions of the work which seem entirely beyond the ability of a writer of such limited experience as Mrs. Beach, and there is a bold, free style in other portions of the work which it is difficult to associate with a woman's hand. The "Quoniam" is an especial example of this latter charactoristic, and this movement, with the following tenor solo, would not be discreditable to a veteran composer of the male sex. The setting of the "Credo" for soprano solo and chorus is a fine example of mass music of the best class, and the solo voice is used with charming effect throughout this movement. The "Benedictus," for bass solo and chorus, is still another strongly masculine effort, and the concluding "Agnus Dei" is worked out with a degree of skill and a masterly use of the quartet, chorus and orchestra that fairly electrified the audience.

The chorus of the society had the assistance of a most capable quartet of soloists in last evening's production of this work, the singers being Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass, the organ part being played as usual by Mr. B. J. Lang.

The solo voices proved finely suited to the numbers assigned them, and all the singers were in fine form. Mrs. Walker made an especially artistic success in the "Credo," and Mrs. Alves' singing in the "Laudamus" was another evidence of her rare gifts in interpreting this class of compositions. Mr. Campanini had a very grateful solo in the "Graduale," which he sung with splendid effect, and he met with equal success in the opening of the "Gloria." The "Benedictus" displayed the grand tones of Mr. Fischer's voice to eminent advantage, and the four voices of the quartet harmonized finely in all their work.

It was clearly evident that the chorus had given careful and extended study in their preparation for the performance, and, under the watchful guidance of their veteran leader, Carl Zerrahn, they sung the chorus numbers with splendid effect. Especially good work was done by the society in the "Kyrie," and in the "Qui Tollis," this latter number making the brilliant gem of the work.

The Beach mass was followed by a performance, the second in the society's record, of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" for piano, orchestra, sextet and chorus, the singers of the solo parts in the mass being assisted in the sextet by Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Col. I. F. Kingsbury, tenor, and the piano part being played by Mrs. Beach.

When Mrs. Beach entered the hall, leaning upon the arm of Secretary Stone, to take her place at the piano, she was greeted with rising honors, in which the chorus and audience generally joined, the ladies of the society waving their handkerchiefs, while the sterner sex made a more noisy demonstratration of their recognization of the triumph of the young composer, Mrs. Beach bowed her acknowledgments in her own gracious fashion, and was subsequently well nigh hidden from view by the offerings to her genius in the form of elaborate floral tributes. The familiar fantasia was given a delightful performance, in which Mrs. Beach's playing made an important factor, and the audience responded in the most enthusiastic fashion at its conclusion.

An announcement is made that the society will give a memorial performance of the "Messiah" on the evening of Wednesday, April 13, the 150th anniversary of its original production in Dublin by the composer. Mrs. Bishop and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney are already engaged as three of the soloists for this performance, which is outside the series named at the beginning of the season.

N.-Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY.

Sonnabend, den 6. Februar 1892.

Das „Boston Symphony Orchestra“ gab ſein viertes Concert und ſpielte daſſelbe bis zur feinſten Ausdrucksfähigkeit, ſo daß die überraſchenden Klangeffecte und der hinreißende Geſammteindruck als ganz natürlich erſchienen. In dem vorletzten „Star Course“ Concert ließ ſich das bekannte Boſtoner „Kneiſel Quartett“ mit vielem Erfolge hören.

Der gegenwärtig in Amerika beſonderes Aufſehen erregende Pianiſt Paderewsky giebt hier am 24. Februar ein ſogenanntes „Farewell Recital“.

Ein Künſtler Quartett, beſtehend aus der Sängerin Mary Howe, der Violiniſtin Maud Powell, dem Sänger W. J. Lavin uud dem wohlbekannten Pianiſten Franz Rummel, wird ſich am 1. März in Infantry Hall in einem großen Concert hören laſſen. Wir freuen uns beſonders, Herrn Rummel, welchen wir ſeit langer Zeit nicht gehört haben, hier in unſerem Concertſaal begrüßen zu können.

Unter den hieſigen muſikaliſchen Größen gebührt einem jungen Violiniſten entſchieden eine der erſten Stellungen. Es iſt dies Herr Felix Wendelſchäfer, ein Sohn des wohlbekannten New-Yorker Muſikers gleichen Namens. Der noch junge Geiger iſt der Kapellmeiſter des hieſigen ſehr guten „Opera House Orchestra“ und er hat eine ausgezeichnete muſikaliſche Bildung und eine umfaſſende Technik und Tonfülle auf ſeiner Geige. Das „Opera House Orchestra“ wird am 14. Februar unter ſeiner Leitung das erſte große Concert im Opera House geben.

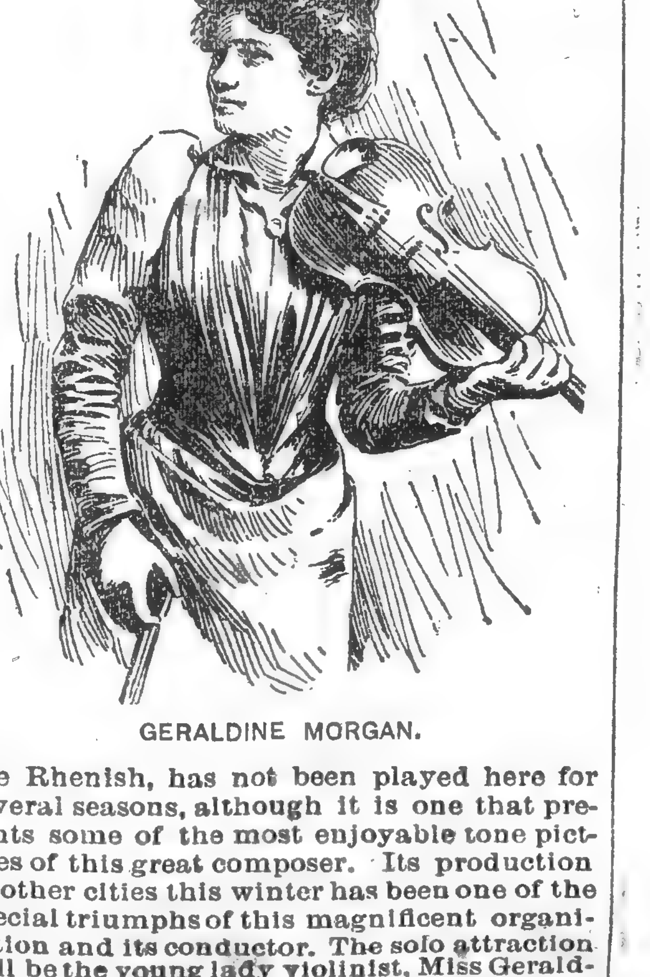
Herm. Mueller.

Times
Philadelphia
Feby 6

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

The Next Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

To-morrow night at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a programme filled with interesting numbers. Three are by modern composers, two are to be heard for the first time in Philadelphia and the symphony—Schumann's No. 3, the Rhenish, has not been played here for several seasons, although it is one that presents some of the most enjoyable tone pictures of this great composer. Its production in other cities this winter has been one of the special triumphs of this magnificent organization and its conductor. The solo attraction will be the young lady violinist, Miss Geraldine Morgan, who has just returned from Europe, where she has been studying for eight years with Joachim, and who was introduced to the musical public of Berlin and London by her distinguished teacher, who played with her the double Bach concerto. She makes her debut here in the D minor concerto of Max Bruch, which she was selected to play at the composer's concert in Berlin. The other orchestral numbers are Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.



GERALDINE MORGAN.

[120]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Handel: Concerto for strings and two wind bands, in F.
Floersheim: Prelude and Fugue.
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem; "Le rouet d' Omphale."
Berlioz: Symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie" (solo viola by Mr. Kneisel.)

Handel's concerto was well worth repeating; a work of such freshness, vitality and vigor is good for every one to listen to, even if it be in a by-gone style. No better tonic can be imagined; after the somewhat morbid strenuousness of much of our modern music, it came like a "Sunday in the country" to dwellers in stuffy streets.

It was rather hard on Mr. Floersheim's prelude and fugue to play it immediately after a work by such a master of fugual writing as Handel. It showed all the difference between free, natural, genial development and carefully laborious construction. It may be taken as a foregone conclusion that any composer today—with very few exceptions—who attempts to write a fully developed fugue will do himself more good by the exercise than he will any-one else. Modern fugues, as a rule, smell so terribly of the lamp, they are so blistered with sweat-drops from the writer's brow, that one is often in doubt whether they should properly be called musical compositions. But it can be said of Mr. Floersheim that he has, in this case, shown a noble ambition, and has, upon the whole, succeeded better in his task than was to be expected.

Still one could not but feel, with Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," that here was the way in which a composer of today naturally writes, when he gives his inventive fancy free flight, and does not attempt a tour de force. Handel and Bach could fly on fugual wings; modern composers can, for the most part, only painfully trudge along in fugual shackles. What a pretty, genial, fanciful conceit this "Rouet d'Omphale" is! It shows the best, perhaps the only good side of modern French music.

In respect to Berlioz's "Harold" symphony we would permit ourselves to recall a remark we made some years ago: we think it a great mistake to give the work even a semblance of being a viola concerto by having the solo viola part played standing. Mr. Kneisel's usual place, at the head of the first violins, would allow his playing to be seen quite plainly by the audience, and would give the viola part all needful prominence. The notion of having this part played standing seems to have come from the idea that the "Harold" symphony was written as a sort of viola concerto for Paganini. This, however, is not quite true; Paganini ordered a viola concerto of Berlioz, but it did not turn out as he expected. Berlioz showed Paganini the first movement, and the great violinist immediately cried out: "It is not what I want! I am silent too long in it; I must be playing all the time." Berlioz himself writes thus about the matter: "Recognizing that my plan could not suit him, I set to work to carry it out for another purpose, and without troubling myself any further about the means of giving prominence to the principal viola. It came into my head to write a series of scenes for orchestra, in which the solo viola should take part as a more or less active dramatis persona, but always preserving its own proper character. By placing the viola in the midst of the poetic memories I had kept of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, I wished to make it a sort of melancholy dreamer, like Byron's Childe Harold." We can see from this that, whatever intentions Berlioz may have had at first of treating the solo part as a viola concertante, he abandoned the idea after the first movement; and also that, even in the first movement, far less prominence was given to the part than could possibly suit a solo player like Paganini. Still it might be claimed that all this furnished no conclusive reason why Mr. Kneisel should not play the part standing. Our objections are wholly of a practical nature. There are some passages in which the viola part is so doubled by other instruments in the orchestra that its own tone is very much obscured; in these passages, if the player stands out in front of the orchestra, as if playing an actual solo, his prominent position on the stage leads one instinctively to try to catch every note that falls from his bow, and such concentration of the attention upon this single point distracts the listener from following the real development of the music.

But the symphony was wonderfully played! Mr. Kneisel infused more of poetic revery into Harold's soliloquies than heretofore, and played throughout with admirable expressiveness. His and Mr. Nikisch's handling of the tempo in the first movement was simply masterly, and showed us for the first time the true meaning of the music. The ineffably beautiful pilgrims' march, and the quaint Scherzo were given to perfection. Only in the Finale did we feel that something was lacking; a little more fury would have done it no harm.

The next programme (Feb. 20) is: Mozart, symphony in G minor; Raff, pianoforte concerto, in C minor, op. 185; Busoni, symphonic [illegible] Wagner, Huldigungsmarsch. Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

Music Hall: Handel & Haydn Society.

The Handel & Haydn Society gave the second concert of this, its seventy-seventh, season in the Music Hall last evening, assisted by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker (soprano), Mrs. Carl Alves (contralto), Mr. Italo Campanini (tenor), Mr. Emil Fischer (bass), and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (pianist.) Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was organist. The programme was as follows:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach—Mass in E-flat.
Beethoven—Choral Fantasia, Op. 80.

A full-fledged mass, for soles, chorus, orchestra and organ, by a young woman not many years out of her teens, is something of a rarity; the public performance of such a work by the largest and principal choral organization of a musical capital, assisted by solo talent of the very first water, is certainly no less uncommon. One is a little puzzled how to treat a work that comes forward under such unusual conditions; the routine of ordinary criticism is [illegible] upset by them. That the work shows [illegible] remarkable talent, seems unquestionable [illegible] a single hearing. A few [illegible] songs, or fugitive pianoforte [illegible] evidence of talent; a [illegible] there are [illegible] enough of [illegible] in the byways of musical history. Theodor Kirchner, for instance, began his career with a book of six songs which seemed to stamp him as a rising genius; but the genius somehow refused to rise, and he never wrote anything of real value afterwards. It became evident soon enough that the songs were fine by pure accident; if Kirchner had really known how to write a good song, he could have repeated the feat. But a whole mass is not written by accident, as a song may be. To write a series of ten, of ten largely developed, numbers for solos, chorus and orchestra, implies of itself a certain staying power. And when we think of the ambitious style in which this mass is written, of its variety in modulation, its frequently contrapuntal structure, our respect for the young composer grows apace. Mrs. Beach shows in it that she is by no means wholly at the mercy of her inspiration, but that she has already gone some way toward really mastering her own talent. Certainly her mastery is by no means complete; there are passages enough and to spare in the mass which were evidently written, not because she wanted to write them so, but because she did not know how to write them otherwise. But there are abundant other places where the musical intent is backed up by musical knowledge and skill. Another item in the work is the absence of melodic reminiscences; we do not remember being struck by a phrase in it that we seemed to have heard before. There is an abundance of naïve poetic sentiment in the music—not always of a purely devotional quality, it is true—and not a little that is strongly effective.

The performance was admirable; the chorus sang the not always easy music with firm aplomb and good attention to light and shade. Mr. Campanini sang gloriously in the Graduale; and was generally firm as a rock in the concerted numbers. Mr. Fischer was admirable, too, in these, if less satisfactory in his solo in the Benedictus, where his singing was a little rough and uncouth. Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Alves did excellent work in their respective parts.

Beethoven's Choral Fantasia is one of those works brimming over with beauty and healthy musical life, that when you hear them, after an interval of years, you wonder how you can have lived so long without them. The performance was for the most part excellent, the orchestra being the weakest featurd in it. Mrs. Beach, who was long and loudly applauded as she came upon the stage, played the pianoforte part admirably; with dignity in the slow introduction, with exquisite grace in the variations, and telling brilliancy in the closing movement. The sextet of solo voices left nothing to be desired.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, FEB. 11, 1892.

ATTRACTED LARGE AUDIENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Concert at Washington.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10.—The following programme was rendered by the Boston symphony orchestra tonight, when it gave the third in its annual series of concerts:

A Faust overture.......................Wagner
Aria, O love, aid thou me in my weakness, from Samson and Dalila..........Saint-Saens
Pilgrim's march (third movement), from the symphony, Harold in Italy..........Berlioz
Viola solo,
By Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Rondo Capriccioso for violin..........Saint-Saens

SONGS WITH PIANO.

Regrets.................................Delibes
Bonne Nuit..............................Massenet
A une Fiancee...........................Ferrari
Overture, scherzo and finale............Schumann

The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Miss Leonora von Stosch.

It was a representative Washington audience which greeted Conductor Nikisch and his musicians tonight, composed of senators and representatives, members of the cabinet, and of the diplomatic corps, all accompanied by ladies. The audience was the largest this season, many being turned away.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, FEB. 12.

SYMPHONY IN BALTIMORE.

Fourth Concert of the Series Given in a Crowded Hall.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy Concert Hall tonight, before an audience limited only by the size of the hall. Many were turned away unable to get seats.

The programme was as follows:

Overture, Freischuetz.......................Weber
Aria, O Love, aid thou me in my weakness, from Samson and Dalila...........Saint-Saens
Concerto for pianoforte in A major.........Liszt
Pilgrim's March, from Symphony Harold in Italy.....................Berlioz
Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Regrets..................................Delibes
Bonne Nuit...............................Massenet
A une Fiancee............................Ferrari
Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26.......Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato molto.
Bridal song, allegretto.
In the Garden, andante.
Dance, finale, allegro molto.

The soloists were Mrs. Julia L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister.

At the close of the concert the orchestra left for New York.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1892.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, violinist, played the only solo at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening. She was enthusiastically received.

The audience was the largest that has attended a Boston Symphony Concert this season. Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were beautifully played by the orchestra.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, FEB. 13, 1892.

ON THE WAY HOME.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn Last Night.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 12.—This afternoon in the Academy of Music the Boston symphony orchestra gave its fourth of this season's pub ic rehearsals, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. The programme was as follows:

Wagner.........................a Faust overture
Mozart..{a Page's Canzonetta / b Page's Aria......} from the Marriage of Figaro
Saint-Saens....Concerto for violoncello in A minor
Tschaikowsky..Andantino and scherzo (second and third movements), from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with piano{a Goldmark........Die Quelle / b Jensen.......Am Manzanares / c Brahms. Vergebliches Staendchen.
Beethoven...............Symphony No. 3, Heroic
Allegro con brio.
Adagio assai (Marcia funebre.)
Scherzo (Allegro vivace.)
Finale.

The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

This programme will be repeated at the concert Saturday evening. The orchestra will leave for Boston on the Long Island & Eastern States line at the close of the concert, arriving in Boston Sunday morning.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

The Mass in E flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was given its first production by the Handel and Hadyn Society last Sunday evening. Mrs. Beach is already known as a young musician of great promise as well as an excellent pianist, and much interest has been felt for this work.

It would be unfair to criticise this venturesome composition strictly according to the canons exemplified by the old masters. It is the work of a beginner, a very cultured, delightful beginner, one who has a freshness and individuality to express, and is determined to express it in her own way. It is essentially modern, almost Bostonian, and possesses besides a brilliancy and force that are bound to make it popular.

From a purely technical standpoint the Mass is a remarkable composition, and shows great study, knowledge and skill. The orchestration especially would seem to be the work of no novice. There is a broader treatment, and a far greater knowledge of orchestral effect and color than would seem possible. This quality, almost masculine in its character, pervades the whole work and compels attention and even admiration despite all other shortcomings.

Mrs. Beach loses sight at times, like many instrumental musicians, of the essential character of the human voice and is prone to treat it as an orchestral instrument. This tendency makes the solos rather less interesting than the choruses. A notable exception to this, however, is the Gratias agimus for the alto, accompanied by a 'cello obligato and strings con sordino.

The chorus Quoniam tu solus is especially pleasing, having a simple theme treated with simplicity and spirit. The quartet Sanctus is beautifully simple and was well sung. The Graduale, which does not appear in the published score, was most finely sung by Mr. Campanini and he was applauded uproariously. Mr. Fisher sang the Benedictus well and was somewhat heavy for the other soloists in concerted passages. Mrs. Alves and Mrs. Walker rendered their solos with good taste.

The chorus work was exceptionally fine, and it is unlikely the initial production of this composition of a young Boston woman could have been given under more favorable conditions.

THE EPOCH

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 12, 1892

* * * *

The concert of the Boston Orchestra on Tuesday night was again an occasion for thanksgiving upon the part of the few thousand New Yorkers who really care for the highest class of orchestral music. I am very sorry to say that we hear no such playing by any of our home organizations. We may hear it some day—perhaps Mr. Damrosch, who now has a permanent orchestra at his command, may give it to us, or perhaps Herr Seidl may find it possible to organize an orchestra of his own playing constantly and only under his bâton. I am glad that we can hear such playing, but sorry that we have to import an orchestra from Boston in order to get it.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2-7

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow evening the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Academy of Music. The soloist is Miss Geraldine Morgan, violiniste, who will then make her American debut. The program embraces Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat, Bach's concerto for violin, in D minor, Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak. Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Geraldine Morgan, Violinist.

The fourth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to be given to-morrow night at the Academy of Music. The soloist of the night will be Miss Geraldine Morgan, violinist. This will be her first appearance in this country. She was a pupil of Joachim, and made her Berlin and London debuts with her teacher. In these concerts she played with him Bach's double concerto. She will play here Bruch's concerto in D minor, a recent composition which she was selected to play by the composer in Berlin, and which will have its first hearing in Philadelphia at this concert.

The orchestra will play the Rhenish symphony of Schumann's, a work inspired by a first view of the beautiful cathedral at Cologne, where the composer witnessed the imposing ceremonial attending the enthronement of a cardinal. This latter impression, represented in the fourth or religioso movement, is a tone picture of a gorgeous and solemn scene.

Following this is the Bruch concerto, and then will be heard a recent work of Richard Strauss, his symphonic poem "Don Juan." This was recently played at one of the Boston concerts where it was received with much favor. The closing number of the programme are three Slavonic dances by the Bohemian composer, Dvorak.

Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 2/6

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of rare excellence for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to interpret at the Academy next Friday and Saturday, the fourth rehearsal and concert in the Brooklyn Philharmonic course. The growing interest in the superb work of this musical organization is one of the best evidences of its merit and excellence. The soloists will be Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, an accomplished artist, and Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the conductor, who gave up a promising career in grand opera in Germany to unite her fortunes with those of the noted leader. The programme includes the following list:

Wagner—"A Faust Overture."
Mozart—Page's Canzonetta and Page's song from "Marriage of Figaro."
Mrs. Arthur Nickish.
Saint Saens—Concerto for violoncello.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Tschaikowsky—Andante and Scherzo, second and third movements from Symphony in F minor.
a. Goldmark—"Die Qualle."
b. Jaensen—"Am Manzanares."
c. Brahms—"Vergebliches Standchen."
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica."

[illegible] York, N. Y. 2/10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

By all means the best orchestral concert which has been heard here this season, both in point of the intrinsic interest of the programme and the supreme excellence of its interpretation, was the one which was given in Chickering Hall last evening by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his incomparable symphony orchestra. The concert opened with Handel's wonderfully interesting concerto for strings and two wind choirs, which was a source of unqualified enjoyment to those who are not wholly given over to the sensuousness and intricacy of modern musical compositions of a similar form. The entire concerto was played in strict obedience to the character of the music and traditional requirements. The work of the strings was as near perfection as such playing can possibe, the work of the horns was excellent and the oboes mastered the extreme difficulties of the last movement with remarkable ease and precision. There are five movements in this concerto, of which the largo and the last allegro are particularly beautiful. It is replete with Handelian mannerisms, and the instrumentalism is frequently antiphonal in character, but it is full of a quaint charm and wonderfully beautiful in parts.

The symphony performed at this concert was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played with extraordinary skill and facility by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who infused into the entire work a large element of sentiment and poetic revery. The March of the Pilgrims, the Serenade of a Mountaineer and the frantic Orgy of the Brigands, with their striking contrasts and their marvellous beauties, were all given to perfection, and demonstrated more conclusively than anything else they have played here this year the unquestionable superiority of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra over any other in this country, or, as Mr. Paderewski affirms, in the world.

The remaining numbers were the overture to "Lohengrin" and selections from "Siegrried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter. While Mr. Nikisch's readings of Wagner may lack some of the fire and brilliancy which Mr. Seidl imparts to his, they are more scholarly and consistent, and technically are always more accurate.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Handel: Concerto for strings and two wind bands, in F.
Floersheim: Prelude and Fugue.
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem; "Le rouet d' Omphale."
Berlioz: Symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie" (solo viola by Mr. Kneisel.)

Handel's concerto was well worth repeating; a work of such freshness, vitality and vigor is good for every one to listen to, even if it be in a by-gone style. No better tonic can be imagined; after the somewhat morbid strenuousness of much of our modern music, it came like a "Sunday in the country" to dwellers in stuffy streets.

It was rather hard on Mr. Floersheim's prelude and fugue to play it immediately after a work by such a master of fugual writing as Handel. It showed all the difference between free, natural, genial development and carefully laborious construction. It may be taken as a foregone conclusion that any composer today—with very few exceptions—who attempts to write a fully developed fugue will do himself more good by the exercise than he will anyone else. Modern fugues, as a rule, smell so terribly of the lamp, they are so blistered with sweat-drops from the writer's brow, that one is often in doubt whether they should properly be called musical compositions. But it can be said of Mr. Floersheim that he has, in this case, shown a noble ambition, and has, upon the whole, succeeded better in his task than was to be expected.

Still one could not but feel, with Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," that here was the way in which a composer of today naturally writes, when he gives his inventive fancy free flight, and does not attempt a tour de force. Handel and Bach could fly on fugual wings; modern composers can, for the most part, only painfully trudge along in fugual shackles. What a pretty, genial, fanciful conceit this "Rouet d'Omphale" is! It shows the best, perhaps the only good side of modern French music.

In respect to Berlioz's "Harold" symphony we would permit ourselves to recall a remark we made some years ago: we think it a great mistake to give the work even a semblance of being a viola concerto by having the solo viola part played standing. Mr. Kneisel's usual place, at the head of the first violins, would allow his playing to be seen quite plainly by the audience, and would give the viola part all needful prominence. The notion of having this part played standing seems to have come from the idea that the "Harold" symphony was written as a sort of viola concerto for Paganini. This, however, is not quite true; Paganini ordered a viola concerto of Berlioz, but it did not turn out as he expected. Berlioz showed Paganini the first movement, and the great violinist immediately cried out: "It is not what I want! I am silent too long in it; I must be playing all the time." Berlioz himself writes thus about the matter: "Recognizing that my plan could not suit him, I set to work to carry it out for another purpose, and without troubling myself any further about the means of giving prominence to the principal viola. It came into my head to write a series of scenes for orchestra, in which the solo viola should take part as a more or less active dramatis persona, but always preserving its own proper character. By placing the viola in the midst of the poetic memories I had kept of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, I wished to make it a sort of melancholy dreamer, like Byron's Childe Harold." We can see from this that, whatever intentions Berlioz may have had at first of treating the solo part as a viola concertante, he abandoned the idea after the first movement; and also that, even in the first movement, far less prominence was given to the part than could possibly suit a solo player like Paganini. Still it might be claimed that all this furnished no conclusive reason why Mr. Kneisel should not play the part standing. Our objections are wholly of a practical nature. There are some passages in which the viola part is so doubled by other instruments in the orchestra that its own tone is very much obscured; in these passages, if the player stands out in front of the orchestra, as if playing an actual solo, his prominent position on the stage leads one instinctively to try to catch every note that falls from his bow, and such concentration of the attention upon this single point distracts the listener from following the real development of the music.

But the symphony was wonderfully played! Mr. Kneisel infused more of poetic revery into Harold's soliloquies than heretofore, and played throughout with admirable expressiveness. His and Mr. Nikisch's handling of the tempo in the first movement was simply masterly, and showed us for the first time the true meaning of the music. The ineffably beautiful pilgrims' march, and the quaint Scherzo were given to perfection. Only in the Finale did we feel that something was lacking; a little more fury would have done it no harm.

The next programme (Feb. 20) is: Mozart, symphony in G minor; Raff, pianoforte concerto, in C minor, op. 185; Busoni, symphonic [illegible] Wagner, Huldigungsmarsch. Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

Music Hall: Handel & Haydn Society.

The Handel & Haydn Society gave the second concert of this, its seventy-seventh, season in the Music Hall last evening, assisted by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker (soprano), Mrs. Carl Alves (contralto), Mr. Italo Campanini (tenor), Mr. Emil Fischer (bass), and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (pianist.) Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was organist. The programme was as follows:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach—Mass in E-flat.
Beethoven—Choral Fantasia, Op. 80.

A full-fledged mass, for soles, chorus, orchestra and organ, by a young woman not many years out of her teens, is something of a rarity; the public performance of such a work by the largest and principal choral organization of a musical capital, assisted by solo talent of the very first water, is certainly no less uncommon.

One is a little puzzled how to treat a work that comes forward under such unusual conditions; the routine of ordinary criticism is rather upset by them. That the work shows talent, even remarkable talent, seems unquestionable, even after a single hearing. A few short compositions—songs, or fugitive pianoforte pieces—give no sure evidence of talent; a [illegible] inspiration may come to almost anyone; there are examples enough of this in the byways of musical history. Theodor Kirchner, for instance, began his career with a book of six songs which seemed to stamp him as a rising genius; but the genius somehow refused to rise, and he never wrote anything of real value afterwards. It became evident soon enough that the songs were fine by pure accident; if Kirchner had really known how to write a good song, he could have repeated the feat. But a whole mass is not written by accident, as a song may be. To write a series of ten, of ten largely developed, numbers for solos, chorus and orchestra, implies of itself a certain staying power. And when we think of the ambitious style in which this mass is written, of its variety in modulation, its frequently contrapuntal structure, our respect for the young composer grows apace. Mrs. Beach shows in it that she is by no means wholly at the mercy of her inspiration, but that she has already gone some way toward really mastering her own talent. Certainly her mastery is by no means complete; there are passages enough and to spare in the mass which were evidently written, not because she wanted to write them so, but because she did not know how to write them otherwise. But there are abundant other places where the musical intent is backed up by musical knowledge and skill. Another item in the work is the absence of melodic reminiscences; we do not remember being struck by a phrase in it that we seemed to have heard before. There is an abundance of naïve poetic sentiment in the music—not always of a purely devotional quality, it is true—and not a little that is strongly effective.

The performance was admirable; the chorus sang the not always easy music with firm aplomb and good attention to light and shade. Mr. Campanini sang gloriously in the Graduale; and was generally firm as a rock in the concerted numbers. Mr. Fischer was admirable, too, in these, if less satisfactory in his solo in the Benedictus, where his singing was a little rough and uncouth. Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Alves did excellent work in their respective parts.

Beethoven's Choral Fantasia is one of those works brimming over with beauty and healthy musical life, that when you hear them, after an interval of years, you wonder how you can have lived so long without them. The performance was for the most part excellent, the orchestra being the weakest feature in it. Mrs. Beach, who was long and loudly applauded as she came upon the stage, played the pianoforte part admirably; with dignity in the slow introduction, with exquisite grace in the variations, and telling brilliancy in the closing movement. The sextet of solo voices left nothing to be desired.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, FEB. 11, 1892.

ATTRACTED LARGE AUDIENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Concert at Washington.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10.—The following programme was rendered by the Boston symphony orchestra tonight, when it gave the third in its annual series of concerts:

A Faust overture	Wagner
Aria, O love, aid thou me in my weakness, from Samson and Dalila	Saint-Saens
Pilgrim's march (third movement), from the symphony, Harold in Italy	Berlioz
Viola solo, By Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Rondo Capriccioso for violin	Saint-Saens
SONGS WITH PIANO.
Regrets	Delibes
Bonne Nuit	Massenet
A une Fiancee	Ferrari
Overture, scherzo and finale	Schumann

The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Miss Leonora von Stosch.

It was a representative Washington audience which greeted Conductor Nikisch and his musicians tonight, composed of senators and representatives, members of the cabinet, and of the diplomatic corps, all accompanied by ladies. The audience was the largest this season, many being turned away.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, FEB. 12.

SYMPHONY IN BALTIMORE.

Fourth Concert of the Series Given in a Crowded Hall.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 11.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy Concert Hall tonight, before an audience limited only by the size of the hall. Many were turned away unable to get seats.

The programme was as follows:

Overture, Freischuetz	Weber
Aria, O Love, aid thou me in my weakness, from Samson and Dalila	Saint-Saens
Concerto for pianoforte in A major	Liszt
Pilgrim's March, from Symphony Harold in Italy	Berlioz
Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Regrets	Delibes
Bonne Nuit	Massenet
A une Fiancee	Ferrari
Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26	Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato molto.
Bridal song, allegretto.
In the Garden, andante.
Dance, finale, allegro molto.

The soloists were Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister.

At the close of the concert the orchestra left for New York.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1892.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, violinist, played the only solo at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening. She was enthusiastically received.

The audience was the largest that has attended a Boston Symphony Concert this season. Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were beautifully played by the orchestra.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, FEB. 13, 1892.

ON THE WAY HOME.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn Last Night.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 12.—This afternoon in the Academy of Music the Boston symphony orchestra gave its fourth of this season's public rehearsals, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. The programme was as follows:

Wagner	A Faust overture
Mozart { a Page's Canzonetta b Page's Aria }	from the Marriage of Figaro
Saint-Saens	Concerto for violoncello in A minor
Tschaikowsky	Andantino and scherzo (second and third movements), from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with piano	a Goldmark ... Die Quelle b Jensen ... Am Manzanares c Brahms. Vergebliches Staendchen.
Beethoven	Symphony No. 3, Heroic
	Allegro con brio.
	Adagio assai (Marcia funebre.)
	Scherzo (Allegro vivace.)
	Finale.

The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

This programme will be repeated at the concert Saturday evening. The orchestra will leave for Boston on the Long Island & Eastern States line at the close of the concert, arriving in Boston Sunday morning.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

The Mass in E flat by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was given its first production by the Handel and Hadyn Society last Sunday evening. Mrs. Beach is already known as a young musician of great promise as well as an excellent pianist, and much interest has been felt for this work.

It would be unfair to criticise this venturesome composition strictly according to the canons exemplified by the old masters. It is the work of a beginner, a very cultured, delightful beginner, one who has a freshness and individuality to express, and is determined to express it in her own way. It is essentially modern, almost Bostonian, and possesses besides a brilliancy and force that are bound to make it popular.

From a purely technical standpoint the Mass is a remarkable composition, and shows great study, knowledge and skill. The orchestration especially would seem to be the work of no novice. There is a broader treatment, and a far greater knowledge of orchestral effect and color than would seem possible. This quality, almost masculine in its character, pervades the whole work and compels attention and even admiration despite all other shortcomings.

Mrs. Beach loses sight at times, like many instrumental musicians, of the essential character of the human voice and is prone to treat it as an orchestral instrument. This tendency makes the solos rather less interesting than the choruses. A notable exception to this, however, is the Gratias agimus for the alto, accompanied by a 'cello obligato and strings con sordino.

The chorus Quoniam tu solus is especially pleasing, having a simple theme treated with simplicity and spirit. The quartet Sanctus is beautifully simple and was well sung. The Graduale, which does not appear in the published score, was most finely sung by Mr. Campanini and he was applauded uproariously. Mr. Fisher sang the Benedictus well and was somewhat heavy for the other soloists in concerted passages. Mrs. Alves and Mrs. Walker rendered their solos with good taste.

The chorus work was exceptionally fine, and it is unlikely the initial production of this composition of a young Boston woman could have been given under more favorable conditions.

THE EPOCH

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 12, 1892

* * * *

The concert of the Boston Orchestra on Tuesday night was again an occasion for thanksgiving upon the part of the few thousand New Yorkers who really care for the highest class of orchestral music. I am very sorry to say that we hear no such playing by any of our home organizations. We may hear it some day—perhaps Mr. Damrosch, who now has a permanent orchestra at his command, may give it to us, or perhaps Herr Seidl may find it possible to organize an orchestra of his own playing constantly and only under his bâton. I am glad that we can hear such playing, but sorry that we have to import an orchestra from Boston in order to get it.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2-7

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow evening the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Academy of Music. The soloist is Miss Geraldine Morgan, violiniste, who will then make her American debut. The program embraces Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat, Bach's concerto for violin, in D minor, Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak. Seats at 1119 Chestnut street.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2-7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Geraldine Morgan, Violinist.

The fourth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to be given to-morrow night at the Academy of Music. The soloist of the night will be Miss Geraldine Morgan, violinist. This will be her first appearance in this country. She was a pupil of Joachim, and made her Berlin and London debuts with her teacher. In these concerts she played with him Bach's double concerto. She will play here Bruch's concerto in D minor, a recent composition which she was selected to play by the composer in Berlin, and which will have its first hearing in Philadelphia at this concert.

The orchestra will play the Rhenish symphony of Schumann's, a work inspired by a first view of the beautiful cathedral at Cologne, where the composer witnessed the imposing ceremonial attending the enthronement of a cardinal. This latter impression, represented in the fourth or religioso movement, is a tone picture of a gorgeous and solemn scene.

Following this is the Bruch concerto, and then will be heard a recent work of Richard Strauss, his symphonic poem "Don Juan." This was recently played at one of the Boston concerts where it was received with much favor. The closing number of the programme are three Slavonic dances by the Bohemian composer, Dvorak.

Date 2/6

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of rare excellence for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to interpret at the Academy next Friday and Saturday, the fourth rehearsal and concert in the Brooklyn Philharmonic course. The growing interest in the superb work of this musical organization is one of the best evidences of its merit and excellence. The soloists will be Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, an accomplished artist, and Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the conductor, who gave up a promising career in grand opera in Germany to unite her fortunes with those of the noted leader. The programme includes the following list:

Wagner—"A Faust Overture."
Mozart—Page's Canzonetta and Page's song from "Marriage of Figaro,"
Mrs. Arthur Nickish.
Saint Saens—Concerto for violoncello.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Tschaikowsky—Andante and Scherzo, second and third movements from Symphony in F minor.
a. Goldmark—"Die Qualle."
b. Jaensen—"Am Manzanares."
c. Brahms—"Vergebliches Standchen."
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat, "Eroica."

2/10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

By all means the best orchestral concert which has been heard here this season, both in point of the intrinsic interest of the programme and the supreme excellence of its interpretation, was the one which was given in Chickering Hall last evening by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his incomparable symphony orchestra. The concert opened with Handel's wonderfully interesting concerto for strings and two wind choirs, which was a source of unqualified enjoyment to those who are not wholly given over to the sensuousness and intricacy of modern musical compositions of a similar form. The entire concerto was played in strict obedience to the character of the music and traditional requirements. The work of the strings was as near perfection as such playing can possibly be, the work of the horns was excellent and the oboes mastered the extreme difficulties of the last movement with remarkable ease and precision. There are five movements in this concerto, of which the largo and the last allegro are particularly beautiful. It is replete with Handelian mannerisms, and the instrumentalism is frequently antiphonal in character, but it is full of a quaint charm and wonderfully beautiful in parts.

The symphony performed at this concert was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played with extraordinary skill and facility by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who infused into the entire work a large element of sentiment and poetic revery. The March of the Pilgrims, the Serenade of a Mountaineer and the frantic Orgy of the Brigands, with their striking contrasts and their marvellous beauties, were all given to perfection, and demonstrated more conclusively than anything else they have played here this year the unquestionable superiority of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra over any other in this country, or, as Mr. Paderewski affirms, in the world.

The remaining numbers were the overture to "Lohengrin" and selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter. While Mr. Nikisch's readings of Wagner may lack some of the fire and brilliancy which Mr. Seidl imparts to his, they are more scholarly and consistent, and technically are always more accurate.

[illegible] UARY 8, 1892

[illegible] Handel and Haydn's Society's Concert.

The programme of the concert given by the Handel and Haydn Society at Music Hall, last evening, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, embraced the "Mass," composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the Choral Fantasie of Beethoven.

The soloists were Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Campanini and Mr. Emil Fisher. Mr. Kneisel led an orchestra composed of members of the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Lang was the organist.

The event of the evening was the first production of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's "Mass." Mrs. Beach, whose name is familiar to our readers as a pianist of marked ability, has every reason to be gratified with the "Mass" or her undertaking. The mass is the largest composition that any lady composer has yet presented to our audiences, and shows the possession of knowledge and considerable skill in displaying the gift. That there are any startling points or great ideas in the work, I don't think can be claimed with justice. It is, however, carefully thought out, easy of performance, with only a few places where ultra-chromatic modulations appear, and simply but correctly scored. There is not much counterpoint in the vocal score, homophony being the element of construction mostly used, with contrasts in the simple form of imitations.

The accompaniment is set off against the vocal score with more or less freedom in the treatment and with happy effect. The chorus did their work with enthusiasm, singing their numbers as if they enjoyed the task, while the solos fell into good hands. Mrs. Walker sang in her best style, furnishing further evidence that she is our best oratorio soprano by far. Mrs. Alves, who has sung in Boston before in a superb manner, did not do as well with the "Gratias agimus" as she might have done had she sustained the endings of the phrases, which almost constantly sang down from waste of breath. She was probably nervous, a misfortune that often overtakes good singers and handicaps their efforts for the time being.

Campanini showed that he was an old and tried artist in all that he did, but he rasped his voice constantly, and there was hardly one mellifluous tone heard in it during his whole performance. He always did force his voice even in his palmiest days, but then there was some freshness to somewhat mollify the harshness consequent upon such voice-production. Mr. Fisher's voice is less musical in quality then, when he has formerly appeared here and he sang with a coarseness of tone that imparted little blessedness to the "Benedictus" he offered. Mr. Lang, with his usual skill, did all that can be done with an organ located near the roof of the hall and in a temperature that forbids keeping it in accord with instruments so far below that altitude.

It is disgraceful that great choral performances should be so bereft of proper organ facilities. Some day the public will demand better organ arrangements than now exist in Music Hall, but that will be when the public is more highly cultivated than now. A love of good organ music and an interested support of the same is one of the evidences of the highest musical culture of a community. It would not cost much to place the present organ in the Music Hall at the back of the stage, and the owners of the building should see that it is done. It is a public demand that should be recognized. As it is at present the discrepancy of pitch between the organ and orchestra is shocking to any sensitive ear. Beethoven's Choral Fantisie followed the "Mass," and when Mrs. Beach appeared to play the piano solo part she was rapturously applauded by both the audience and the chorus.

There is nothing of interest either in the work itself or its performance last evening, to call for comment. On the evening of April 13th the society will give a performance of the "Messiah," in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its production by Handel in Dublin. On Good Friday evening, April 15, the St. Matthew Passion of Bach will be produced, and on Easter Sunday, April 17, "The Creation" of Haydn will be given. Quite an army of eminent soloists will assist at these performances.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The only novelty on the programme, Saturday night, was the "Prelude and Fugue" by Otto Floersheim, whose compositions have been heard before in these concerts. They are the work of a skilful musician who has a good command of modern orchestral effects as well as the possession of spontaneity. The "Prelude and Fugue" is an interesting number, although the Fugue is not carried out in the strictly fugal style, the elaborate instrumentation perhaps serving somewhat to hide its development. The composition, however, is one of fine musicianship and effective orchestral writing, and the most pretentious that Mr. Floersheim has yet given us.

It was played in a heavy, cumbersome manner by the orchestra, which, generally speaking, did quite fairly with its work during the whole programme. [illegible]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1892.

Fourth Symphony Society Concert.

THE fourth Symphony Society concert took place last Saturday night at the new Music Hall, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Walter Damrosch conducting. The program—not a startlingly novel one—was this :

Symphony No. 8, in F .... Beethoven
Concerto No. 3, for violin with orchestra .... Bruch
(New ; first time in New York.)
Allegro energico. Adagio. Allegro molto.
Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Overture to "Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner
Air, "Sweet Bird," from "L'Allegro ed Il Penseroso" .... Händel
(With flute obligato.)
Miss Clementine De Vere.
Symphonic poem, "Die Hunnenschlacht" .... Liszt

The Beethoven symphony received a perfectly respectable and, as to tempi, traditional reading. The Wagner overture was smoothly, too smoothly played for dramatic contrasts or climacteric effects. Liszt's patent constructed and wholly mechanical symphonic poem was brilliantly given, and was like all of his works, bleak, ugly and yet charming in spots. As a picture it just as readily suggests Miss Maggie Cline's epical fracas with the clan of the McCluskeys as Kaulbach's famous fiasco. So much for program music of its ilk. The novelty of the concert was the appearance of Miss Geraldine Morgan, a Californian by birth, her father being the well-known John P. Morgan, now deceased, but at one time an organist at Trinity Church. Miss Morgan's mother is the well-known translator of Rubinstein's new book, Kullak's "Art of Touch" and kindred works.

The young lady has been in Germany for twelve years and has enjoyed the benefit of the great Joachim's instruction. She has a small but penetrating musical tone, her intonation not being always true, plays with vivacity, intelligence and in a well schooled manner, but was overweighted by the new Bruch concerto, the first movement in particular taxing her strength too much. The composition itself, the third of the concertos for violin, is in D minor, and is an agreeable but not very original work, containing echoes of Mendelssohn and Bruch's other concertos. Its orchestration is modern and well made, but the raison d'être of the composition, particularly after its composer's first G minor concerto, is difficult to discover. Miss De Vere, barring an unfortunate entrance in the recitative to Händel's well worn aria at the rehearsal, sang with her usual facility and purity. The slip was probably owing to a misunderstanding with Mr. Damrosch.

The fifth concert of the series takes place March 5. Franz Rummel will be the soloist.

The Nikisch Recital.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch has recovered from her recent indisposition, but, to make her appearance in New York the more certain, her recital announced for last Monday at Chickering Hall has been postponed until next Monday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Home.

IF there be those in this city who believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra put forth their very best efforts only when they play in New York, and that for that reason they outshine our local orchestras, let them do as the writer did last week ; let them take a short trip to the Hub of the Universe, and attend one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at their own home, the Boston Music Hall, and they will readily be convinced that there is no better orchestral playing to be heard anywhere in this wide United States. Such at least was again the impression the writer received last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when he attended the fifteenth public rehearsal and concert of that organization, and for which Mr. Nikisch had arranged an exceedingly interesting—particularly so for the writer—and purely orchestral program.

The concert opened with a concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs by Händel. It was repeated on this occasion by special request, and we must confess that, although we are not as carried away by Händel's genius as some of his English admirers are, this concerto is so charming and at times so fresh, especially in harmonies, that it can easily carry away even the most blasé of modern audience. As it was to have been played also last night in New York, we venture to predict that it will in no less degree delight our metropolitan public than it did the vast Boston audiences who enthusiastically applauded each of the five movements of the concerto on the aforementioned occasions. The work of the two oboe players was especially admirable in the last movement, and the strings, flute and horns did beautiful work throughout.

Saint-Saëns' charming symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," exquisitely played, was also much applauded, and hardly less so was Berlioz's best symphonic work, his "Harold in Italy," which was also on last night's New York program. It received loving and most intelligent treatment at Mr. Nikisch's hands, and Concertmaster Franz Kneisel's playing of the viola solo part was simply admirable, pure throughout in intonation and beautiful in tone quality.

The only novelty (as far as Boston was concerned) on the program was the writer's "Prelude and Fugue" for orchestra. About the work the program gives the following explanatory notes :

> The "Concert Prelude and Fugue" is the first of a cycle of religious pieces, of which the "Elevation" has been heard and admired here before. The "Concert Prelude and Fugue," although absolute and not program music in the accepted sense of that much abused word, has a little history. The composer wishes it understood that he owes the inspiration which gave birth to the work to the fact of being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded the two notes E and B in a descending fourth, and their continued regularity almost unconsciously set his mind to harmonizing them.
>
> When the chimes cease a broad and noble theme of great religious fervency springs up in his imagination and is developed to a climax of much force and sonority, after which the chimes again break into his inspiration and thus bring the prelude to a close. But the religious theme reappears and takes possession so completely of the composer's soul that now he sets to work to mold it into the severest but also noblest of forms—that of the fugue. While in the prelude it was heard in broad 6-4 time, the fugue is constructed on the same theme in 4-4 time, and in the somewhat uncommon diction of a five bar phrase.
>
> The fugue itself is constructed with considerable skill, and is developed at some length in almost religiously strict style. The attempt, however, is made, and not unsuccessfully, of clothing the old form with modern harmonization and the glorious garb of the modern orchestra. The effect is a novel and a most pleasing one. The "Concert Prelude and Fugue" is in the key of E major, was composed on Easter Sunday, 1883, and is dedicated to Theodore Thomas, by whom it was produced for the first time at Steinway Hall, New York city, in the same year.

Whatever success the work achieved at both performances the writer places chiefly to the credit of the most careful and in every way most satisfying manner in which it was played by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra of artists and gentlemen. It is therefore with particular pleasure that the composer pens these few and insufficient lines of thanks.

At the hands of his Boston confrères of the press he also received the fairest and most generous treatment, for which he also acknowledges gratitude and an admiration for their unanimity of opinion, which is certainly strange among so many doctors.

O. F.

Mrs. Beach's Mass.

MUSIC HALL, Boston, was filled to the brim on Sunday evening, the occasion being the 681st concert by the Händel and Haydn Society. Much interest was felt in the initial production of a new work, mass in E flat, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The society had the assistance of Mrs. Jennie Patrick-Walker, soprano ; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto ; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass. Mrs. Beach has been well known as a pianist for some time and now she comes before us as a composer also. Her mass contains much which evinces a fine musical intelligence and feeling ; experience, however, will surely enable her to put before others her ideas in a more impressive manner, for her orchestration is often weak and tiresome. As a consequence a good theme is often handicapped by poor treatment.

The "Laudamus te" is especially beautiful, and on this occasion the alto solo was admirably sung. Too frequent usage of the horns is noticeable throughout the work. The mass as a whole, however, does much credit to the composer. The society, under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn, sang in a most effective manner, the attacks were well taken, the intonation accurate and the light and shades of expression clearly defined. The mass was followed by Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, this being its second production by the Händel and Haydn Society. As usual, Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

---

pping from Herald Washington D. C.

e 2/7

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

Its Third Concert Here This Season to Be Unusually Attractive.

On Wednesday next the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Washington season at the Congregational Church. In solo attractions this concert is unusually rich and consequently the programme is of more varied interest than ordinarily characterizes those given by this peerless organization. The public will welcome this, especially as it affords the opportunity of hearing a Washington girl, Miss Leonora Von Stosch, under circumstances so favorable and which will enable her to display her art to the best advantage. Much has been said and written about this charming young violinist, her studies and triumphs abroad, and her successful appearances since her return. The other soloists are Mr. Kneisel, concert meister of the orchestra, and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, one of our most celebrated contraltos. She has been heard before in Washington and will meet with a warm reception. The following is the programme: Wagner, A Faust Overture. Saint-Saens, Aria from "Samson and Delilah," Mrs. Julie L. Wyman. Berlioz, Pilgrim's March from Symphony "Harold in Italy," viola solo, by Mr. Kneisel. Saint Saens, Rondo Capriccioso for violin, Miss Leonora Von Stosch. a Delibes, "Regrets;" b Massenet, "Bonne Nuit;" c Ferrari, "A Un Fiancee," Mrs. Julie L. Wyman. Schumann, Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op 52.

---

pping from

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

ate 2/12

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Julia L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Julia L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister as soloists, gave the third concert of their series at the Academy Concert Hall last night. The work of this excellent organization is perfection itself, and their coming is always eagerly looked forward to by lovers of good music, as was demonstrated by the large audience which filled the hall last night.

The first number rendered, the overture from "Freischutz," by Weber, calls for no description, as it is popular and familiar. The orchestra interpreted the simple German ideas of the composer with fine effect, from the opening horn quartette—which was played clean and in tune—to the finish. Mrs. Wyman, who has a fine contralto voice of remarkable range, sang in a faultless manner the aria from Saint Saens' "Samson and Delila," "O, Love, Aid Thou Me in My Weakness." She also sang three songs by Delibes, Masseneh and Ferrari, with piano accompaniment.

Liszt's concerto in A major was played by Mr. Burmeister, who received an ovation after a masterly rendition of that number. It is one of the composer's best works, and rarely heard here with orchestral accompaniment. The 'cello obligato in the second adgio movement is one of the incidents showing the composer's skill as a master of orchestral resources.

The "Pilgrims' March," from Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy," the fourth number on the programme, was given as if with inspiration, especially the viola solo, which was played by Franz Kneisel, who carries a motif by harmonies through almost the entire selection. Berlioz is noted for the phenominal technicality introduced into his works and his acute knowledge of instrumentation and the compass of each individual instrument.

The counter work of the basses and harp at the beginning and end is one of his many experiments in orchestral coloring.

The concluding number was Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Wedding March," which the orchestra gave in a most realistic manner.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 2/7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be with us this week and will give a concert in Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening and the regular Philharmonic public rehearsal in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It is a pity that these Brooklyn affairs come in conflict with the fourth rehearsal and concert of the New-York Philharmonic Societys for which an extremely interesting programme has been set up consisting of Liszt's "Prometheus," Bruch's third violin concerto (to be played by Mme. Camilla Urso), Wagner's "Faust" overture and the original version of Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which will be played on this occasion for the first time in America.

The chamber music concerts referred to are those of the Symphony Quartet, postponed from last Sunday, at the Chamber Music Hall this afternoon, of the Schmidt-Herbert Quartet, in Hardman Hall, on Thursday evening, and of the Kneisel Quartet, in Chamber Music Hall, on Friday evening. The opera at the Metropolitan Opera House this week will be "Lohengrin" on Monday, Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" in French on Wednesday, "Don Giovanni," for the last time on Friday and "Romeo et Juliette," also in French, on Saturday afternoon.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/6

Miss Geraldine Morgan, the violiniste, who is to make her American début at the Boston Symphony Concert next Monday evening, was taught successively by Dr. Damrosch, of New York; Schradick, of Leipsic, and Joachim, of Berlin. She has appeared in several European capitals, and is credited with notable successes in the line of art which she has studied under such favorable auspices. At the coming concert she will be the soloist in a new Bruch concerto (No. 3), and will also play a B minor romanza by Joachim, and Hungarian dances by Brahms. The orchestra is to give Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony (No. 3 in E flat), Richard Strauss's symphonic poem of "Don Juan," and Slavonic Dances by Dvorak. It is said of Strauss's work that it was suggested by a weird poem of Nicolaus Lenaus, and had its first performance about two years ago at Weimar. Mr. Nikisch placed it on his Boston programme last October.

---

pping from

[illegible]

e 2-6

—The fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening next. The programme, which we have already published, includes a symphony of Schumann's and other music of the highest grade. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young American violinist, who will make her Philadelphia debut on this occasion and concerning whom much interest has been expressed.

—The subsequent representations of the Metropolitan Opera at the Academy of Music will be as follows: Thursday evening next, Gounod's Romeo and Juliet, with Miss Eames and M. Jean de Reszke; February 16, a double programme—Gluck's Orpheus, and Cavalleria Rusticana, with the Ravogli sisters, Miss Eames, and Sig. Valero; and February 18, Mignon, with Mlle. Van Zandt, Mme. Lehman, and Mme. Scalchi. It is especially desired on Thursday evening that the audience shall be prompt in attendance, as the usually omitted Prologue will be sung.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The advance sale of tickets for next Tuesday's concert bids fair to excel in amount the entire gross receipts at the last concert here. The box office sale will probably carry the total figures up to nearly $1000. Any young man who intends taking his "best girl" to this concert and has not yet secured his seat will do well not to put it off any longer. Desirable tickets will be worth a premium before next Tuesday night.

[122]

DAILY TRAVELLER
FEBRUARY 8. 1892

The Handel and Haydn's Society's Concert.

The programme of the concert given by the Handel and Haydn Society at Music Hall, last evening, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, embraced the "Mass," composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the Choral Fantasie of Beethoven.

The soloists were Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Campanini and Mr. Emil Fisher. Mr. Kneisel led an orchestra composed of members of the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Lang was the organist.

The event of the evening was the first production of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's "Mass." Mrs. Beach, whose name is familiar to our readers as a pianist of marked ability, has every reason to be gratified with the "Mass" of her undertaking. The mass is the largest composition that any lady composer has yet presented to our audiences, and shows the possession of knowledge and considerable skill in displaying the gift. That there are any startling points or great ideas in the work, I don't think can be claimed with justice. It is, however, carefully thought out, easy of performance, with only a few places where ultra-chromatic modulations appear, and simply but correctly scored. There is not much counterpoint in the vocal score, homophony being the element of construction mostly used, with contrasts in the simple form of imitations.

The accompaniment is set off against the vocal score with more or less freedom in the treatment and with happy effect. The chorus did their work with enthusiasm, singing their numbers as if they enjoyed the task, while the solos fell into good hands. Mrs. Walker sang in her best style, furnishing further evidence that she is our best oratorio soprano by far. Mrs. Alves, who has sung in Boston before in a superb manner, did not do as well with the "Gratias agimus" as she might have done had she sustained the endings of the phrases, which almost constantly sang down from waste of breath. She was probably nervous, a misfortune that often overtakes good singers and handicaps their efforts for the time being.

Campanini showed that he was an old and tried artist in all that he did, but he rasped his voice constantly, and there was hardly one mellifluous tone heard in it during his whole performance. He always did force his voice even in his palmiest days, but then there was some freshness to somewhat mollify the harshness consequent upon such voice-production. Mr. Fisher's voice is less musical in quality then when he has formerly appeared here and he sang with a coarseness of tone that imparted little blessedness to the "Benedictus" he offered. Mr. Lang, with his usual skill, did all that can be done with an organ located near the roof of the hall and in a temperature that forbids keeping it in accord with instruments so far below that altitude.

It is disgraceful that great choral performances should be so bereft of proper organ facilities. Some day the public will demand better organ arrangements than now exist in Music Hall, but that will be when the public is more highly cultivated than now. A love of good organ music and an interested support of the same is one of the evidences of the highest musical culture of a community. It would not cost much to place the present organ in the Music Hall at the back of the stage, and the owners of the building should see that it is done. It is a public demand that should be recognized. As it is at present the discrepancy of pitch between the organ and orchestra is shocking to any sensitive ear. Beethoven's Choral Fantisie followed the "Mass," and when Mrs. Beach appeared to play the piano solo part she was rapturously applauded by both the audience and the chorus.

There is nothing of interest either in the work itself or its performance last evening, to call for comment. On the evening of April 13th the society will give a performance of the "Messiah," in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its production by Handel in Dublin. On Good Friday evening, April 15, the St. Matthew Passion of Bach will be produced, and on Easter Sunday, April 17, "The Creation" of Haydn will be given. Quite an army of eminent soloists will assist at these performances.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The only novelty on the programme, Saturday night, was the "Prelude and Fugue" by Otto Floersheim, whose compositions have been heard before in these concerts. They are the work of a skilful musician who has a good command of modern orchestral effects as well as the possession of spontaneity. The "Prelude and Fugue" is an interesting number, although the Fugue is not carried out in the strictly fugal style, the elaborate instrumentation perhaps serving somewhat to hide its development. The composition, however, is one of fine musicianship and effective orchestral writing, and the most pretentious that Mr. Floersheim has yet given us.

It was played in a heavy, cumbersome manner by the orchestra, which, generally speaking, did quite fairly with its work during the whole programme. The wood-wind, however, after a most rational employment of its forces during the peformance of "Le Rouet d'Omphale" of Saint-Saens, had to spoil the otherwise beautiful ending by quacking, [illegible] ducks, on the last four chords, instead of merely breathing them out. It didn't appear to annoy the conductor, however. If the players had offended so harshly under Gericke's direction he would have rebuked them, and perhaps discharged them at the end of the concert. Some people, however, have a musical hide that is impervious to such thrusts.

The other numbers of the programme were the Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, played quite recently, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1892.

Fourth Symphony Society Concert.

THE fourth Symphony Society concert took place last Saturday night at the new Music Hall, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Walter Damrosch conducting. The program—not a startlingly novel one—was this :

Symphony No. 8, in F	Beethoven
Concerto No. 3, for violin with orchestra (New ; first time in New York.) Allegro energico. Adagio. Allegro molto. Miss Geraldine Morgan.	Bruch
Overture to "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Air, "Sweet Bird," from "L'Allegro ed Il Penseroso". (With flute obligato.) Miss Clementine De Vere.	Händel
Symphonic poem, "Die Hunnenschlacht"	Liszt

The Beethoven symphony received a perfectly respectable and, as to tempi, traditional reading. The Wagner overture was smoothly, too smoothly played for dramatic contrasts or climacteric effects. Liszt's patent constructed and wholly mechanical symphonic poem was brilliantly given, and was like all of his works, bleak, ugly and yet charming in spots. As a picture it just as readily suggests Miss Maggie Cline's epical fracas with the clan of the McCluskeys as Kaulbach's famous fiasco. So much for program music of its ilk. The novelty of the concert was the appearance of Miss Geraldine Morgan, a Californian by birth, her father being the well-known John P. Morgan, now deceased, but at one time an organist at Trinity Church. Miss Morgan's mother is the well-known translator of Rubinstein's new book, Kullak's "Art of Touch" and kindred works.

The young lady has been in Germany for twelve years and has enjoyed the benefit of the great Joachim's instruction. She has a small but penetrating musical tone, her intonation not being always true, plays with vivacity, intelligence and in a well schooled manner, but was overweighted by the new Bruch concerto, the first movement in particular taxing her strength too much. The composition itself, the third of the concertos for violin, is in D minor, and is an agreeable but not very original work, containing echoes of Mendelssohn and Bruch's other concertos. Its orchestration is modern and well made, but the raison d'être of the composition, particularly after its composer's first G minor concerto, is difficult to discover. Miss De Vere, barring an unfortunate entrance in the recitative to Händel's well worn aria at the rehearsal, sang with her usual facility and purity. The slip was probably owing to a misunderstanding with Mr. Damrosch.

The fifth concert of the series takes place March 5. Franz Rummel will be the soloist.

The Nikisch Recital.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch has recovered from her recent indisposition, but, to make her appearance in New York the more certain, her recital announced for last Monday at Chickering Hall has been postponed until next Monday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Home.

IF there be those in this city who believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra put forth their very best efforts only when they play in New York, and that for that reason they outshine our local orchestras, let them do as the writer did last week ; let them take a short trip to the Hub of the Universe, and attend one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at their own home, the Boston Music Hall, and they will readily be convinced that there is no better orchestral playing to be heard anywhere in this wide United States. Such at least was again the impression the writer received last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when he attended the fifteenth public rehearsal and concert of that organization, and for which Mr. Nikisch had arranged an exceedingly interesting—particularly so for the writer—and purely orchestral program.

The concert opened with a concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs by Händel. It was repeated on this occasion by special request, and we must confess that, although we are not as carried away by Händel's genius as some of his English admirers are, this concerto is so charming and at times so fresh, especially in harmonies, that it can easily carry away even the most blasé of modern audience. As it was to have been played also last night in New York, we venture to predict that it will in no less degree delight our metropolitan public than it did the vast Boston audiences who enthusiastically applauded each of the five movements of the concerto on the aforementioned occasions. The work of the two oboe players was especially admirable in the last movement, and the strings, flute and horns did beautiful work throughout.

Saint-Saëns' charming symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," exquisitely played, was also much applauded, and hardly less so was Berlioz's best symphonic work, his "Harold in Italy," which was also on last night's New York program. It received loving and most intelligent treatment at Mr. Nikisch's hands, and Concertmaster Franz Kneisel's playing of the viola solo part was simply admirable, pure throughout in intonation and beautiful in tone quality.

The only novelty (as far as Boston was concerned) on the program was the writer's "Prelude and Fugue" for orchestra. About the work the program gives the following explanatory notes :

> The "Concert Prelude and Fugue" is the first of a cycle of religious pieces, of which the "Elevation" has been heard and admired here before. The "Concert Prelude and Fugue," although absolute and not program music in the accepted sense of that much abused word, has a little history. The composer wishes it understood that he owes the inspiration which gave birth to the work to the fact of being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded the two notes E and B in a descending fourth, and their continued regularity almost unconsciously set his mind to harmonizing them.
>
> When the chimes cease a broad and noble theme of great religious fervency springs up in his imagination and is developed to a climax of much force and sonority, after which the chimes again break into his inspiration and thus bring the prelude to a close. But the religious theme reappears and takes possession so completely of the composer's soul that now he sets to work to mold it into the severest but also noblest of forms—that of the fugue. While in the prelude it was heard in broad 6-4 time, the fugue is constructed on the same theme in 4-4 time, and in the somewhat uncommon diction of a five bar phrase.
>
> The fugue itself is constructed with considerable skill, and is developed at some length in almost religiously strict style. The attempt, however, is made, and not unsuccessfully, of clothing the old form with modern harmonization and the glorious garb of the modern orchestra. The effect is a novel and a most pleasing one. The "Concert Prelude and Fugue" is in the key of E major, was composed on Easter Sunday, 1883, and is dedicated to Theodore Thomas, by whom it was produced for the first time at Steinway Hall, New York city, in the same year.

Whatever success the work achieved at both performances the writer places chiefly to the credit of the most careful and in every way most satisfying manner in which it was played by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra of artists and gentlemen. It is therefore with particular pleasure that the composer pens these few and insufficient lines of thanks.

At the hands of his Boston confrères of the press he also received the fairest and most generous treatment, for which he also acknowledges gratitude and an admiration for their unanimity of opinion, which is certainly strange among so many doctors.

O. F.

Mrs. Beach's Mass.

MUSIC HALL, Boston, was filled to the brim on Sunday evening, the occasion being the 681st concert by the Händel and Haydn Society. Much interest was felt in the initial production of a new work, mass in E flat, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The society had the assistance of Mrs. Jennie Patrick-Walker, soprano ; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto ; Mr. Italo Campanini, tenor, and Mr. Emil Fischer, bass. Mrs. Beach has been well known as a pianist for some time and now she comes before us as a composer also. Her mass contains much which evinces a fine musical intelligence and feeling ; experience, however, will surely enable her to put before others her ideas in a more impressive manner, for her orchestration is often weak and tiresome. As a consequence a good theme is often handicapped by poor treatment.

The "Laudamus te" is especially beautiful, and on this occasion the alto solo was admirably sung. Too frequent usage of the horns is noticeable throughout the work. The mass as a whole, however, does much credit to the composer. The society, under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn, sang in a most effective manner, the attacks were well taken, the intonation accurate and the light and shades of expression clearly defined. The mass was followed by Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, this being its second production by the Händel and Haydn Society. As usual, Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

---

ping from Herald
Washington D. C.

e 2/7

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

Its Third Concert Here This Season to Be Unusually Attractive.

On Wednesday next the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Washington season at the Congregational Church. In solo attractions this concert is unusually rich and consequently the programme is of more varied interest than ordinarily characterizes those given by this peerless organization. The public will welcome this, especially as it affords the opportunity of hearing a Washington girl, Miss Leonora Von Stosch, under circumstances so favorable and which will enable her to display her art to the best advantage. Much has been said and written about this charming young violinist, her studies and triumphs abroad, and her successful appearances since her return. The other soloists are Mr. Kneisel, concert meister of the orchestra, and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, one of our most celebrated contraltos. She has been heard before in Washington and will meet with a warm reception. The following is the programme: Wagner, A Faust Overture. Saint-Saens, Aria from "Samson and Delilah," Mrs. Julie L. Wyman. Berlioz, Pilgrim's March from Symphony "Harold in Italy," viola solo, by Mr. Kneisel. Saint Saens, Rondo Capriccioso for violin, Miss Leonora Von Stosch. a Delibes, "Regrets;" b Massenet, "Bonne Nuit;" c Ferrari, "A Un Fiancee," Mrs. Julie L. Wyman. Schumann, Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op

---

pping from

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

ate 2/12

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Julia L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Julia L. Wyman and Mr. Richard Burmeister as soloists, gave the third concert of their series at the Academy Concert Hall last night. The work of this excellent organization is perfection itself, and their coming is always eagerly looked forward to by lovers of good music, as was demonstrated by the large audience which filled the hall last night.

The first number rendered, the overture from "Freischutz," by Weber, calls for no description, as it is popular and familiar. The orchestra interpreted the simple German ideas of the composer with fine effect, from the opening horn quartette—which was played clean and in tune—to the finish. Mrs. Wyman, who has a fine contralto voice of remarkable range, sang in a faultless manner the aria from Saint Saens' "Samson and Delila," "O, Love, Aid Thou Me in My Weakness." She also sang three songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari, with piano accompaniment.

Liszt's concerto in A major was played by Mr. Burmeister, who received an ovation after a masterly rendition of that number. It is one of the composer's best works, and rarely heard here with orchestral accompaniment. The 'cello obligate in the second adgio movement is one of the incidents showing the composer's skill as a master of orchestral resources.

The "Pilgrims' March," from Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy," the fourth number on the programme, was given as if with inspiration, especially the viola solo, which was played by Franz Kneisel, who carries a motif by harmonies through almost the entire selection. Berlioz is noted for the phenominal technicality introduced into his works and his acute knowledge of instrumentation and the compass of each individual instrument.

The counter work of the basses and harp at the beginning and end is one of his many experiments in orchestral coloring.

The concluding number was Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Wedding March," which the orchestra gave in a most realistic manner.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2/13

Miss Geraldine Morgan, the violiniste, who is to make her American début at the Boston Symphony Concert next Monday evening, was taught successively by Dr. Damrosch, of New York; Schradick, of Leipsic, and Joachim, of Berlin. She has appeared in several European capitals, and is credited with notable successes in the line of art which she has studied under such favorable auspices. At the coming concert she will be the soloist in a new Bruch concerto (No. 3), and will also play a B minor romanza by Joachim, and Hungarian dances by Brahms. The orchestra is to give Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony (No. 3 in E flat), Richard Strauss's symphonic poem of "Don Juan," and Slavonic Dances by Dvorak. It is said of Strauss's work that it was suggested by a weird poem of Nicolaus Lenaus, and had its first performance about two years ago at Weimar. Mr. Nikisch placed it on his Boston programme last October.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 2-7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be with us this week and will give a concert in Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening and the regular Philharmonic public rehearsal in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It is a pity that these Brooklyn affairs come in conflict with the fourth rehearsal and concert of the New-York Philharmonic Societys for which an extremely interesting programme has been set up consisting of Liszt's "Prometheus," Bruch's third violin concerto (to be played by Mme. Camilla Urso), Wagner's "Faust" overture and the original version of Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which will be played on this occasion for the first time in America.

The chamber music concerts referred to are those of the Symphony Quartet, postponed from last Sunday, at the Chamber Music Hall this afternoon, of the Schmidt-Herbert Quartet, in Hardman Hall, on Thursday evening, and of the Kneisel Quartet, in Chamber Music Hall, on Friday evening. The opera at the Metropolitan Opera House this week will be "Lohengrin" on Monday, Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" in French on Wednesday, "Don Giovanni," for the last time on Friday and "Romeo et Juliette," also in French, on Saturday afternoon.

---

pping from

e 2-6

—The fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening next. The programme, which we have already published, includes a symphony of Schumann's and other music of the highest grade. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young American violinist, who will make her Philadelphia debut on this occasion and concerning whom much interest has been expressed.

—The subsequent representations of the Metropolitan Opera at the Academy of Music will be as follows: Thursday evening next, Gounod's Romeo and Juliete, with Miss Eames and M. Jean de Reszke; February 16, a double programme—Gluck's Orpheus, and Cavalleria Rusticana, with the Ravogli sisters, Miss Eames, and Sig. Valero; and February 18, Mignon, with Mlle. Van Zandt, Mme. Lehman, and Mme. Scalchi. It is especially desired on Thursday evening that the audience shall be prompt in attendance, as the usually omitted Prologue will be sung.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The advance sale of tickets for next Tuesday's concert bids fair to excel in amount the entire gross receipts at the last concert here. The box office sale will probably carry the total figures up to nearly $1000. Any young man who intends taking his "best girl" to this concert and has not yet secured his seat will do well not to put it off any longer. Desirable tickets will be worth a premium before next Tuesday night.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 2-10

WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Chickering Hall—Other Entertainments.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall was given before an audience notable for its size as well as for the appreciative attention it gave to the performance and the enthusiasm it displayed. Mr. Nikisch had arranged a programme that was varied in its attractions, and that required a longer time in its interpretation than is usual at the concerts of this organization. But no one seemed to wish it abridged.

Handel's concerts for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, was the first number on the programme. It is not familiar to concert-goers, and it proved to be interesting, not only by reason of its intrinsic excellence and as an example of Handelian composition, but also for the manner in which the wind instruments are brought forward in it.

A sharp contrast to this somewhat archaic work was found in Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," which followed—a composition in which the individuality of the composer is plainly and not always pleasantly shown. The most agreeable feature in it is the viola obligato. This was played by Mr. Kneisel with a beauty of expression that merits the highest praise. The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the scenes from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter for the concert room, were the other numbers on the programme.

The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was eminently satisfactory. Vigor and brilliancy of effect, as well as refinement and delicacy of expression, were among the striking characteristics of the performance, and warmth of feeling was not sacrificed to refinement of execution. The concert may be set down as one of the most enjoyable of the season.

Clipping from

2-11

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Congregational Church was filled with a delighted audience on the occasion of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra has become so popular in this city that its concerts are looked forward to with eager anticipation by lovers of music. There is never any dissapointment, for the work of the orchestra is always of the highest character. That it preserve such uniform excellence is a high tribute to the control of its conductor, Mr. Nikisch, who has perfected the labor commenced by Henschel and advanced by Gericke. Last night the enjoyment of the audience at the performance of the orchestra was emphatically manifested by applause. The Berlioz March probably commanded the closest attention because it was the least known, and the viola solo by Mr. Kneisel deserved the recognition it received. The Schumann number was the most satisfactory, except to the extreme Wagnerites, because of the melody of the overture, and the vivacity of the scherzo and its treatment by Mr. Nikisch and his players was all that could be desired. Mrs. Julia Wyman confirmed the favorable impression as a vocalist she made in her first appearance here and was warmly received. The interest of the evening, however, centered in the appearance of Miss Leonora Von Stosch, whose former friends were very numerous in the audience. Those who had known her as a girl, when she first commenced to play the violin under Prof. Josef Kaspar, who saw the ability of his young pupil and did all in his power to start her in the right direction, were there to see if she had fulfilled the hopes entertained for her when she left Washington to complete her studies in Germany. That she had developed even beyond the expectation of her friends was manifest by her excellent performance of Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriccioso, which afforded an opportunity for the display of brilliant technique, of intense feeling and of free, firm movement. She was fortunate in playing upon an instrument of wonderful purity of tone, the famous Stradivarious, of which so much has been said. The gratification of the audience at her performance was manifested in the most pronounced manner and applause was showered upon her at every opportunity. At the close of the piece the demand for encore was so emphatic that it could not be resisted and she played the prelude to a Bach sonata exquisitely. Miss Von Stosch has a bright future before her, but a firm position in the front line of violinists can only be maintained by constant study and practice. Youth, a keen musical intelligence, ambition and perseverance are qualities that she possesses and that should give her the highest rank among American female violinists. Her course will be eagerly watched in this native city.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 2/10

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert last night at Chickering Hall was opened with Handel's concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs in F by Mr. Nikisch. The second number was Berlioz's seldom heard symphony, "Harold in Italy." There is not much good writing, manneristic though it be, in the concerto.

"Harold" was last played in this city under Mr. Damrosch, with Nahan Franko as the violo soloist. Last night that prince of violinists, Franz Kneisel, was the viola player. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has seldom done better playing than in this work. The programme concluded with some Wagner numbers, the "Lohengrin" prelude and Hans Richter's arrangement of excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung."

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 2-11

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give [illegible] fourth public rehearsal and concert on [illegible] afternoon and Saturday evening, [illegible] Arthur Nikisch [illegible] and the [illegible]

---

ate 2/10

BOSTON SYMPHONY OR[illegible]STRA.

New York does not have as much of the Boston symphony orchestra this season as Brooklyn does, but a few nights before each of our Philharmonic concerts it is Mr. Nikisch's custom to give the Gothamites a treat and they had one last night at Chickering hall, when they showed their appreciation of its value by filling that place and heartily applauding every number. The programme was historically progressive, and each piece was played with such verve and precision that a momentary uncertainty of the second violins in the "Lohengrin" prelude was just reason for surprise. Handel's orchestral suite, called a concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs, was represented in five numbers: sedate in form, yet joyful in spirit, sonorous and richly colored as to instrumentation, the horns and reeds being treated with especial scope and beauty. Berlioz' eccentric symphony illustrative of "Harold in Italy" was played with technical perfection, and Franz Kneisel, exchanging his violin for a viola, gave Harold's monologues with delightful purity and voice quality of tone and facility of utterance. This symphony shows Berlioz at his best and there are moments when he is lifted to the skies, though in the very next bar, perhaps, he is groping or trifling, his purpose gone, his inspiration vanished, the instruments wandering feebly, as in search for an idea, endeavoring by mere strider to conceal the want of reason for the music. As a whole, however, the work is picturesque and to the musician the orchestral coloring is interesting. Even Mr. Kneisel could not prevent his harmonics from sounding like the twang of a jewsharp, but perhaps that was the very effect that Berlioz desired to produce. The "Lohengrin" vorspiel displayed the exquisite beauty, the breadth and singing tone of the strings for which this band is noted and that makes it eminent among all rivals on both sides of the sea, and the concert arrangement of pieces from "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods," descriptive of Siegfried's ascent of the mountain, of the dawn and the Rhine journey—a bewilderingly beautiful interweaving of leading motives—was given in a brisk and graphic, yet dramatic, manner. Except for Mr. Kneisel's work, which was integral to the symphony, there were no soloists, yet nobody seemed to suffer in consequence. The orchestra will play in Brooklyn next Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 2/10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given than that furnished yesterday evening to its subscribers by the Boston Symphony Orchesta under Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Both in regard to selections and the manner of their performance the entertainment was perfect. Only three names of great composers appeared upon the bill—Haendel, Berlioz, and Wagner. They were set down in this order, the older man heading the list with a "Concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs, in F major," a work so full of symmetrical beauty, and so refreshing in its clear, square cut forms and honest, straightforward progressions, that, while listening, wrinkles were smoothed from knitted brows and cares and doubts fell away from anxious hearts. Strength and health and common sense and justice seem to be the inherent qualities of Haendel's delightful concerto. It radiates peace and comfort from every phrase throughout its entire length. There are five short movements, cleverly contrasted, each as fine as the other. It was interesting to note how the exact Haendelian spirit was given to this number, the stiff, formal style of the old master showing in vivid comparison with the rest of the programme, which was made up of the ultra-romantic school, Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy," and Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, with extracts from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdämmerung," being the remaining selections.

Into all the modern music Nikisch put a beautiful swing and elasticity, which, however, was not allowed to detract in the slightest degree from that exquisite precision for which he is so noted. The stronghold that the conductor maintains over his men never relaxes for an instant, but, within these iron bonds there seems to be entire freedom of movement, so that the most perfect results of nicety, and, at the same time, of breadth, are obtained. Nikisch's men all play as if they loved to do it, and rejoiced in their obedience to his slightest command. The leader's manner is exceedingly charming, too, his self-containment and reserve being admirable—a worthy epitome of Boston principle and propriety.

Perhaps the best example of Nikisch's power and the orchestra's skill was Berlioz's extraordinary marvellous symphony. The work was the more interesting and enjoyable because it has been so seldom played here. It demands the subtlest finesse in interpretation, and it certainly received its full due last evening. Such a rendering, if he could have heard it, would go far toward compensating the poor, unhappy, misunderstood genius who made the lovely symphony for all his wretched and grievous life. What a wealth of imagination in that music; what pictures it paints; what variety of tone color! The ear can veritably gormandize and revel in such a generous, gorgeous feast of sound.

It is necessary to hear Mr. Nikisch's interpretations of Wagner more frequently before the best judgment of them can be given. While they are splendid from a technical point of view, it might be questioned whether, as a rule, they do not lack impulse and rhapsody—whether there is not too little of the tragic or whirlwind element in his conceptions. As yet no one has equalled Seidl as a conductor of Wagner. He always portrays the true inward meaning of those passionate phrases.

~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 2-8

The programme for to-morrow evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall is as follows: 1, Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, Handel; 2, Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; 3, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; 4, Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock; Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

2-12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those people who, from force of habit put off buying tickets until the last moment feeling that there is no danger of a scarcity of good seats at a concert in Fall River, are likely to be disappointed next Tuesday. It is many a day since such an audience has assembled for any musical event in Fall River as will be present at the Academy on that evening. There are several reasons which may account for this. The demand for the orchestra, as it becomes more celebrated, is constantly increasing in the larger cities and its visits here are becoming less frequent. The programme announced for this concert is superior to any given here for some years, and much longer. It is almost certain that Mrs. Wyman will be a more popular soloist than any singer they have brought here since Agnes Huntington, years ago. As we have intimated, the demand for seats is almost unprecedented, the orchestra chairs being practically all sold the first day they were offered, and while there still remain some good parquette and balcony chairs they are being rapidly taken.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the great concert next Tuesday has opened with a rush, and there is every indication that an immense audience will greet this, the finest orchestra in America, on its first appearance here for two years. The program advertised today bids fair to excel in interest anything it has yet given us, as it certainly will in length.

The demand for tickets to these concerts in Boston is so great that a Fall River gentleman who recently wished to attend one, being unable to procure even "standing room" at the box office, was obliged to buy of a speculator on the street a ticket which gave him the opportunity to stand in the upper gallery for the moderate price of $1.50. This is an absolute fact. It is a pleasing fact that the sale of seats promises to be so large here that those who wait until the last moment before buying are likely to find little to select from except the dress circle and gallery.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We advertise to-day, in another column the full programme of the great concert to be given at the Academy next Tuesday evening. Such an entertainment is a musical event of great importance in this city, and we are glad that the opening sale of seats gives evidence that our citizens appreciate the fact. The programme is arranged to give a concert lasting a full hour and three-quarters, fifteen minutes longer than the average of their Boston concerts. This has been done at the urgent request of our local manager, as some complaint was made that their last programme here was too short.

The New York Post says: "As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior—perhaps no equal." Our public will have an opportunity to judge of the justice of this commendation, as the orchestra will play his magnificent first symphony entire. A new symphonic poem by the composer of the celebrated "Dance of Death," the beautiful prelude to "Lohengrin," and the well known but always welcome overture to "Tannhauser," are also among the most prominent features.

There are still an abundance of good seats unsold, but really choice ones are likely to be very scarce before the end of this week.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2-

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The success of last evening's concert by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was great in all senses. The Academy was crowded in every part, the programme was a choice one and the band was in splendid condition. Its strength in stringed instruments is unusual, for there were at least forty violins, violas, 'cellos and double basses. These produced a richness of tone that we have never before had in concerts here.

The opening number was Robert Schumann's magnificent Rhenish symphony, opus 97. For variety of themes and for masterly treatment by the composer nothing since Beethoven surpasses this grand work. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it shows thorough understanding, and his little army of artists obeyed his direction like one man. In the way of a symphony we have had no such good performance this season.

A concerto for violin by Bruch was the next piece on the programme. It is not remarkable for originality, and must be heard oftener to be fairly judged. The violinist was a young, fragile-looking American lady, Miss Geraldine Morgan. She has not yet arrived at the highest stage as a virtuosa. She lacks physical strength, as was shown by frequent weakness of tone, and a want of delicate finish in the more difficult passages. Nevertheless she showed decided talent and was awarded tumultuous applause.

Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," was given by the orchestra with delightful elegance. It stamps its young composer as one of the best that lives; one who is rich in ideas and resources, and who imitates no one. The work at once caught the interest of the audience, and it will be more liked the more it is heard. Three curious, eccentric but very attractive Slavonic dances by the Bohemian composer, Dvorâk, concluded this brilliant concert, and the great crowd went home fully satisfied with the treat they had had. The next concert (the fifth) by this splendid orchestra is announced for Monday evening, March 14th.

---

lipping from te 2-9

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Another fine audience was drawn to the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth concert of the series. The entertainment was scarcely as satisfactory as some which have preceded it. The orchestra played splendidly, but the programme was not especially strong. It included, to be sure, the great Symphony, No. 3, of Schumann (sometimes called "The Rheinish''), one of the monumental pieces of music, and which had an altogether efficient rendering. The variety, the ingenuity, and the magnetic force of this great composition have never been more entirely demonstrated here than they were on this occasion, and the performance was a pure and penetrating delight. This high plane, however, was not maintained, and the remainder of the entertainment was but indifferent. The Max Bruch Violin Concerto in D Minor is a work whose value is not commensurate with its length and difficulty. The solo part was taken by Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young and ambitious artist who was scarcely well advised in such an undertaking. The lady has marked gifts, but she was overweighted in this ponderous work, which is of a kind to tax the endurance of the strongest man. Madame Urso and Miss Powell are too wise to make such attempts. Miss Morgan succeeded creditably to the end of the Adagio, but in the Finale she was plainly overtaxed, and at the close was scarcely audible. Of her talent there can be no doubt, and we may hope to hear her again, in labors more appropriate. The Richard Strauss symphonic poem "Don Juan," which came next is a wild example of modern instrumentation run mad, without point or coherence. A group of Dvorak's "Sclavonic Dances" constituted the concluding number. They follow Brahms too closely for comfort, and are not very interesting in themselves.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 2-13

CHAMBER MUSIC BY BOSTON MUSICIANS.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a fourth chamber concert last evening in the Chamber Music Hall. It was the last one of the current series by these admirable musicians, and ended a season that has been rich in artistic results and fruitful with a rare enjoyment for those who have heard their playing. Like the larger organization of which these four artists are also members, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they have made an important and highly interesting contribution to the metropolitan musical season. Their four concerts have been an exemplification of all that is best in quartet playing and in fact have set a standard in this department of music of the loftiest range. Their programme last evening included two quartets by Beethoven op. 18 No. 2 and op. 74, and the wonderful variations from Schubert's in D minor. Their playing of these works was marked in the highest degree by the qualities that have been previously noted as lending so great distinction to their works—the most perfect symmetry and balance such as is attained only by long and thorough practice together, and by players completely imbued with the same spirit. Not only are an exquisite finish and lovely tonal quality never absent from their playing, but it is dominated by a sincerity of purpose and ripe artistic feeling that are always dedicated to the composition and never to a display of the abilities of the players themselves. Such playing is needed to bring to its full realization the two Beethoven quartets they chose last evening—works of his most melodious and beautiful style. The quartet was assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who sang with delightful grace and feeling five French songs, by Chaminade Wekerlin, Delibes and an unknown composer. The audience indicated by the warmth and spontaneity of its applause how highly the music both of the quartet and of the soloist was appreciatedi.

World, Baltimore, Md.

Date 2-12

Conductor Nikisch has been descending considerably of late from the classic in selecting his concert compositions. Thursday night's program had several of what people call "popular selections," and such names as Beethoven, Mozart and Wagner, were conspicuously absent. But the audience enjoyed it all from the well worn "Freischuetz overture to Goldmark's symphony, which closed the evening.

The Liszt concerto, was the piece de resistance of the several numbers and local music lovers had an opportunity to hear Herr Richard Burmeister, as the piano solosist. It's a peculiar composition displaying wonderful variety of theme and well shows the eccentricities of the mind who conceived it, abounding in startling changes and touching almost every point in musical composition from the heavy fortissimo passages to the dreamy rippling movements which seem like the flowing of a brook in June. "The hearer notes Herr Burmeister's playing as sympathetic from the first. He is also master of technique—you might call him a model. But he seemed to lack in the force and vigor which are so required in the finale when the full orchestra accompanies the soloist in the grand march movement. Here the piano was not the solo instrument. Its music was too faintly outlined and its air not as clear and distinct as should be the case in this rendition. Otherwise Herr Burmeister's playing was superb and he deserved the applause so lavishly bestowed. A beautiful melody was the duet for piano and cello, which is one of the features of the concerto.

Mrs. Wyman the soloist possesses a strong well cultivated voice, though tis not very clear at the higher range. Her singing was aided by her sympathetic style, which found much favor with the assemblage.

A musical oddity is the march from Berlioz's symphony. It has a part for the fagots which is simply indescribable, and is orginality itself. Another features was the viola solo by Franz Kneisel, which was a delightful surprise to the listeners.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 2-10

WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Chickering Hall—Other Entertainments.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall was given before an audience notable for its size as well as for the appreciative attention it gave to the performance and the enthusiasm it displayed. Mr. Nikisch had arranged a programme that was varied in its attractions, and that required a longer time in its interpretation than is usual at the concerts of this organization. But no one seemed to wish it abridged.

Handel's concerts for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, was the first number on the programme. It is not familiar to concert-goers, and it proved to be interesting, not only by reason of its intrinsic excellence and as an example of Handelian composition, but also for the manner in which the wind instruments are brought forward in it.

A sharp contrast to this somewhat archaic work was found in Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," which followed—a composition in which the individuality of the composer is plainly and not always pleasantly shown. The most agreeable feature in it is the viola obligato. This was played by Mr. Kneisel with a beauty of expression that merits the highest praise. The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the scenes from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter for the concert room, were the other numbers on the programme.

The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was eminently satisfactory. Vigor and brilliancy of effect, as well as refinement and delicacy of expression, were among the striking characteristics of the performance, and warmth of feeling was not sacrificed to refinement of execution. The concert may be set down as one of the most enjoyable of the season.

Clipping from 2-11

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Congregational Church was filled with a delighted audience on the occasion of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra has become so popular in this city that its concerts are looked forward to with eager anticipation by lovers of music. There is never any dissapointment, for the work of the orchestra is always of the highest character. That it preserve such uniform excellence is a high tribute to the control of its conductor, Mr. Nikisch, who has perfected the labor commenced by Henschel and advanced by Gericke. Last night the enjoyment of the audience at the performance of the orchestra was emphatically manifested by applause. The Berlioz March probably commanded the closest attention because it was the least known, and the viola solo by Mr. Kneisel deserved the recognition it received. The Schumann number was the most satisfactory, except to the extreme Wagnerites, because of the melody of the overture, and the vivacity of the scherzo and its treatment by Mr. Nikisch and his players was all that could be desired. Mrs. Julia Wyman confirmed the favorable impression as a vocalist she made in her first appearance here and was warmly received. The interest of the evening, however, centered in the appearance of Miss Leonora Von Stosch, whose former friends were very numerous in the audience. Those who had known her as a girl, when she first commenced to play the violin under Prof. Josef Kaspar, who saw the ability of his young pupil and did all in his power to start her in the right direction, were there to see if she had fulfilled the hopes entertained for her when she left Washington to complete her studies in Germany. That she had developed even beyond the expectation of her friends was manifest by her excellent performance of Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriccioso, which afforded an opportunity for the display of brilliant technique, of intense feeling and of free, firm movement. She was fortunate in playing upon an instrument of wonderful purity of tone, the famous Stradivarious, of which so much has been said. The gratification of the audience at her performance was manifested in the most pronounced manner and applause was showered upon her at every opportunity. At the close of the piece the demand for encore was so emphatic that it could not be resisted and she played the prelude to a Bach sonata exquisitely. Miss Von Stosch has a bright future before her, but a firm position in the front line of violinists can only be maintained by constant study and practice. Youth, a keen musical intelligence, ambition and perseverance are qualities that she possesses and that should give her the highest rank among American female violinists. Her course will be eagerly watched in this her native city.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 2/10

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert last night at Chickering Hall was opened with Handel's concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs in F by Mr. Nikisch. The second number was Berlioz's seldom heard symphony, "Harold in Italy." There is not much good writing, manneristic though it be, in the concerto.

"Harold" was last played in this city under Mr. Damrosch, with Nahan Franko as the violo soloist. Last night that prince of violinists, Franz Kneisel, was the viola player. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has seldom done better playing than in this work. The programme concluded with some Wagner numbers, the "Lohengrin" prelude and Hans Richter's arrangement of excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung."

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 2-11

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their fourth public rehearsal and concert on to-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening, at the Academy of Music. Arthur Nikisch [illegible] lead the orchestra, and the [illegible] Mr. Nikisch and M. Alwin [illegible] will be under [illegible] [illegible] N. Y.

Date 2/10

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New York does not have as much of the Boston symphony orchestra this season as Brooklyn does, but a few nights before each of our Philharmonic concerts it is Mr. Nikisch's custom to give the Gothamites a treat and they had one last night at Chickering hall, when they showed their appreciation of its value by filling that place and heartily applauding every number. The programme was historically progressive, and each piece was played with such verve and precision that a momentary uncertainty of the second violins in the "Lohengrin" prelude was just reason for surprise. Handel's orchestral suite, called a concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs, was represented in five numbers: sedate in form, yet joyful in spirit, sonorous and richly colored as to instrumentation, the horns and reeds being treated with especial scope and beauty. Berlioz' eccentric symphony illustrative of "Harold in Italy" was played with technical perfection, and Franz Kneisel, exchanging his violin for a viola, gave Harold's monologues with delightful purity and voice quality of tone and facility of utterance. This symphony shows Berlioz at his best and there are moments when he is lifted to the skies, though in the very next bar, perhaps, he is groping or trifling, his purpose gone, his inspiration vanished, the instruments wandering feebly, as in search for an idea, endeavoring by mere strider to conceal the want of reason for the music. As a whole, however, the work is picturesque and to the musician the orchestral coloring is interesting. Even Mr. Kneisel could not prevent his harmonics from sounding like the twang of a jewsharp, but perhaps that was the very effect that Berlioz desired to produce. The "Lohengrin" vorspiel displayed the exquisite beauty, the breadth and singing tone of the strings for which this band is noted and that makes it eminent among all rivals on both sides of the sea, and the concert arrangement of pieces from "Siegfried" and "The Twilight of the Gods," descriptive of Siegfried's ascent of the mountain, of the dawn and the Rhine journey—a bewilderingly beautiful interweaving of leading motives—was given in a brisk and graphic, yet dramatic, manner. Except for Mr. Kneisel's work, which was integral to the symphony, there were no soloists, yet nobody seemed to suffer in consequence. The orchestra will play in Brooklyn next Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 2/10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given than that furnished yesterday evening to its subscribers by the Boston Symphony Orchesta under Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Both in regard to selections and the manner of their performance the entertainment was perfect. Only three names of great composers appeared upon the bill—Haendel, Berlioz, and Wagner. They were set down in this order, the older man heading the list with a "Concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs, in F major," a work so full of symmetrical beauty, and so refreshing in its clear, square cut forms and honest, straightforward progressions, that, while listening, wrinkles were smoothed from knitted brows and cares and doubts fell away from anxious hearts. Strength and health and common sense and justice seem to be the inherent qualities of Haendel's delightful concerto. It radiates peace and comfort from every phrase throughout its entire length. There are five short movements, cleverly contrasted, each as fine as the other. It was interesting to note how the exact Haendelian spirit was given to this number, the stiff, formal style of the old master showing in vivid comparison with the rest of the programme, which was made up of the ultra-romantic school, Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy," and Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, with extracts from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdämmerung," being the remaining selections.

Into all the modern music Nikisch put a beautiful swing and elasticity, which, however, was not allowed to detract in the slightest degree from that exquisite precision for which he is so noted. The stronghold that the conductor maintains over his men never relaxes for an instant, but, within these iron bonds there seems to be entire freedom of movement, so that the most perfect results of nicety, and, at the same time, of breadth, are obtained. Nikisch's men all play as if they loved to do it, and rejoiced in their obedience to his slightest command. The leader's manner is exceedingly charming, too, his self-containment and reserve being admirable—a worthy epitome of Boston principle and propriety.

Perhaps the best example of Nikisch's power and the orchestra's skill was Berlioz's extraordinary marvellous symphony. The work was the more interesting and enjoyable because it has been so seldom played here. It demands the subtlest finesse in interpretation, and it certainly received its full due last evening. Such a rendering, if he could have heard it, would go far toward compensating the poor, unhappy, misunderstood genius who made the lovely symphony for all his wretched and grievous life. What a wealth of imagination in that music; what pictures it paints; what variety of tone color! The ear can veritably gormandize and revel in such a generous, gorgeous feast of sound.

It is necessary to hear Mr. Nikisch's interpretations of Wagner more frequently before the best judgment of them can be given. While they are splendid from a technical point of view, it might be questioned whether, as a rule, they do not lack impulse and rhapsody—whether there is not too little of the tragic or whirlwind element in his conceptions. As yet no one has equalled Seidl as a conductor of Wagner. He always portrays the true inward meaning of those passionate phrases.

~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date

The programme for to-morrow evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall is as follows: 1, Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, Handel; 2, Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; 3, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; 4, Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock; Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass.

2-12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those people who, from force of habit put off buying tickets until the last moment feeling that there is no danger of a scarcity of good seats at a concert in Fall River, are likely to be disappointed next Tuesday. It is many a day since such an audience has assembled for any musical event in Fall River as will be present at the Academy on that evening. There are several reasons which may account for this. The demand for the orchestra, as it becomes more celebrated, is constantly increasing in the larger cities and its visits here are becoming less frequent. The programme announced for this concert is superior to any given here for some years, and much longer. It is almost certain that Mrs. Wyman will be a more popular soloist than any singer they have brought here since Agnes Huntington, years ago. As we have intimated, the demand for seats is almost unprecedented, the orchestra chairs being practically all sold the first day they were offered, and while there still remain some good parquette and balcony chairs they are being rapidly taken.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2/10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the great concert next Tuesday has opened with a rush, and there is every indication that an immense audience will greet this, the finest orchestra in America, on its first appearance here for two years. The program advertised today bids fair to excel in interest anything it has yet given us, as it certainly will in length.

The demand for tickets to these concerts in Boston is so great that a Fall River gentleman who recently wished to attend one, being unable to procure even "standing room" at the box office, was obliged to buy of a speculator on the street a ticket which gave him the opportunity to stand in the upper gallery for the moderate price of $1.50. This is an absolute fact. It is a pleasing fact that the sale of seats promises to be so large here that those who wait until the last moment before buying are likely to find little to select from except the dress circle and gallery.

NEWS, Fall River, Mass. 2-10

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We advertise to-day, in another column the full programme of the great concert to be given at the Academy next Tuesday evening. Such an entertainment is a musical event of great importance in this city, and we are glad that the opening sale of seats gives evidence that our citizens appreciate the fact. The programme is arranged to give a concert lasting a full hour and three-quarters, fifteen minutes longer than the average of their Boston concerts. This has been done at the urgent request of our local manager, as some complaint was made that their last programme here was too short.

The New York Post says: "As a Schumann conductor, Mr. Nikisch has no superior—perhaps no equal." Our public will have an opportunity to judge of the justice of this commendation, as the orchestra will play his magnificent first symphony entire. A new symphonic poem by the composer of the celebrated "Dance of Death," the beautiful prelude to "Lohengrin," and the well known but always welcome overture to "Tannhauser," are also among the most prominent features.

There are still an abundance of good seats unsold, but really choice ones are likely to be very scarce before the end of this week.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The success of last evening's concert by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was great in all senses. The Academy was crowded in every part, the programme was a choice one and the band was in splendid condition. Its strength in stringed instruments is unusual, for there were at least forty violins, violas, 'cellos and double basses. These produced a richness of tone that we have never before had in concerts here.

The opening number was Robert Schumann's magnificent Rhenish symphony, opus 97. For variety of themes and for masterly treatment by the composer nothing since Beethoven surpasses this grand work. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it shows thorough understanding, and his little army of artists obeyed his direction like one man. In the way of a symphony we have had no such good performance this season.

A concerto for violin by Bruch was the next piece on the programme. It is not remarkable for originality, and must be heard oftener to be fairly judged. The violinist was a young, fragile-looking American lady, Miss Geraldine Morgan. She has not yet arrived at the highest stage as a virtuosa. She lacks physical strength, as was shown by frequent weakness of tone, and a want of delicate finish in the more difficult passages. Nevertheless she showed decided talent and was awarded tumultuous applause.

Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," was given by the orchestra with delightful elegance. It stamps its young composer as one of the best that lives; one who is rich in ideas and resources, and who imitates no one. The work at once caught the interest of the audience, and it will be more liked the more it is heard. Three curious, eccentric but very attractive Slavonic dances by the Bohemian composer, Dvorák, concluded this brilliant concert, and the great crowd went home fully satisfied with the treat they had had. The next concert (the fifth) by this splendid orchestra is announced for Monday evening, March 14th.

Clipping from

Date 2-9

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Another fine audience was drawn to the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth concert of the series. The entertainment was scarcely as satisfactory as some which have preceded it. The orchestra played splendidly, but the programme was not especially strong. It included, to be sure, the great Symphony, No. 3, of Schumann (sometimes called "The Rheinish''), one of the monumental pieces of music, and which had an altogether efficient rendering. The variety, the ingenuity, and the magnetic force of this great composition have never been more entirely demonstrated here than they were on this occasion, and the performance was a pure and penetrating delight. This high plane, however, was not maintained, and the remainder of the entertainment was but indifferent. The Max Bruch Violin Concerto in D Minor is a work whose value is not commensurate with its length and difficulty. The solo part was taken by Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young and ambitious artist who was scarcely well advised in such an undertaking. The lady has marked gifts, but she was overweighted in this ponderous work, which is of a kind to tax the endurance of the strongest man. Madame Urso and Miss Powell are too wise to make such attempts. Miss Morgan succeeded creditably to the end of the Adagio, but in the Finale she was plainly overtaxed, and at the close was scarcely audible. Of her talent there can be no doubt, and we may hope to hear her again, in labors more appropriate. The Richard Strauss symphonic poem "Don Juan," which came next is a wild example of modern instrumentation run mad, without point or coherence. A group of Dvorak's "Sclavonic Dances" constituted the concluding number. They follow Brahms too closely for comfort, and are not very interesting in themselves.

TRIBUNE. New York, N. Y.

Date 2-10

CHAMBER MUSIC BY BOSTON MUSICIANS.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a fourth chamber concert last evening in the Chamber Music Hall. It was the last one of the current series by these admirable musicians, and ended a season that has been rich in artistic results and fruitful with a rare enjoyment for those who have heard their playing. Like the larger organization of which these four artists are also members, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they have made an important and highly interesting contribution to the metropolitan musical season. Their four concerts have been an exemplification of all that is best in quartet playing and in fact have set a standard in this department of music of the loftiest range. Their programme last evening included two quartets by Beethoven op. 18 No. 2 and op. 74, and the wonderful variations from Schubert's in D minor. Their playing of these works was marked in the highest degree by the qualities that have been previously noted as lending so great distinction to their works—the most perfect symmetry and balance such as is attained only by long and thorough practice together, and by players completely imbued with the same spirit. Not only are an exquisite finish and lovely tonal quality never absent from their playing, but it is dominated by a sincerity of purpose and ripe artistic feeling that are always dedicated to the composition and never to a display of the abilities of the players themselves. Such playing is needed to bring to its full realization the two Beethoven quartets they chose last evening—works of his most melodious and beautiful style. The quartet was assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who sang with delightful grace and feeling five French songs, by Chaminade Wekerlin, Delibes and an unknown composer. The audience indicated by the warmth and spontaneity of its applause how highly the music both of the quartet and of the soloist was appreciated.

World, Baltimore, Md.

Date 2-12

Conductor Nikisch has been descending considerably of late from the classic in selecting his concert compositions. Thursday night's program had several of what people call "popular selections," and such names as Beethoven, Mozart and Wagner, were conspicuously absent. But the audience enjoyed it all from the well worn "Freischuetz overture to Goldmark's symphony, which closed the evening.

The Liszt concerto, was the piece de resistance of the several numbers and local music lovers had an opportunity to hear Herr Richard Burmeister, as the piano solosist. It's a peculiar composition displaying wonderful variety of theme and well shows the eccentricities of the mind who conceived it, abounding in startling changes and touching almost every point in musical composition from the heavy fortissimo passages to the dreamy rippling movements which seem like the flowing of a brook in June. "The hearer notes Herr Burmeister's playing as sympathetic from the first. He is also master of technique—you might call him a model. But he seemed to lack in the force and vigor which are so required in the finale when the full orchestra accompanies the soloist in the grand march movement. Here the piano was not the solo instrument. Its music was too faintly outlined and its air not as clear and distinct as should be the case in this rendition. Otherwise Herr Burmeister's playing was superb and he deserved the applause so lavishly bestowed. A beautiful melody was the duet for piano and cello, which is one of the features of the concerto.

Mrs. Wyman the soloist possesses a strong well cultivated voice, though tis not very clear at the higher range. Her singing was aided by her sympathetic style, which found much favor with the assemblage.

A musical oddity is the march from Berlioz's symphony. It has a part for the fagots which is simply indescribable, and is orginality itself. Another features was the viola solo by Franz Kneisel, which was a delightful surprise to the listeners.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the sale of seats for the great concert of Feb. 16th opened at Talbot's yesterday morning, a line of about 50 people were in waiting, some of them having been there since 6 o'clock. Before noon several hundred dollars worth were taken, and it now looks as though the people were awake to the fact that America's finest orchestra will soon be here. Paderewsky, the great pianist, who is now making a tour of America and who has appeared all over Europe, says emphatically that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best in the world.

The programme which will be given next Tuesday, is advertised today, and it embraces many novelties, as well as one or two selections that will never become old. The great overture to "Tannhauser," perhaps the grandest ever written, and which alone must have made Wagner immortal, ends the long programme. Mr. Nikisch is credited with giving the finest rendering of this overture ever heard in Europe. In the opening number also, the Schumann symphony, this talented conductor will appear at his best. If you have not already secured tickets do so at once.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 8

NOTES.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch has recovered from her recent indisposition, but to make her appearance in New York the more certain, her recital announced for Monday, February 8, at Chickering Hall, has been postponed until Monday, February 15.

The programme for the fourth and last of the Kneisel Quartet concerts at Music Hall, Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, on Friday evening next, is as follows: 1, Quartet in G major, No. 2, op. 18, Beethoven; 2, songs by Chaminade; 3, Variations from quartet in D minor, Schubert; 4, songs by Wekerlin and Delibes; 5, Quartet in E flat major, opus 74, Beethoven. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman will be the vocalist.

The fourth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall, will take place to-morrow evening. The programme is as follows: 1. Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major, Handel; 2. Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; 3. Prelude to "Lohengrin;" 4. Seigfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock; Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," arranged by Hans Richter.

Clipping from ....

Date 2-13

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

The Brooklyn Academy of Music was not so well filled as it ought to have been at yesterday afternoon's rehearsal by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch, for the fourth Philharmonic concert to-night. Brooklyn does not yet seem to realize that it is offered better music this year at these concerts than ever before.

The programme rehearsed yesterday consisted of Wagner's "Faust" overture, Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from the symphony in F minor and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. Besides this list Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, played most admirably Saint-Saëns' violoncello concerto in A minor, the results being exquisite and partly due to the marvellous accompaniment furnished by Mr. Nikisch's band.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, of Boston, replaced Mrs. Nikisch, who is ill, and sang an air from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delila" and songs by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Of these latter Massenet's exquisite "Bonne Nuit" especially delighted the audience and received great applause, for which Mr. Nikisch, who played the piano accompaniments, could justly claim a share.

The "Faust" overture and the Beethoven symphony were about as perfectly played as the most fastidious listener could desire. There is no better orchestral playing to be heard here or elsewhere.

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-11

Paderewski on Nikisch and Orchestra.

At the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, Paderewski, who was the soloist, gave these words of praise:

"I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but, as a whole, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniament, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

At the Academy next Thursday evening.

....

Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This celebrated organization, led by Arthur Nikish, will give its fourth concert at the Academy of Music this evening.

The orchestra is composed of eighty-five performers, and deserves the comment made upon it by a German friend from Europe, a short time since. He said: "There is no finer orchestra anywhere."

At to-night's concert Miss Geraldine Morgan, violiniste, will make her first appearance in America. She is said to play remarkably well.

Clipping from ....

Date 2-13

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fourth and last of a series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in the chamber music room at Music Hall, Seventh Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street. The members of this quartet are: Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello. These gentlemen all belong to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In that organization, however, the three first named are all first violin players, Mr. Kneisel being what the French call chef d' attaque and the Germans concertmeister.

The compositions played by these gentlemen last evening were Beethoven's quartet in G major; No. 2, opus 18, variations from Schubert's D minor quartet, and Beethoven's quartet in E-flat major, opus 74. The soloist of the concert was Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, contralto. She sang five French songs. Two were by Chaminade—"Ritournelle" and "Chant d'Amour." The others were Wekerlin's "Au Bord d'Une Fontaine," an unknown author's "Mon Petit Cœur," and Delebes's "Regrets." There was a good-sized audience present and the applause was abundant.

HERALD, Fall River, Mass.

Date 2-12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Don't be deluded enough to think you can wait until the last moment and then get a good seat for next Tuesday's concert. You can, for that matter, in the gallery for only 25 cents, and you can hear just as well as though you had an orchestra chair which costs $1.50, or did cost that when there were any to sell. Those who wish good seats in the parquette or balcony must get them soon, for they will shortly be gone, too. Remember that for this concert every seat below the gallery is reserved, and you may as well secure your seat in advance as wait until the last moment and then pay the same amount for a poor one. This orchestra is one of the best, if not the very best in the world, and chances to hear it are becoming more and more rare.

ZETTE, Taunton, Mass.

2/16

We advertise to-day the program of the great concert to be given at Fall River next Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale of tickets opened with a rush yesterday morning and parties from this city who desire to attend should order seats at once. As will be seen, special rates have been made by the railroad officials and Manager Ellis writes that they have arranged for the 6.58 steamboat train to stop at the new Fall River station to accommodate Taunton patrons. The concert will be over about 9.45 and the special train will leave there shortly after ten o'clock.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 2-11

The last of the Kneisel Quartette's agreeable concerts this season will take place at the chamber music room of Music Hall on Friday evening. The programme is an excellent one and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman will be the soloist.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Feb. 9, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had the largest audience it has attracted this season in attendance last night at its fourth concert of the current series, the seating capacity of the Academy of Music being fully tested, with a good standing contingent at the rear of each tier. It cannot be said that the audience was correspondingly cordial, and in two or three instances it was distinctly lacking in appreciation, so far as outward manifestation went, for Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra never better deserved hearty approval than in two movements of Schumann's No. 3 ("Rhenish") Symphony, with which the concert opened, and in the other orchestral numbers on the programme—Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" symphonic poem and Dvorak's familiar three Slavonic dances. The band was in fine form throughout, but it surpassed itself in the Strauss work, in which sensuous beauty and masses of tone-color of really remarkable warmth and loveliness are wrought with an originality and skill that no composer of to-day outrivals, adding, withal, an audacity of treatment that suggests Berlioz. The analytical programmes that were furnished were valuable in helping the listeners to perceive the purpose of the composer. Miss Geraldine Morgan, the soloist, made her début and a prompt and emphatic success together. In choosing the latest of Bruch's violin concertos she placed herself at a disadvantage. Repeated hearings of this work (Concerto in D minor, Op. 58) might win a better opinion for it, but, with all the advantage it had last night of an excellent soloist and an orchestra that was faultless, it seemed heavy and uninteresting, except in that it served to show Miss Morgan's ability to overcome very formidable technical difficulties and to play not particularly graceful music with distinct effectiveness. For a lady of almost fragile looking physical powers she displayed a surprisingly full and firm tone, and retained her powers in full to the last bar of extremely exacting work, in which she succeeded in keeping her instrument the centre of interest against the heavy scoring the author provided the orchestra. It should be added that Miss Morgan plays with elegance as well as with breadth, and that the audience emphasized its recognition of her sterling artistic qualities by extending to her repeated recalls.

The fifth concert will take place March 14.

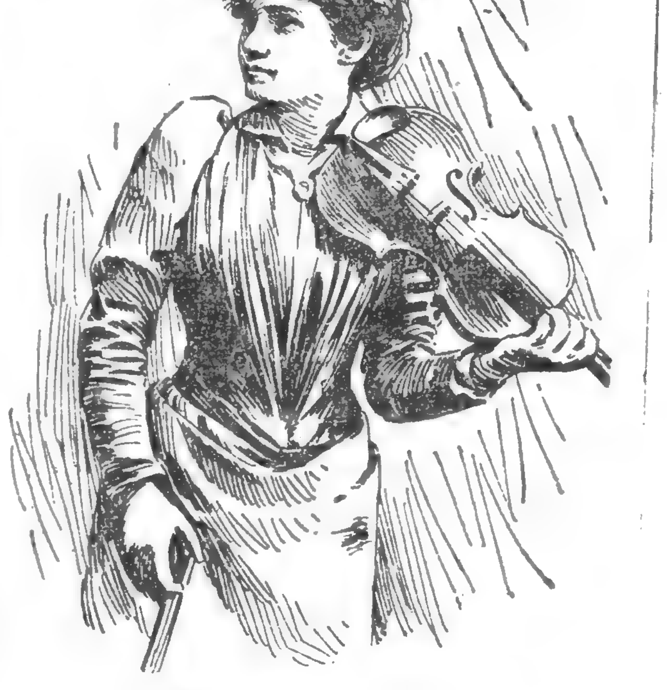
The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 9, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and Bruch's New Violin Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, has seldom given a more interesting and satisfactory concert than that which drew a crowd to the Academy of Music last evening. It was certainly the best of this season. Schumann's beautiful symphony in E flat, the Rhenish, was played in a manner that it can be no exaggeration to call perfect. This is music that Mr. Nikisch seems to feel completely, and its melody, its poetry, its religious sentiment he and his orchestra interpret with a purity and grace and an artistic power that are masterly. The treatment of the second movement was particularly brilliant in its entirety as well as in detail, and the elevated feeling given to the andante was very admirable. The "religious" movement Mr. Nikisch takes very slowly, almost as a funeral march, but the slowness is compensated for by a fine pomposity, and the finale was as bright and splendid as could be wished. It was altogether a noble execution of a noble work.



GERALDINE MORGAN.

The other important feature was Bruch's violin concerto in D minor, which had not been played here before, a composition of fine melodic inspiration and of masterly completeness. Large and broad in its ensemble effects, it is still what a modern concerto very often is not, essentially a solo work, the whole composition being developed directly from the violin part, which dominates it and which it constantly sustains. This very exacting work was taken by Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young American girl who has just returned from a period of European study lately under Joachim, and who made her home debut with gratifying success. To say that she showed the power which this large concerto called for would be absurd. It is work for a big masculine player. What she did show was a very exact and delicate technique, with a small, but pure and sweet singing tone and much tenderness and refinement of execution. Overweighted as she was with the concerto, she played it with astonishing accuracy and approved herself an artist of admirable training, entirely unaffected and true in her method, as she is modest and pleasing in appearance and with important possibilities before her.

The programme included also Richard Strauss' symphonic poem of "Don Juan" and some of Dvorak's Slavonic dances. The orchestra has never been heard to greater advantage than in this concert, especially in the symphony and the concerto.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large Audience at the Academy and a New Violinist.

The Academy of Music was completely filled in every part last night at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is probable that the attendance exceded that of any former event by this organization. The audience, however, was not in all respects discriminating. The program:

Schumann—Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97.
  Vivace.
  Molto moderato.
  Andante.
  Religioso.
  Vivace.
Bruch—Concerto for violin in D minor, Op. 58.
  Allegro energico.
  Adagio.
  Finale: Allegro molto.
    Miss Geraldine Morgan.
Richard Strauss—Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan."
Dvorak—Three Slavonic Dances.

The Rhenish symphony is a delightful composition, in which the composer seeks to record the impressions of a visit to Cologne during the installation of a cardinal archbishop, and the idea is well executed. The first vivace is a delightful piece of work, the religioso is full of rich harmony and the closing number is a deliciously free and rollicksome work. It was played magnificently throughout, being the most satisfactory work of this organization this winter.

The concerto of Bruch is a work of great musical beauty, full of opportunities for the virtuoso. Miss Morgan is a young artist of careful training. Her technique is excellent, but whether owing to nervousness or some other cause, she failed to put the warmth of feeling into her work which the composition demanded. She was warmly received by the audience. In truth, the work was too great for any one but a master to undertake. There are plenty of pleasing compositions for young artists which they can execute successfully, and the selection was unfortunate for Miss Morgan.

The "Don Juan" number is a poetic conception of a rising author. His "Italy" received great applause here, and "Don Juan" is of an equal grade of merit.

The work of the orchestra was highly successful last night. While there is room for honest differences as to the Mr. Nikisch's methods of producing great compositions, there is no doubt that he carries out his ideas wonderfully well. The accompaniment to the concerto last night was as perfect as could be conceived. On the whole it was the best concert given by the orchestra this season.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1892.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Fourth Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As is now invariably the case at these concerts, the audience was very large and distinctly fashionable. Scarcely a vacant seat was anywhere to be seen, and even the steps in the balcony aisles all had their occupants. How different from the old days when Theodore Thomas began the musical education of the public! Mr. Nikisch's programme last evening was composed exclusively of modern romantic music. The symphony was that by Schumann known as the "Rhenish," and in addition there were played Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," a symphonic poem, to use the rather affected nomenclature of the day, but really a free fantasia, descriptive of the career and ending of the gay Spanish gallant, and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak. In all these the work of the orchestra was superlatively fine. Perhaps its extraordinary brilliancy was most striking and conspicuous in the Strauss number, but only because the daring, complex and richly-colored score of the composer was singularly well adapted to show off orchestral virtuosity. Mr. Nikisch is in close sympathy with Schumann, and his reading of the symphony was exceedingly imaginative and sympathetic. All the beautiful poetry and sentiment of the work were appreciatively apprehended and effectively expressed, and indeed, if one could be permitted the use of that hackneyed phrase about a "new revelation" it would be properly applicable here. The soloist of the evening was Miss Geraldine Morgan, a young violinist pupil of Joachim, who introduced a D minor concerto by Bruch. Miss Morgan produces a clear sweet tone, stops well in tune, possesses considerable brilliancy of execution and displays a technique which bespeaks her training. But she has very little power, and her bowing lacks the breadth and freedom distinctive of first-class work. She was no doubt nervous, but Bruch's long, difficult, and in every way exacting concerto is a heavier task than should have been imposed upon her. Her fatigue towards the end was unmistakable. Miss Morgan is clever and must have worked hard, but to put her forward as the soloist at a Boston Symphony Concert is in every way unfair.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 9, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

There was the usual overflowing house at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard here for the fourth time this season. The programme was strictly modern in type, containing nothing earlier than Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, one of the most popular and most elaborate works of that great master of orchestral composition. The symphonic numbers, as well as Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak, were superbly rendered by Director Nikisch's orchestra. Bruch's splendid violin concerto in D Minor introduced as solo violinist Miss Geraldine Morgan, a slip of a girl, who, although scarcely ranking as yet among violin virtuosi, possesses a brilliant technique and the firm touch and fine genius of the true artist.

The Philadelphia Press. Feb 9

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Miss Geraldine Morgan, violinist, played the only solo at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening. She was enthusiastically received.

The audience was the largest that has attended a Boston Symphony Concert this season. Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were beautifully played by the orchestra.

[124]

Washington Post

~~N[illegible]D,~~

~~NEW [illegible]DAY, FEB[illegible] 10, 1892.~~

CAPTURED HER HEARERS

An Ovation to One of Washington's Talented Daughters.

HOME DEBUT OF MISS VON STOSCH

The Young Musician Charms Her Audience with Her Skill—Men and Women, Old and Young, Wildly Applaud Her at Last Night's Concert.

The Boston Symphony concert at the Congregational Church last night was extremely interesting for several reasons and to many in the audience particularly attractive because it marked the home debut of another of Washington's talented daughters.

The programme had an immense amount of individuality, and the orchestral numbers consisted of Wagner's "Faust" overture, Berlioz's "Pilgrim's March" (third movement), from the symphony "Harold in Italy," and a Schuman overture, Scherzo and Finale Op. 52. The "Faust" overture was intended to have been the first movement of a symphony which never was written. The complete solitude of Faust and the intensity of his emotions fill every measure. The motive was magnificently developed in the latter part.

The Berlioz Symphony March was the most extraordinary selection given, and was a surprise to all but a few of the audience. It is played but rarely in America, and during the sway of Nikisch it has had hardly a half dozen performances. It is one of the purest examples of Berlioz' originality. It has an eccentric dignity in spite of the fact that one continually wonders where the phrases will bring up and what possibly can be ahead. The audience applauded in a surprised way. It had heard something that it wasn't accustomed to, and was both startled and gratified. Mr. Franz Kneisel's viola solo was recognized with vigorous applause.

The most ambitious work was that of Schuman. The overture is particularly varied and bright, while the scherzo is apt to please a majority, because of the lively rhythm that permeates it, and even winds it up after a decided change has been alternated with the prevailing movement. In the finale the most sustained and vigorous work appeared.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who gave the aria, "O, Love, Aid Thou Me in My Weakness," from Saint-Saen's "Samson and Delilah," with the orchestra accompanying. She succeeded better, however, in a group of three French songs, for which Mrs. Wyman seemed in an appropriate mood, and probably the audience took more satisfaction in the sweet little "Bonne Unit" of Massenet than any of the group. Much of the effect of this group was due to the sympathetic accompaniments of Nikisch, who played them with the same leadership and guidance for the singer that he displays when waving the baton before his musicians.

The great feature of the night was the appearance of Miss Leonora von Stosch, a Washington girl, news of whose success had heralded her arrival here and made all violin lovers anxious to hear the new star, of whom it is said she has only to wait and work to taste the full measure that is accorded successful genius. Since her return to America Miss von Stosch has only played here for a few friends privately. She had chosen a Rondo Capricciosso of Saint-Saens. In itself it was varied and lace like enough to give the artiste every opportunity to display her ability. She plays with precision and well-regulated fervor, combined with brilliancy. There was also an unusual freedom of movement that is seen rarely.

A success was assured, for, beyond the welcome given on her appearance, the audience wouldn't wait, but filled the rests with outbursts of applause. It was the famous Stradivarius, about which so much has been said, on which she laid the bow, and Miss von Stosch is to be congratulated on having so rare and mellow an instrument.

When Miss von Stosch drew out the last note and dropped the violin it was an ovation. Not only men but women, old and young, swelled the applause that kept growing louder as she acknowledged the magnificent floral tributes brought forward and repeatedly returned to the stage to bow her acknowledgments. Miss von Stosch may have many triumphs in the years to come, but rarely will there be one more full of pride or a sincerer tribute than last night's. To complete it Nikisch broke his hitherto iron-clad regulation, and the young artist played the first prelude to a Bach sonata. At the close of the concert Miss von Stosch received the congratulations of many. She leaves to-day for an extended trip of some weeks.

The house was filled in every part, and if anything the concert was more successful even than the previous two.

The Evening Post.

New York, Wednesday, Feb. 10, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was certainly nothing conventional about the programme of the Boston Symphony Society's concert at Chickering Hall last evening. Works more widely different in style could not have been easily found than a Handel concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs (F Major), and Berlioz's Harold Symphony and Wagner's "'Lohengrin' prelude and selections from 'Die Götterdämmerung.'" The Handel concerto proved very old fashioned, indeed. In the first four movements there was little to arouse interest, and the audience damned them with faint applause. In the second movement, however, there was a pretty echo effect for the horns, while in the final movement a quaint and coquettish oboe duo roused the enthusiasm of the audience.

The Berlioz symphony, which, like the Handel concerto, was superbly conducted and played, once more called attention to the fact that, if only Berlioz could have occasionally had a few original thematic ideas, he would have been one of the greatest composers of all time. He has, indeed, an abundance of ideas, but they all relate to the style of expression and to original details of orchestration. In this respect the Harold symphony is as interesting as it is otherwise tedious. The most original feature is, of course, the solo viola part. Berlioz had intended this work at first for a concerto for the viola, to meet a wish of Paganini's. But the king of violinists found that there was not enough opportunity for display to suit his ambition, so Berlioz altered the plan of his work and made a programme symphony of it. As he says himself: "It came into my head to write a series of scenes for orchestra, in which the solo viola should take part as a more or less active dramatis persona, but always preserving its own proper character. By placing the viola in the midst of the poetic memories I had kept of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, I wished to make it a sort of melancholy dreamer, like Byron's Childe Harold." It certainly was a "melancholy dreamer" in the hands of Mr. Kneisel, who played this part in a simply exquisite manner, poetic in every bar, and with an astounding beauty of tonal coloring that made one wonder why we so often hear concertos for violin and for 'cello, but never any for the viola. Here is a hint for our American composers. Regarding the Wagner selections we need only say that they received the warmest applause of the evening, and that they were played in a manner that brought out all the themes clearly and impressively, but there was lacking a certain dramatic abandon and gradual working up of a climax to which we are accustomed in New York.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

By all means the best orchestral concert which has been heard here this season, both in point of the intrinsic interest of the programme and the supreme excellence of its interpretation, was the one which was given in Chickering Hall last evening by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his incomparable symphony orchestra. The concert opened with Handel's wonderfully interesting concerto for strings and two wind choirs, which was a source of unqualified enjoyment to those who are not wholly given over to the sensuousness and intricacy of modern musical compositions of a similar form. The entire concerto was played in strict obedience to the character of the music and traditional requirements. The work of the strings was as near perfection as such playing can possibly be, the work of the horns was excellent and the oboes mastered the extreme difficulties of the last movement with remarkable ease and precision. There are five movements in this concerto, of which the largo and the last allegro are particularly beautiful. It is replete with Handelian mannerisms, and the instrumentalism is frequently antiphonal in character, but it is full of a quaint charm and wonderfully beautiful in parts.

The symphony performed at this concert was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played with extraordinary skill and facility by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who infused into the entire work a large element of sentiment and poetic revery. The March of the Pilgrims, the Serenade of a Mountaineer and the frantic Orgy of the Brigands, with their striking contrasts and their marvellous beauties, were all given to perfection, and demonstrated more conclusively than anything else they have played here this year the unquestionable superiority of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra over any other in this country, or, as Mr. Paderewski affirms, in the world.

The remaining numbers were the over-overture to "Lohengrin" and selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter. While Mr. Nikisch's readings of Wagner may lack some of the fire and brilliancy which Mr. Seidl imparts to his, they are more scholarly and consistent, and technically are always more accurate.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chickering Hall last night, Mr. Nikisch treated his patrons to as sharp a contrast between new and old as the astronomers tell us exists between sunlight and shadow on the moon. Handel, Berlioz and Wagner were the composers drawn on. The first contributed one of those archaic compositions much affected by instrumental writers two centuries ago—a Concerto Grosso. But even among works of this class the Handel composition was something of an exception, for it is a concerto for strings with two accompanying choirs of wind instruments. We cannot recall that this music had ever been played in New-York before, and since it gave a glimpse of Handel from a rather unfamiliar point of view, Mr. Nikisch's experiment must be set down as successful. It might be questioned whether it was as much his purpose to give a lesson in musical history (the combination of pieces in the list looked a little that way), as to exhibit the skill of his horn and oboe players, for the composition exacts a great deal from those members of the band, and its exactions were met in a manner that increased the admiration which all judicious lovers of orchestral music have long felt for the musical itinerants from Boston. Nevertheless, the music was more interesting for its disclosure of Handel's skill as a writer for orchestral instruments, a skill which the ordinary concert-goer, who knows him chiefly, if not wholly, in his oratorios, has hitherto had to believe in on the authority of the musical historians. His treatment of the wind choirs (two horns, two bassoons and two oboes) in the concertante manner gave such unusual fulness and interesting color to the music, and brought up so many suggestions of devices which have popularly been supposed to date back no further than Weber, that despite the archaic form and the ingenuousness of the melodies, the concerto was heard with no small degree of curiosity and pleasure. The device of dialogue treatment which runs all through the work has a particularly striking exemplification in the last movement, a gigue, in which the cackling conversation of the oboes, their interruptions of each other and duets, has a deliciously humorous effect. Mr. Nikisch did not go outside his band for a solo attraction, but nevertheless gave us one of the most delightful solo treats of the season, in assigning Mr. Kneisel to play the viola obbligato in the smyphony which Berlioz labelled "Harold in Italy," and which was the second number on the concert scheme. We have frequently had occasion to speak in terms of warm praise of Mr. Kneisel, but his performance last night on the much-abused viola was so ravishing in its beauty that it seems as if scant justice had been done heretofore to the musicianly instincts, the exquisite taste and the faultless technical skill of the Boston principal Certain it is that the innate nobility of the instrument itself, its quality of dreaminess and tender melancholy, its luscious ripeness of tone, have never been exhibited here, for a dozen years, at least, as they were by Mr. Kneisel. His performance, coupled with the reading which Mr. Nikisch gave the work, went as far as anything could toward justifying the selection of the so-called symphony for performance. Berlioz's "Childe Harold" is not only the baldest kind of programme music, in which the imagination receives its impulse from the title and description, instead of the music—it is also a travesty on Byron's poem which a lover of poetry finds it hard to forgive. Nothing could better have held up its hollow pretentiousness and penury of idea to notice than the music which followed it last night: the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Hans Richter's arrangement for concert purposes of three scenes from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Both of these pieces were performed superbly, and closed the evening with the enthusiasm of the audience wrought up to an exciting climax.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Chickering Hall. This orchestra is to give only two more concerts in this city this season. The programme last night consisted of the following numbers: Concerto in F major for string orchestra and two wind choirs, Handel; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Hector Berlioz; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung," Wagner, arranged by Hans Richter.

Handel was born in 1685 and died in 1759, but the concerto which was played last night was unfamiliar to New-York audiences. It is supposed to have been written between 1737 and 1740, and in manuscript covers eighty-four pages of paper. It consists of nine movements. These were not all performed last night, only five being given.

The Berlioz symphony called "Harold in Italy" was inspired by Lord Byron's poem, "Childe Harold." The composer used a viola solo to represent the voice of the hero, while the orchestra played music intended to suggest the scenes through which he passed. The symphony consists of four movements named as follows: "Harold in the Mountains," "March of the Pilgrims," "Serenade of a Mountaineer," and "Orgy of the Brigands." The viola solo was played last night by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who is the leader of the first violins in the orchestra.

The audience quite filled the house, and the applause was very hearty, especially after the fourth movement of the Handel concerto, the second and third movements of the Berlioz symphony, and the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin."

—The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given at Music Hall, Seventh Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, on Friday evening. Beethoven's quartet in G major, Opus 18, the variations from Schubert's quartet in D minor, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, Opus 74, will be played.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 63-63 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Handel Concerto Heard for the First Time in New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave their fourth concert at Chickering Hall last night. The following was the programme:

Concerto in F major.......................Handel
For String Orchestra and Two Wind Choirs.
Symphony, "Harold in Italy"..............Berlioz
(Viola Solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin"......................Wagner
Concert Suite, from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung"......................Wagner
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)

The novelty on the programme was the Handel Concerto, which was heard for the first time in New York. After having lain forgotten for over eighty years, this really spirited and original work, the date of whose composition and first production are alike unknown, was rescued from oblivion and again given to the world by Ernst Jchuch, Kappelmeister at Leipsic, about two years ago. It was performed for the first time in America during the present season in Boston. The work is written for the string quartet and two wind choirs, each consisting of two horns, two oboes and two bassoons.

The five movements of the work as played last night were condensed into the form of a concert suite from the nine original movements composed by Handel. While markedly Handelian in style and full of material which the composer has made use of in other and later compositions, the entire work is fresh and spontaneous to a degree, and in many ways surprisingly modern in spirit and treatment. There seems, indeed, nothing about it either formally stilted or old-fashioned, and its revival was a wise move on the part of Mr. Nikisch as a far more than merely antiquarian interest attaches to the work. The rare quality of tone, purity and precision of the strings were especially noticeable in the rendering of this number, while the exceedingly difficult passages allotted to the wind choirs, particularly for the oboes, were faultlessly played. The entire work was very well received.

Despite its many incidental beauties and an exceedingly vivid, picturesque and highly finished and forcible reading and interpretation on the part of Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Kneisel and the symphony orchestra the "Harold in Italy" symphony, once considered the acme of musical daring and eccentricity, it must be confessed struck one as somewhat dull and long drawn out. There is a certain languor and monotony about the viola part, beautiful and original as it is, which seems to both curtail and limit the composer's inspiration and prevent the work from reaching really great height.

With the original intention to compose a symphony at his request for Paginini where a solo violin should play an important part Berlioz for some reason changed his mind, and the symphony heard last night—which has little or nothing to do with the Byronic poem—was the result of an afterthought. The well-known "Marche des Pelerius," charmingly fantastic as it is, made its customary effect. The audience would evidently have heard it again with pleasure. The last movement, the "Brigand's Orgy," was exceedingly well played and acquired a quite new breadth, dignity and distinction at Mr. Nikisch's hands.

A better example of well-considered, balanced, artistic and enormously effective climax than the rendering of the "Lohengrin" Prelude could hardly be imagined. Mr. Nikisch, as of right, reads his Wagner from a purely dramatic standpoint, and his effects, viewed in this light, are not only striking but legitimate.

The last number on the programme was an arrangement by Dr. Richter for concert use of certain parts of "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung." It was described on the programme as "Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," which sounds like an exceedingly clumsy translation by an unskilled hand. The arrangement, though effective in parts, lacked continuity and cohesiveness and produced something of the effect of an operatic potpourri rather than that of a single orchestral number, which was doubtless tha intention. The length of the piece is relatively so short and the number of motives touched upon, singly and in contrapuntal combinations, so large that a certain feeling of diffuseness and disjointed interest was inevitable. Mr. Nikisch certainly made the most of the number, and was ably seconded by the orchestra. As a whole the concert was a trifle severe in tone, and lacked the contrast that a well-defined solo number or numbers always give to a programme of purely instrumental music.

N.Y. Herald Feb. '92

~~The Washington Post.~~

~~WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 11, 1892.~~

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Certainly nothing could be added from my recollection last night which would have made the concert given by the Boston Symphony Society in Chickering Hall more perfect. The band, the conductor—Mr. Nikisch—and the audience were in that delightful harmony of sentiment which makes of a concert a memorable event.

The most delightful part of the programme was its closing number—Hans Richter's arrangement of Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," including the passage to Brunhild's rock, the dawn and the Rhine journey. The reading of Richter's arrangement was such as might have been expected from Mr. Nikisch, but it was nevertheless a surprise, inasmuch as its profoundly dramatic force was realized with an exquisite perception of all of the possibilities of this gloriou music of Wagner.

Apart from the novelty here of Berlioz's sym phony "Harold in Italy," the audience was quickl responsive to the solo work of Franz Kneisel o the viola. The first movement gave the artist th best opportunities to display his phrasing and th tonal possibilities of his instrument, and of thes he took ample advantage. The playing of the band especially in the fourth and final movement, th allegro frenetico, was so delightful in quality as t be beyond praise.

The programme opened with Handel's concert for string orchestra and two wind choirs in major, which was given a scholarly and particu larly interesting interpretation. The largo an allegro movements were given with especial grace The prelude to "Lohengrin" was the only othe number, and the work of the strings in the gra motifs of this was as delicate as has ever bee heard in this city.

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1892.

THEY WERE ENTHUSIASTIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is in High Favor.

A packed house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert last evening in the Academy of Music Concert Hall. The enthusiasm which followed the opening number—the overture to "Der Freischutz"—showed the temper of the audience, while the Berlioz march from the symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo charmingly rendered by Mr. Franz Kusisel, had to be repeated. The soloists for the evening were Mrs. Julia Wyman, who made in this concert her first appearance before a Baltimore audience, and Mr. Richard Burmeister, who has made himself the favorite in this community, as well as in all others where he has been heard. Mrs. Wyman sang the grand aria, "O Love, aid thou me in my weakness," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delila," in superb style. She also gave three songs, which established her ability to render ballads as well. She has a full, round, rich contralto voice, under perfect control, and her singing is artistic in the highest degree.

Prof. Burmeister achieved one of the greatest triumphs of his life in the perfect rendition of the Liszt A major piano concerto with this fine band of musicians. The work is varied, capricious and almost fantastical as a concerto—somber one moment and brilliant the next, the movements closely connected and following without pauses; but the effects are masterly and in utter contrast with the set forms and methods of the old classic school. But throughout all the piano came out grandly, holding its own at every point. Prof. Burmeister received an ovation of enthusiasm at its close.

The concert ended with Goldmark's showy symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," which was also highly enjoyed. Although D'Albert is not yet in America, he is booked as the next soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the Symphony concert on Saturday evening, Feb. 6, was:

Handel.	Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, in F major. (By special request.)
Otto Floersheim.	Prelude and Fugue. (First time at these Concerts.)
Saint-Saëns.	Symphonic Poem. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Berlioz.	Symphony. "Harold in Italy." (Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

The Handel Concerto was played by this orchestra a few weeks since with a good degree of merit and musical effect, though it is not, generally speaking, a work of much orchestral interest. As a novelty, or, we should say, a reminder of Handel's style of writing, it furnishes a good example. Why any one should ask to have this concerto repeated, is one of the incomprehensible humors of the present time. That it was given the second time is no credit to the director or his superb orchestra, for we do not remember when this band has done such coarse, bad work. There was hardly a moment when the instruments seemed in tune or accord during its performance. The playing of this piece must have been undertaken at a moment's notice, as in no other way can such playing be accounted for.

The Prelude and Fugue by Floersheim furnished a pleasing novelty. The theme is interesting, especially where the two clarinets play a duet in fourths in rather fantastic style. We believe the author claims great religious fervency for his composition, but it would seem to be a too fanciful picture to be considered deeply religious. As an interesting composition it possesses merit, and is a success. The orchestra deserves praise for its careful attention in giving the piece a successful presentation. The clarinets particularly did themselves credit in their part.

"Le Rouet d'Omphale" is not one of St. Saëns's masterpieces; at least, it failed to produce that exhilarating effect usual with this master's writings. The orchestra, or, perhaps the director, failed to grasp its most salient points, and thus the hidden beauties of the author's thoughts were left concealed in the elaborate score placed on the conductor's stand.

The symphony, "Harold in Italy," is of colossal intentions and proportions. Here we have pictured, through the ear drums, people tussling with melancholy; experiencing happiness, joy, delight; the marching of the pilgrims, singing their evening prayer: a mountaineer serenading his lady-love from one of the highest peaks of his retreat, ending with an orgy of wild confusion in which all the previous beautiful things said are recalled. Berlioz is one of the greatest of modern orchestral composers; he has done more to perfect the modern orchestra than any other, even to Wagner; yet with all his knowledge and great resources he has not succeeded here in making a satisfactory picture from his standpoint. The music, as music, is rich in color and beautiful to listen to; no exception can be taken to it: but that it pictures through the ear what the author claims, is a thing not consistent in the present state of the human faculties. Perhaps in some future state, where the faculties have become more conveniently enlarged than they are on this earth, man may become capable of comprehending everything through one sense alone. Mr. Nikisch accomplished a decidedly sensational pianissimo during the evening. He therefore scores one.

James M. Tracy.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Society was listened to by a large audience in Chickering Hall Tuesday night, Feb. 9. This was the program: Concerto in F for string orchestra and two wind choirs, Handel; Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Rhine journey, Wagner.

The antiphonal concerto proved to be a novelty to almost every one in the audience. The work is superior to most of Handel's instrumental pieces, and with exception of a few reminiscences from Scarlatti and Corelli it is comparatively modern in effect and will bear repetition. The oboe has some difficult scale work in the concerto, and the horn parts are also troublesome in certain movements. This was especially manifest through the partial failure of the first and second corni. Mr. Nikisch was wise in omitting four of the nine numbers in this concerto.

The symphony inspired partly by Byron's "Childe Harold," and partly by the composer's own experiences in Italy, received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra most excellent treatment, and it is well worth the 20,000 francs which Paganini gave for the dedication. Berlioz many-hued orchestral pictures and kaleidoscopic tonal combinations find their most appreciative interpreter in Mr. Nikisch, who seems to have a decided penchant for modern descriptive works.

The Wagner selections won merited applause. In the Lohengrin prelude the beautiful quality of the strings was particularly manifest and the brass performances were more creditable in the last number than in the first. Mention should also be made of the charming solo for violin in the Berlioz symphony and of Mr. Franz Kneisel's able interpretation

Handel and Haydn Society Performs Mrs. Beach's Mass in E Flat.

Both Boston and Dr. H. H. A. Beach ought to be equally proud that one of our own girls, who has not yet reached here five-and-twentieth summer, can write such a work as the Mass in E flat, sung, for the first time in public, at the 681st concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, last Sunday, Feb. 7. While Miss Cheney she was known favorably as a pianist, and since she became Mrs. Beach minor compositions have fallen from her pen; but even those who had studied its score were hardly prepared for so excellent a work as this Mass, inspired, not by sectarian feeling (for though I believe Mrs. Beach attends the somewhat extreme ritualistic Church of the Advent, she is not a Romanist), but by musical devotion. The audience was large and included many personal friends, albeit the night was inclement. As usual, Lang was the organist and Zerrahn the conductor. The solo artists were Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Italo Campanini, tenor; Emil Fischer, bass.

The Kyrie (quartet and chorus) is arranged for organ, strings wood wind, and two horns, and at once impresses you, not only with the strong character of the whole work, but with the composers careful indications on the score. For the second number four horns, three trombones, three trumpets, and a kettledrum are added, making the Gloria (tenor and chorus) vigorous as well as melodious. In the Laudamus (trio and alto solo) a fine effect is produced by the muted strings. It was noticeable (contrary to the common custom) that the soloist gave the hard sound to the letter g in agimus and unigenite, in her capital vocalization of this number. Better yet is the Qui Tollis (quartet and chorus) wherein the oboe and English horn give beautiful results toward the closing Miserere; and there is precious harmony in the quartet which follows the alto chorus, in six flats, and precedes, with modulation by the horns, the soprano chorus in D, which breaks the key for eight bars only. The quoniam chorus takes the full orchestra into its counsel, and is very spirited.

In the published score there is no Graduale; but one was sung by Campanini, a very sweet and solemn Madonna benediction, fitting prelude to the long Credo (soprano solo and chorus), arranged for full orchestra and organ. A slower religious interlude leads to the Incarnatus, for which Mrs. Walker's voice and method specially qualify her; and the chorus strike in with an energetic Resurrexit. The Sanctus (quartet and chorus) is full of wind strength, but happily dispenses with the organ. The Benedictus (basso and chorus) was the one unsatisfactory number, the bass notes failing to respond to the soloist's demands, though he was cordially applauded. The closing Agnus Dei (quartet and chorus) is made more sweet and soothing, "like to the benediction, which follows after prayer," by the tones of Mr. Schnecker's harp; and the composition closes with pianissimo strains, divided between bassoon, clarinet, oboe and flute, each taking a measure.

It is said the singers found it hard to master the Mass, but this was not apparent in their finished performance. Zerrahn and other musicians also regard it as a difficult work, but the achievement was worth the pains.

New Hampshire may well rejoice in this her daughter, who was born in the little town of Henniker, September 5, 1867. The applause was generous and genuine when presently she entered the hall, leaning on the arm of Secretary Charles W. Stone, and ascended the platform,—followed by a floral pyramid almost too big for Usher Hartshorn to handle,—to play the piano part in the one other selection on the program, Beethoven's Choral Fantasy, on words by Kuffner.

> Soft and sweet through ether winging,
> Sound the harmonies of life.

The instrumental parts of the introduction were fairly played, but the singing was rather weak and the attack lame. The gentlemen were not up to the mark of such expressive words; though the four prominent soloists were increased by two members of the Society, Priscilla White and Colonel I. F. Kingsbury, to complete the sextet.

Is it not wonderful to remember that when this fantasy was produced in 1808, at Vienna, under Beethoven's own direction, it was in company with his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, and other new works. A giant programme. The fantasy was given by our venerable society nine years ago, and not again till this evening.

All honor to the Handels and Haydns for giving a chance to native art in the person of a fair daughter of New England.

Not only the structure of Mrs. Beach's Mass, but the freshness of her themes has drawn high praise from the ablest judges.

J. H. W.

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1892.

—It was generous of the Sun to say of our Symphony orchestra's performance in New York last Tuesday night that "no more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given." Apropos of these concerts in town Mrs. Nikisch has been ill again, and at Brooklyn Friday and in New York last night Mrs. Wyman took her place as soloist.

—Mrs. Wyman sang Wednesday with the Symphony orchestra in Washington, Friday, while fulfilling a similar engagement in New York, she was the guest of Mrs. Holbrook Curtis, who gave a brilliant musicale for her last night.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met with its accustomed success in its tour of last week. Mrs. Julia Wyman and Richard Burmeister were the solo artists in Baltimore, where the hall was literally packed. In Washington Miss Leonora von Stosch was the great feature of the evening, but Mrs. Wyman and Mr. Kneisel also won hearty recognition.

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, February 9, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1892.

THEY WERE ENTHUSIASTIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is in High Favor.

A packed house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert last evening in the Academy of Music Concert Hall. The enthusiasm which followed the opening number—the overture to "Der Freischutz"—showed the temper of the audience, while the Berlioz march from the symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo charmingly rendered by Mr. Franz Kusisel, had to be repeated. The soloists for the evening were Mrs. Julia Wyman, who made in this concert her first appearance before a Baltimore audience, and Mr. Richard Burmeister, who has made himself the favorite in this community, as well as in all others where he has been heard. Mrs. Wyman sang the grand aria, "O Love, aid thou me in my weakness," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delila," in superb style. She also gave three songs, which established her ability to render ballads as well. She has a full, round, rich contralto voice, under perfect control, and her singing is artistic in the highest degree.

Prof. Burmeister achieved one of the greatest triumphs of his life in the perfect rendition of the Liszt A major piano concerto with this fine band of musicians. The work is varied, capricious and almost fantastical as a concerto—somber one moment and brilliant the next, the movements closely connected and following without pauses; but the effects are masterly and in utter contrast with the set forms and methods of the old classic school. But throughout all the piano came out grandly, holding its own at every point. Prof. Burmeister received an ovation of enthusiasm at its close.

The concert ended with Goldmark's showy symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," which was also highly enjoyed. Although D'Albert is not yet in America, he is booked as the next soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the Symphony concert on Saturday evening, Feb. 6, was:

Handel.	Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, in F major. (By special request.)
Otto Floersheim.	Prelude and Fugue. (First time at these Concerts.)
Saint-Saëns.	Symphonic Poem. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Berlioz.	Symphony. "Harold in Italy." (Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

The Handel Concerto was played by this orchestra a few weeks since with a good degree of merit and musical effect, though it is not, generally speaking, a work of much orchestral interest. As a novelty, or, we should say, a reminder of Handel's style of writing, it furnishes a good example. Why any one should ask to have this concerto repeated, is one of the incomprehensible humors of the present time. That it was given the second time is no credit to the director or his superb orchestra, for we do not remember when this band has done such coarse, bad work. There was hardly a moment when the instruments seemed in tune or accord during its performance. The playing of this piece must have been undertaken at a moment's notice, as in no other way can such playing be accounted for.

The Prelude and Fugue by Floersheim furnished a pleasing novelty. The theme is interesting, especially where the two clarinets play a duet in fourths in rather fantastic style. We believe the author claims great religious fervency for his composition, but it would seem to be a too fanciful picture to be considered deeply religious. As an interesting composition it possesses merit, and is a success. The orchestra deserves praise for its careful attention in giving the piece a successful presentation. The clarinets particularly did themselves credit in their part.

"Le Rouet d'Omphale" is not one of St. Saëns's masterpieces; at least, it failed to produce that exhilarating effect usual with this master's writings. The orchestra, or, perhaps the director, failed to grasp its most salient points, and thus the hidden beauties of the author's thoughts were left concealed in the elaborate score placed on the conductor's stand.

The symphony, "Harold in Italy," is of colossal intentions and proportions. Here we have pictured, through the ear drums, people tussling with melancholy; experiencing happiness, joy, delight; the marching of the pilgrims, singing their evening prayer: a mountaineer serenading his lady-love from one of the highest peaks of his retreat, ending with an orgy of wild confusion in which all the previous beautiful things said are recalled. Berlioz is one of the greatest of modern orchestral composers; he has done more to perfect the modern orchestra than any other, even to Wagner; yet with all his knowledge and great resources he has not succeeded here in making a satisfactory picture from his standpoint. The music, as music, is rich in color and beautiful to listen to; no exception can be taken to it: but that it pictures through the ear what the author claims, is a thing not consistent in the present state of the human faculties. Perhaps in some future state, where the faculties have become more conveniently enlarged than they are on this earth, man may become capable of comprehending everything through one sense alone. Mr. Nikisch accomplished a decidedly sensational pianissimo during the evening. He therefore scores one.

JAMES M. TRACY.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Society was listened to by a large audience in Chickering Hall Tuesday night, Feb. 9. This was the program: Concerto in F for string orchestra and two wind choirs, Handel; Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's rock, morning dawn, and Rhine journey, Wagner.

The antiphonal concerto proved to be a novelty to almost every one in the audience. The work is superior to most of Handel's instrumental pieces, and with exception of a few reminiscences from Scarlatti and Corelli it is comparatively modern in effect and will bear repetition. The oboe has some difficult scale work in the concerto, and the horn parts are also troublesome in certain movements. This was especially manifest through the partial failure of the first and second corni. Mr. Nikisch was wise in omitting four of the nine numbers in this concerto.

The symphony inspired partly by Byron's "Childe Harold," and partly by the composer's own experiences in Italy, received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra most excellent treatment, and it is well worth the 20,000 francs which Paganini gave for the dedication. Berlioz many-hued orchestral pictures and kaleidoscopic tonal combinations find their most appreciative interpreter in Mr. Nikisch, who seems to have a decided penchant for modern descriptive works.

The Wagner selections won merited applause. In the Lohengrin prelude the beautiful quality of the strings was particularly manifest and the brass performances were more creditable in the last number than in the first. Mention should also be made of the charming solo for violin in the Berlioz symphony and of Mr. Franz Kneisel's able interpretation

Handel and Haydn Society Performs Mrs. Beach's Mass in E Flat.

BOTH Boston and Dr. H. H. A. Beach ought to be equally proud that one of our own girls, who has not yet reached here five-and-twentieth summer, can write such a work as the Mass in E flat, sung, for the first time in public, at the 681st concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, last Sunday, Feb. 7. While Miss Cheney she was known favorably as a pianist, and since she became Mrs. Beach minor compositions have fallen from her pen; but even those who had studied its score were hardly prepared for so excellent a work as this Mass, inspired, not by sectarian feeling (for though I believe Mrs. Beach attends the somewhat extreme ritualistic Church of the Advent, she is not a Romanist), but by musical devotion. The audience was large and included many personal friends, albeit the night was inclement. As usual, Lang was the organist and Zerrahn the conductor. The solo artists were Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Italo Campanini, tenor; Emil Fischer, bass.

The Kyrie (quartet and chorus) is arranged for organ, strings wood wind, and two horns, and at once impresses you, not only with the strong character of the whole work, but with the composers careful indications on the score. For the second number four horns, three trombones, three trumpets, and a kettledrum are added, making the Gloria (tenor and chorus) vigorous as well as melodious. In the Laudamus (trio and alto solo) a fine effect is produced by the muted strings. It was noticeable (contrary to the common custom) that the soloist gave the hard sound to the letter g in agimus and unigenite, in her capital vocalization of this number. Better yet is the Qui Tollis (quartet and chorus) wherein the oboe and English horn give beautiful results toward the closing Miserere; and there is precious harmony in the quartet which follows the alto chorus, in six flats, and precedes, with modulation by the horns, the soprano chorus in D, which breaks the key for eight bars only. The quoniam chorus takes the full orchestra into its counsel, and is very spirited.

In the published score there is no Graduale; but one was sung by Campanini, a very sweet and solemn Madonna benediction, fitting prelude to the long Credo (soprano solo and chorus), arranged for full orchestra and organ. A slower religious interlude leads to the Incarnatus, for which Mrs. Walker's voice and method specially qualify her; and the chorus strike in with an energetic Resurrexit. The Sanctus (quartet and chorus) is full of wind strength, but happily dispenses with the organ. The Benedictus (basso and chorus) was the one unsatisfactory number, the bass notes failing to respond to the soloist's demands, though he was cordially applauded. The closing Agnus Dei (quartet and chorus) is made more sweet and soothing, "like to the benediction, which follows after prayer," by the tones of Mr. Schnecker's harp; and the composition closes with pianissimo strains, divided between bassoon, clarinet, oboe and flute, each taking a measure.

It is said the singers found it hard to master the Mass, but this was not apparent in their finished performance. Zerrahn and other musicians also regard it as a difficult work, but the achievement was worth the pains.

New Hampshire may well rejoice in this her daughter, who was born in the little town of Henniker, September 5, 1867. The applause was generous and genuine when presently she entered the hall, leaning on the arm of Secretary Charles W. Stone, and ascended the platform,—followed by a floral pyramid almost too big for Usher Hartshorn to handle,—to play the piano part in the one other selection on the program, Beethoven's Choral Fantasy, on words by Kuffner.

> Soft and sweet through ether winging,
> Sound the harmonies of life.

The instrumental parts of the introduction were fairly played, but the singing was rather weak and the attack lame. The gentlemen were not up to the mark of such expressive words; though the four prominent soloists were increased by two members of the Society, Priscilla White and Colonel I. F. Kingsbury, to complete the sextet.

Is it not wonderful to remember that when this fantasy was produced in 1808, at Vienna, under Beethoven's own direction, it was in company with his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, and other new works. A giant programme. The fantasy was given by our venerable society nine years ago, and not again till this evening.

All honor to the Handels and Haydns for giving a chance to native art in the person of a fair daughter of New England.

Not only the structure of Mrs. Beach's Mass, but the freshness of her themes has drawn high praise from the ablest judges.

J. H. W.

◆

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1892.

—It was generous of the Sun to say of our Symphony orchestra's performance in New York last Tuesday night that "no more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given." Apropos of these concerts in town Mrs. Nikisch has been ill again, and at Brooklyn Friday and in New York last night Mrs. Wyman took her place as soloist.

—Mrs. Wyman sang Wednesday with the Symphony orchestra in Washington, Friday, while fulfilling a similar engagement in New York, she was the guest of Mrs. Holbrook Curtis, who gave a brilliant musicale for her last night.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met with its accustomed success in its tour of last week. Mrs. Julia Wyman and Richard Burmeister were the solo artists in Baltimore, where the hall was literally packed. In Washington Miss Leonora von Stosch was the great feature of the evening, but Mrs. Wyman and Mr. Kneisel also won hearty recognition.

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, February 9, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON - 1891-92

PROGRAMME

④

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. HELEN HOPEKIRK and Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in G major, op. 18. Allegro.—Adagio cantabile.—Scherzo (Allegro). Allegro molto, quasi presto.
MENDELSSOHN.	SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO.
SCHUBERT.	QUINTET in C major, op. 163. Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio.— Scherzo.—Finale (Allegretto).

Sixth Concert, Monday Evening, March 7th.

The postponed Fourth Concert, with Mme. FANNY BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER, Soloist, will be given at the close of the season.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, AT 8, P. M.

SEASON 1891-92.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace.— Larghetto.— Scherzo.— Allegro animato e grazioso.
SAINT-SAENS.	ARIA. "O Love aid thou me in my weakness." from "Samson and Dalila."
SAINT-SAENS.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet d' Omphale."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	LAST MOVEMENT. (Theme with Variations) from SUITE, op. 55.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
DELIBES.	"REGRETS."
MASSENET.	"BONNE NUIT."
FERRARI.	"A UNE FIANCEE."
WAGNER.	PRELUDE. "Lohengrin."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Tannhæuser."

SOLOIST:

MRS. JULIE L. WYMAN.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

[illegible]

Freitag, 12. Februar 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter. — Der große Conzertſaal der Muſik-Akademie an Nord-Howardſtr. war geſtern Abend wieder bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt von einem enthuſiaſtiſchen Auditorium, um dem vierten Conzerte des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſters zu lauſchen. Die Conzerte dieſes Orcheſters ſind in Baltimore ſehr populär geworden. Alle Muſikfreunde ſehen denſelben mit Spannung entgegen. Das Spiel dieſes Orcheſters iſt aber auch von einer Feinheit und Gediegenheit, welche den ſchärfſten Kritiker befriedigen muß. Unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten iſt es auf einer Höhe der Kunſt angekommen, die nur von wenigen anderen Orcheſtern erreicht wurde; wie könnte es aber auch anders ſein? Jeder Spieler iſt ein Künſtler auf ſeinem Inſtrumente, der die Schule des Zuſammenſpiels unter den früheren Dirigenten des Orcheſters, Henſchel und Gericke, und jetzt unter Nikiſch durchgemacht hat. Geſtern Abend gab ſich die Befriedigung des dankbaren Publikums in beſonders ſtürmiſchem Beifall kund.

Die „Freiſchütz"-Ouvertüre von C. M. von Weber, in der der deutſche Geiſt ſo recht ausgeprägt wird, wurde von dem Orcheſter in vollendeter Schönheit wiedergegeben. Der „Pilger-Marſch" aus der Symphonie „Harold in Italien", mit einem obligaten Bratſchen-Solo, vorgetragen von Hrn. Franz Kneiſel, bildete den Glanzpunkt des Abends. Der Marſch iſt nicht nur durch ſein ſtoiſches Tempo beſonders anziehend und packend, ſondern das Viola- oder Bratſchen-Solo verlieh ihm beſonderen Reiz und Eleganz. Es iſt dies eine der wenigen Compoſitionen, in denen dem untergeordneten Inſtrumente, der Viola, eine hervorragende Rolle zugetheilt iſt. Dieſelbe wurde auch von Hrn. Kneiſel mit Bravour wiedergegeben, wofür ſich das Publikum durch wiederholten Applaus erkenntlich zeigte. Größerer Applaus iſt wohl noch keinem Muſikſtücke in dem Conzertſaale geſpendet worden. Es zeigte ſich ſo recht deutlich, daß nicht die lärmende und geräuſchvolle, ſondern die gediegene Muſik den meiſten Anklang findet. Mit der Wiedergabe der hier noch nie gehörten Symphonie „Ruſtic Wedding" von Goldmark erwarb ſich Hr. Nikiſch ein beſonderes Verdienſt.

Hr. Richard Burmeiſter, Baltimore's beliebter Piano-Soliſt, erntete mit dem Vortrage des Liszt'ſchen Piano-Conzertes in A-Dur wohlverdienten Beifall. Das Tonwerk an ſich iſt reich an originellen Melodien und Verſchlingungen, Cello-Soli wechſeln mit den Piano-Vorträgen vortheilhaft ab. In den Solo-Cadenzen zeigte Hr. Burmeiſter ſeine ganze meiſterhafte Technik und Brillanz, und im Zuſammenſpiel mit dem Orcheſter ſeine künſtleriſche Auffaſſungsgabe, die mit der des Orcheſterdirigenten ſich zu verſchmelzen ſchien. Das Conzert erfordert einen Meiſter von vollendeter Technik und Auffaſſungsgabe, und Hr. Burmeiſter hat ſich ſeiner Aufgabe glänzend entledigt, wofür ihn auch ein dreimaliger Hervorruf belohnte. Als Geſangs-Soliſtin des Abends trat Frau Julie L. Wyman auf, die nur in franzöſiſcher Sprache ſang. Frau Wyman beſitzt eine wunderſchöne Altſtimme, die ſelbſt die höheren Lagen beherrſcht. In der Arie aus „Samſon und Delia" gewann ſie ſich die Zuhörer im Sturme; in den drei Liedern mit Klavierbegleitung von Delibes, Moſſenet und Ferrari, „Reue," „Gute Nacht," und „Eine Verlobte," bezauberte ſie das Publikum, das ſie mit wiederholten Hervorrufen auszeichnete. Wenn immer das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter hier ſein Erſcheinen macht, ſo darf es des dankbarſten und aufmerkſamſten Publikums verſichert ſein. Das nächſte Conzert findet am 17. März ſtatt.

[illegible]

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra—matchless among all the orchestras of the country—is in Brooklyn again this week, and it gave a splendid concert at the Academy of Music yesterday, that it will repeat at the same place to-night. It was the fourth in a series that is always too soon ended, and the programme was a blending of the magnificent and popular that should have satisfied everybody in the building, and probably did. The "Faust" overture of Wagner's—that colossal fragment of a work, the incompletion of which is one of the palpable losses to art—was the first number. If Mr. Nikisch put less fire into it than Mr. Seidl does he perhaps developed its intellectual side more fully, for this is not the fantastic Faust of Berlioz, nor the emotional Faust of Gounod, but the thinker, the thwarted questioner, and the impression of the work is that of vastness, typical of the problems that the metaphysician has foregone the hope of solving in the hope of death. The painting of the subject is in dark colors, though the incidental touches are vivid and beautiful, and the way in which the themes thunder up to the tragedy is overwhelming. The love episode is gracious, the will o' wisp light and playful and the conclusion expressive of the peace that ends the fever of inquiry and experience. Mrs. Nikisch was to have given four songs, but her continued illness compelled the substitution of Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who is well known in Boston and much liked there, for she sings smoothly, agreeably and with good taste. She introduced yesterday an air from Saint Saens' "Samson and Dalila," the suavity and grace of which were in contrast with the earnestness of the Wagner piece, and three of those piquant, dainty little bits that the French and Italians can write better than anybody else: the "Regrets" of Delibes, the "Good Night" of Massenet and "To a Fiancee" by Ferrari. These she gave so neatly and expressively that the orchestra applauded as heartily as anybody. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments for the three short numbers on the piano, and his execution was marked by the same deftness that he puts into his orchestral work, together with propriety of tone volume. Alwin Schroeder, the leading violoncello player of the band, delivered the solo in the concerto by Saint Saens, in A minor, that contains exhibitions of muscle and of skill, but that is of less artistic value than almost any other number on the programme. Some of its melody is beautiful and occasionally one hears a decorative passage that is agreeable, but, as it is nearly all decoration, with not much to decorate, less of it would suffice. Mr. Schroeder is a good player, remarkably agile of hand and arm, who develops a strong tone with little of the nasal quality usual to violoncellos and that is varied as well as resonant. He plays, too, with artistic quietude and composure. Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony is drawn on for its second and third movements, that are the most characteristic in the work and that are Russian enough, in all conscience. There are memories of folk song in the andantino, mingled with the delicate and the barbaric, but in the scherzo, which is unique in music, the Russian reveals himself a Tartar. One might even trace a Chinese origin for the Slavs in this piece, for who but a Russian, would have thought of playing a whole movement in a symphony with Chinese instrumentation. The scherzo is "picked" on the strings from end to end, with little dashes from other instruments and is carried at a rush that reveals the excellent drill of the strings. It is like the whirl of a mountain torrent that glooms through shadow and sparkles in sunshine in swift alternation; yet in spite of the joyous tempo the impression that it leaves is of something wild and dark. It takes the fancy and holds it with a kind of evil fascination, and one is whirled along upon it as in a Brocken dance, he knows not how and cares not whither. The "Heroic" symphony of Beethoven closes the programme, and the interpretation that it receives from Mr. Nikisch is almost the ideal. It is pure music if you wish to so regard it, and it is picturesque and suggestive music if you wish to bestow a literary quality on it. The rendering that it had yesterday was strong, manful, beautiful. The sorrow of the funeral march, that wonderful expression of grief, excelled only in artistic efficiency by the Siegfried death music, was as perfectly represented as the sport of the scherzo that directly followed, and that disclosed to special advantage the live, bright, pure, innocent, lucid quality of the strings, while the full majesty of Beethoven's thought was brought out in the finale. The contemporaneousness of Beethoven is felt and understood in every movement of the work, for he wrote for all time, and, therefore, for this time, just as Shakspeare and Emerson wrote for the world and for the ages in writing for their year and their townsmen. The next appearance of the orchestra here will be to-night, when the same bill is to be repeated, and the band will then remain absent until March 18.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1892.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Union Hall last night, was the best of the course thus far. The Beethoven quartet in G major, op. 18, was performed with marvelous effects of light and shade, with smoothness of tone and precision. The Mendelssohn concerto for piano and violoncello introduced Mme. Hopekirk as the pianist. It was very difficult but apparently offered no obstacles which Mme. Hopekirk could not overcome, for her technique is admirable. The Schubert quintet in C major, op. 163, was the best number on the programme. Some splendid effects were obtained in the Scherzo. The sixth concert will be given Monday evening, March 7.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SEVENTH SEASON—1891-92.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.	Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.	Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. HELEN HOPEKIRK and Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in G major, op, 18. Allegro.—Adagio cantabile.—Scherzo (Allegro Allegro molto, quasi presto.
MENDELSSOHN.	SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO.
SCHUBERT.	QUINTET in C major, op. 163. Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio.— Scherzo.—Finale (Allegretto)

Sixth Concert, Monday Evening, March 7th.

The postponed Fourth Concert, with Mme. FANNY BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER. Soloist, will be given at the close of the season.

The Piano used is a Knabe

Academy of Music, Fall River.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, AT 8, P. M.

SEASON 1891-92.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat. Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.— Larghetto.— Scherzo.— Allegro animato e grazioso
SAINT-SAENS.	ARIA. "O Love aid thou me in my weakness." from "Samson and Dalila."
SAINT-SAENS.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet d' Omphale."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	LAST MOVEMENT. (Theme with Variations) from SUITE, op. 55.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
DELIBES.	"REGRETS."
MASSENET.	"BONNE NUIT."
FERRARI.	"A UNE FIANCEE."
WAGNER.	PRELUDE. "Lohengrin."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Tannhæuser."

SOLOIST:

MRS. JULIE L. WYMAN.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

Stadt Baltimore.

Freitag, 12. Februar 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter. — Der große Conzertſaal der Muſik-Akademie an Nord-Howardſtr. war geſtern Abend wieder bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt von einem enthuſiaſtiſchen Auditorium, um dem vierten Conzerte des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſters zu lauſchen. Die Conzerte dieſes Orcheſters ſind in Baltimore ſehr populär geworden. Alle Muſikfreunde ſehen denſelben mit Spannung entgegen. Das Spiel dieſes Orcheſters iſt aber auch von einer Feinheit und Gediegenheit, welche den ſchärfſten Kritiker befriedigen muß. Unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten iſt es auf einer Höhe der Kunſt angekommen, die nur von wenigen anderen Orcheſtern erreicht wurde; wie könnte es aber auch anders ſein? Jeder Spieler iſt ein Künſtler auf ſeinem Inſtrumente, der die Schule des Zuſammenſpiels unter den früheren Dirigenten des Orcheſters, Henſchel und Gericke, und jetzt unter Nikiſch durchgemacht hat. Geſtern Abend gab ſich die Befriedigung des dankbaren Publikums in beſonders ſtürmiſchem Beifall kund.

Die „Freiſchütz"-Ouvertüre von C. M. von Weber, in der der deutſche Geiſt ſo recht ausgeprägt wird, wurde von dem Orcheſter in vollendeter Schönheit wiedergegeben. Der „Pilger-Marſch" aus der Symphonie „Harold in Italien", mit einem obligaten Bratſchen-Solo, vorgetragen von Hrn. Franz Kneiſel, bildete den Glanzpunkt des Abends. Der Marſch iſt nicht nur durch ſein ſtoiſches Tempo beſonders anziehend und packend, ſondern das Viola- oder Bratſchen-Solo verlieh ihm beſonderen Reiz und Eleganz. Es iſt dies eine der wenigen Compoſitionen, in denen dem untergeordneten Inſtrumente, der Viola, eine hervorragende Rolle zugetheilt iſt. Dieſelbe wurde auch von Hrn. Kneiſel mit Bravour wiedergegeben, wofür ſich das Publikum durch wiederholten Applaus erkenntlich zeigte. Größerer Applaus iſt wohl noch keinem Muſikſtücke in dem Conzertſaale geſpendet worden. Es zeigte ſich ſo recht deutlich, daß nicht die lärmende und geräuſchvolle, ſondern die gediegene Muſik den meiſten Anklang findet. Mit der Wiedergabe der hier noch nie gehörten Symphonie „Ruſtic Wedding" von Goldmark erwarb ſich Hr. Nikiſch ein beſonderes Verdienſt.

Hr. Richard Burmeiſter, Baltimore's beliebter Piano-Soliſt, erntete mit dem Vortrage des Liszt'ſchen Piano-Conzertes in A-Dur wohlverdienten Beifall. Das Tonwerk an ſich iſt reich an originellen Melodien und Verſchlingungen, Cello-Soli wechſeln mit den Piano-Vorträgen vortheilhaft ab. In den Solo-Cadenzen zeigte Hr. Burmeiſter ſeine ganze meiſterhafte Technik und Brillanz, und im Zuſammenſpiel mit dem Orcheſter ſeine künſtleriſche Auffaſſungsgabe, die mit der des Orcheſterdirigenten ſich zu verſchmelzen ſchien. Das Conzert erfordert einen Meiſter von vollendeter Technik und Auffaſſungsgabe, und Hr. Burmeiſter hat ſich ſeiner Aufgabe glänzend entledigt, wofür ihn auch ein dreimaliger Hervorruf belohnte. Als Geſangs-Soliſtin des Abends trat Frau Julie L. Wyman auf, die nur in franzöſiſcher Sprache ſang. Frau Wyman beſitzt eine wunderſchöne Altſtimme, die ſelbſt die höheren Lagen beherrſcht. In der Arie aus „Samſon und Delia" gewann ſie ſich die Zuhörer im Sturme; in den drei Liedern mit Klavierbegleitung von Delibes, Moſſenet und Ferrari, „Reue," „Gute Nacht," und „Eine Verlobte," bezauberte ſie das Publikum, das ſie mit wiederholten Hervorrufen auszeichnete. Wenn immer das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter hier ſein Erſcheinen macht, ſo darf es des dankbarſten und aufmerkſamſten Publikums verſichert ſein. Das nächſte Conzert findet am 17. März ſtatt.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra—matchless among all the orchestras of the country—is in Brooklyn again this week, and it gave a splendid concert at the Academy of Music yesterday, that it will repeat at the same place to-night. It was the fourth in a series that is always too soon ended, and the programme was a blending of the magnificent and popular that should have satisfied everybody in the building, and probably did. The "Faust" overture of Wagner's—that colossal fragment of a work, the incompletion of which is one of the palpable losses to art—was the first number. If Mr. Nikisch put less fire into it than Mr. Seidl does he perhaps developed its intellectual side more fully, for this is not the fantastic Faust of Berlioz, nor the emotional Faust of Gounod, but the thinker, the thwarted questioner, and the impression of the work is that of vastness, typical of the problems that the metaphysician has foregone the hope of solving in the hope of death. The painting of the subject is in dark colors, though the incidental touches are vivid and beautiful, and the way in which the themes thunder up to the tragedy is overwhelming. The love episode is gracious, the will o' wisp light and playful and the conclusion expressive of the peace that ends the fever of inquiry and experience. Mrs. Nikisch was to have given four songs, but her continued illness compelled the substitution of Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who is well known in Boston and much liked there, for she sings smoothly, agreeably and with good taste. She introduced yesterday an air from Saint Saens' "Samson and Dalila," the suavity and grace of which were in contrast with the earnestness of the Wagner piece, and three of those piquant, dainty little bits that the French and Italians can write better than anybody else: the "Regrets" of Delibes, the "Good Night" of Massenet and "To a Fiancee" by Ferrari. These she gave so neatly and expressively that the orchestra applauded as heartily as anybody. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments for the three short numbers on the piano, and his execution was marked by the same deftness that he puts into his orchestral work, together with propriety of tone volume. Alwin Schroeder, the leading violoncello player of the band, delivered the solo in the concerto by Saint Saens, in A minor, that contains exhibitions of muscle and of skill, but that is of less artistic value than almost any other number on the programme. Some of its melody is beautiful and occasionally one hears a decorative passage that is agreeable, but, as it is nearly all decoration, with not much to decorate, less of it would suffice. Mr. Schroeder is a good player, remarkably agile of hand and arm, who develops a strong tone with little of the nasal quality usual to violoncellos and that is varied as well as resonant. He plays, too, with artistic quietude and composure. Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony is drawn on for its second and third movements, that are the most characteristic in the work and that are Russian enough, in all conscience. There are memories of folk song in the andantino, mingled with the delicate and the barbaric, but in the scherzo, which is unique in music, the Russian reveals himself a Tartar. One might even trace a Chinese origin for the Slavs in this piece, for who but a Russian, would have thought of playing a whole movement in a symphony with Chinese instrumentation. The scherzo is "picked" on the strings from end to end, with little dashes from other instruments and is carried at a rush that reveals the excellent drill of the strings. It is like the whirl of a mountain torrent that glooms through shadow and sparkles in sunshine in swift alternation; yet in spite of the joyous tempo the impression that it leaves is of something wild and dark. It takes the fancy and holds it with a kind of evil fascination, and one is whirled along upon it as in a Brocken dance, he knows not how and cares not whither. The "Heroic" symphony of Beethoven closes the programme, and the interpretation that it receives from Mr. Nikisch is almost the ideal. It is pure music if you wish to so regard it, and it is picturesque and suggestive music if you wish to bestow a literary quality on it. The rendering that it had yesterday was strong, manful, beautiful. The sorrow of the funeral march, that wonderful expression of grief, excelled only in artistic efficiency by the Siegfried death music, was as perfectly represented as the sport of the scherzo that directly followed, and that disclosed to special advantage the live, bright, pure, innocent, lucid quality of the strings, while the full majesty of Beethoven's thought was brought out in the finale. The contemporaneousness of Beethoven is felt and understood in every movement of the work, for he wrote for all time, and, therefore, for this time, just as Shakspeare and Emerson wrote for the world and for the ages in writing for their year and their townsmen. The next appearance of the orchestra here will be to-night, when the same bill is to be repeated, and the band will then remain absent until March 18.

Boston Post

MOTTO:

With a Mission

—AND—

Without a Muzzle.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1892.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Union Hall last night, was the best of the course thus far. The Beethoven quartet in G major, op. 18, was performed with marvelous effects of light and shade, with smoothness of tone and precision. The Mendelssohn concerto for piano and violoncello introduced Mme. Hopekirk as the pianist. [illegible] was very difficult but apparently offered no obstacles which Mme. Hopekirk could not overcome, for her technique is admirable. The Schubert quintet in C major, op. 163, was the best number on the programme. Some splendid effects were obtained in the Scherzo. The sixth concert will be given Monday evening, March 7.

Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 16.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet gave their fifth concert last evening at Union Hall before a large and fashionable audience. The first number of the concert was Beethoven's quartet in G major, opus 18, consisting of the allegro—adagio cantabile; scherzo (allegro) and allegro molto, in which Messrs. Kneisel, Rorh, Srecenski and Schroeder took part.

Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello made up the second number. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk presided at the piano, and Mr. Schroeder assisted with the 'cello, a decided feature of the evening, which was warmly applauded.

The third and last number was made up of that ever delightful quintet in C major, opus 163, Mr. Leo Schulz's 'cello being added to complete the quintet. It comprised an allegro ma non troppo, adagio; scherzo and finale (allegretto).

The sixth concert will take place in the same hall Monday evening, March 7.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1892.

Union Hall: Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave its fifth concert in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in G major, op. 18, No. 2.
Mendelssohn: Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello.
Schubert: Quintet in C major, op. 163.

The feeling of quasi-boredom that comes over one on seeing one of the Lobkowitz quartets announced on a programme is more than compensated for by the pure contentment and delight with which one listens to the music when the performance has once begun. The case-hardened concert-goer may feel a little sceptical about his power of enjoying one of these quartets for the thousand-and-first time; but the experiment shames his little faith. The one in G given last evening—which, from the frequent unison and octave passages it contains might be called the "quartet in octaves" —is surely a thing of beauty that might well be a joy forever. It was admirably played, and enthusiastically received by the audience.

The Mendelssohn sonata for pianoforte and 'cello makes one think once more of a phase of Mendelssohn's classicism which we are all too liable to forget nowadays. Even those of us who have taken and well digested the significance of Bülow's dictum that "Mendelssohn is to be recognized as the most complete master of musical form since Mozart," have to be reminded from time to time that this is not the only side of his classicism. There is another, almost equally remarkable one: his fine instinct for making all instruments speak strictly in accordance with their own nature, his never forcing an instrument beyond the boundaries of its own native domain. Today, when virtuosi and composers aid and abet each other in "extending the field" of every possible instrument, from the pianoforte to the cymbals, this fine and intrinsically classical instinct is growing more and more uncommon. It were hard to find a more splendid example of it than this sonata of Mendelssohn's. Apart from the melodic invention, purely organic development, and beauty of form there is to be found in it, what an admirable, thrice admirable, piece of pure pianoforte and 'cello writing it is! How each instrument is always made to say just what it can say best! It were well for our modern instrumental conjurers to see to it that this sort of thing do not become entirely a lost art. The sonata was splendidly played by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder; there is no new praise to be heaped upon Mr. Schroeder either for his solo or quartet playing; but we had never heard Mrs. Hopekirk do any concerted playing before, and her performance last evening was such as to place her very high in the ranks of concerted players.

Schubert's C major quintet is written for a selection of instruments uncommon both in his day and since, but by no means new in the history of chamber music for strings; for two violins, viola, and two 'celli. The two-'celli scheme was habitual with Boccherini, one of the earliest writers in this form. But Boccherini's purpose was different from Schubert's; he was a brilliant 'cellist, and meant the first 'cello part in his quintets for himself, making it as prominent and elaborate as possible; some of his quintet movements are really nothing but 'cello solos with quartet accompaniment. Schubert's object in using two 'celli was evidently to get a stronger and deeper bass from the second 'cello than could be got from a second viola, while the first 'cello played prominent melodic phrases, or doubled the first violin in the lower octave.

This C major quintet shows Schubert in his most Hellenic ideal mood. Doubtless the development of each one of the four movements is excessive; as is too often the case with Schubert, the whole thing is overgrown. But, long as it is, it is a "heavenly length." And what an original idea that profound, almost tragic, Trio is, in the midst of the hearty, rustic joviality of the Scherzo! The whole work was admirably played and thoroughly enjoyed.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB 16, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The Kneisel Quartette gave the fifth concert in their series at Union Hall, last evening, with the assistance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist, and M. Leo Schulz, 'cellist. The following programme was presented: Quartette in G major, op. 18, Beethoven; sonata for piano and 'cello, Mendelssohn; quintette in C major, op. 163, Schubert. The Beethoven quartette was well rendered, the ensemble attack and shading being wellnigh perfect, while the interpretation was artistic and in perfect sympathy with the character of the music.

The Mendelssohn sonata for piano and 'cello was finely rendered and was heartily applauded. Mme. Hopekirk has played too often and is too well known in Boston to call for extended comment here. Suffice it to say that she fully upheld her reputation in last evening's performance. The beautiful Schubert Quintette was rendered in a manner that was thoroughly [illegible] every one away [illegible] The sixth concert [illegible] March 7. [illegible] with Mme. [illegible] will be [illegible]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, [illegible]

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth concert of the series '91-'92 in Union Hall last evening. Mrs. Hopekirk was the pianist, and Mr. Leo Schulz took the second 'cello part in the quintette. The programme was as follows: Beethoven's quartette, G, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for 'cello and pianoforte; Schubert's quintette, C, op. 163.

There have been many fables told about the origin of the first set of Beethoven quartettes and the reception of the six by the critics and the public. It is generally said that they were written in 1800, the year before publication, but Thayer has shown that they were, in all probability, composed at intervals during the five years preceding their appearance, and played in private circles that Beethoven might judge of them. To gain a more intimate knowledge of the violin, he studied that instrument under Krumpholz; and about the end of 1799 he carefully revised his written work, rejecting and adding. After the quartettes were published, a friend told him that only the second (the one played last evening) and the fourth met with public approval. Beethoven's answer was vigorous and terribly coarse. The unfavorable reviews that are said to have appeared in the Leipzig music journal were written about the quartettes of another man and the only notice taken of Beethoven's set was by a correspondent who described them as excellent; "but they should be often played, as they are very difficult and in no sense popular music."

Schubert wrote his great string quintette in 1828, the year of his death. It is regarded by many as the finest piece of his chamber music, and the German critics have almost exhausted the language of praise, finding in it, according to their wont, all manner of things: "Stars," and "sombre woods" and "the dark shadow of death." Hanslick, on the contrary, calls it the summing up of the strength and weakness shown by Schubert in his instrumental compositions. The learned thus disagree; but the concert-goer who is charmed by spontaneous and beautiful melody and by rich harmonies listens with delight. To him the scherzo is not weak, nor is the finale too light.

The playing of the members of the quartette was characterized last evening by the many artistic qualities that make their ensemble work so famous, and the sonata by Mendelssohn was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 47.

TUESDAY, FEB. 16, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the season's programmes by the Kneisel quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, the works performed being Beethoven's quartet, G major, op. 18; Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello; and Schubert's quintet, C major, op. 163. Mme. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Schroeder did excellent work in the piano and 'cello sonata, winning a ready recognition of their artistic interpretation of the composition. Mr. Kneisel and his associates had the assistance of Mr. Schulz as the second 'cello of the quintet, and in both their ensemble numbers the good record of the quartet was fully maintained.

Clipping from Telegram
New York City
Date 2/13

With the exception of the concert of the Boston Symphony Society, under the direction of Mr. Nickish, at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening, the last week has been distinguished for musicales and chamber concerts, of which there have been several good ones and one very dull one; the latter being the Hubbard song recital at "Chamber Music" Hall. The Nickish programme was purely orchestral, and tested the patience of one of the largest audiences ever gathered in Chickering Hall, that seemed to be charmed with every number rendered. It is rarely that a symphony concert is given without a soloist, but in this instance, although the selections were of the most severely classic type and one would think a vocal number might have been hailed as a pleasant relief to what, with any other orchestra, would have been a tiresome succession of instrumental numbers, such was not the case. Long as the programme was, several numbers were redemanded. The first number was the old fashioned concerto for strings, by Handel, given with a delicacy and nicety of detail unsurpassed. It is safe to say that no such splendid orchestral playing has ever been heard in this city. This composition, as rendered under Mr. Nickish's direction, was a novelty, and indeed the whole programme was of a rare character. The "Harold in Italy" symphony, by Berlioz, one of the most difficult and scholarly of compositions, was played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it. Mr. Nickish deserves great credit for producing this symphony, which is rarely given.

* * *

The Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, the charming mezzo soprano, gave their last concert of the season at Music Hall on Friday evening. The programme was an excellent one, including Beethoven's G major quartet of 18, op. 2; Schubert's lovely variations in G minor; and Beethoven's E flat quartet. Mrs. Wyman sang delightfully several songs by Wekerlin, Delibes and Chaminade.

* * *

THE FOURTH REHEARSAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The fourth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Friday afternoon at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, in the presence of a large though not crowded audience.

For once the Academy was chilly and the audience hard to enthuse. The programme included the following: Wagner, A "Faust" overture; Mozart, (a) Page's Canzenetta, (b) Page's Aria, from the "Marriage of Figaro;" Saint-Saens, concert for violoncello in A minor, Tschaikowsky, andante, and sherzo, second and third movements from Symphony No. 4, in F minor; songs with piano; (a) Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" (b) Gensen, "Am Manzanares;" (c) Brahms, "Vergebeliches Staendchen;" Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Heroic;" Allegro con bria, Adagio assai (marcia funebre), Sherzo (allegro vivace); finale; soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Alvin Schroeder. Much curiosity had been excited in the city by the announcement of the appearance of the wife of the famous director as a vocal soloist, and when that lady stepped to the front, richly though plainly clothed, modest and almost shy in demeanor, but pretty beyond a peradventure, some disappointment was felt because of her avoidance of showy stage habiliments, but as soon as she commenced to sing every musician present recognized at once that she was an artist as well as a lady, lacking, perhaps, in emotion, scarcely aggressive and demonstrative enough, but an undeniably capable singer, correct in intonation and faultless in phrasing; a little cold, like the day and the audience, but pleasant to listen to. When Mr. Schroeder left his place among the violincellos to play his difficult solo, one could tell by the configuration of his head, which bears a striking resemblance to the Chandos portrait of Shakespeare, that good work would be heard, nor were they disappointed. Mr. Schroeder is not a phenomenal executant, though he is eminently a legitimate and conscientious performer, deft in his execution, broad and expressive in tone, thoughtful and picturesque in his phrasing; he was warmly applaueed.

The principal orchestral number was the "Heroic" Symphony No. 3 by Beethoven on which the great tone poet spent years of incessant labor, embodying in it the ripened experience of a long, eventful and useful life, and surely a more ample and satisfactory display of this masterpiece could scarcely be desired. It was almost as superb in its execution as in its conception.

The second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, were simply perfect in both conception and execution, and in Wagner's "A Faust Overture" the orchestra was equally at home. This "Faust" is a complicated study by the most complicated of all writers and requires to be heard at least a dozen times in order to be understood.

It presents so many ever varying aspects that to the intelligent mind new beauties and new sources of admiration are ever discoverable. It required Wagner to paint this beautiful, though illusory picture, a many sided man, a poet, a musician, philosopher and artist, and all that belongs to the grand creation of Goethe is utilized with that critical care and skill only shown in minds of vast capacity; pleasing it certainly is not, but vivid, life-like and true to nature it is, and must be so considered by those who will make the necessary sacrifices of time and prejudice to correctly gauge its merits.

Feb 2/13
Commercial
Buffalo

—More than one European musician traveling in this country has taken occasion to speak in most emphatic terms of praise of the now famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and its accomplished conductor Mr. Nikisch, and now read what Paderewski said after playing with the Symphony Orchestra at the recent concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. He said: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but, as a whole, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands above it. It is fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

GLOBE, Fall River, Mass.

te 2/12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Good seats are scarce at Talbot's for Tuesday's concert. People are apt to be altogether too apathetic when a really first class musical entertainment is offered them, an occurrence rather rare. Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Symphony Orchestra has done more than almost all other out of town managers together to offer the public first class music; and the public seem to be awakening to that fact.

Any one now who desires to purchase two orchestra chairs, back of section C, will find it an absolute impossibility and from the rapidity of the sale it looks as though the balance of the house would be in about the same condition before Tuesday night. If you want to hear one of the greatest and best orchestras in the world, in one of their choicest programmes get your seats now. Those who cannot afford the best seats can hear this great concert in the gallery just as well, and at a price as low as they pay for third rate minstrel shows.

Date

PHILHARMONIC REHEARSAL.

A Fine Programme Given at the Academy of Music.

The fourth rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. Though the programme was a rich one, the attendance was slim, and the audience rather cold. Women are decidedly in the majority at the rehearsals, and when the high teas just before Lent are in progress, a decided falling off in the attendance is perceptible. Those who were fortunate enough to be at the rehearsal, however, heard a very fine concert. The soloists announced were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra. Owing to a severe cold, however, Mrs. Nikisch was unable to appear, and Mrs. Julia L. Wyman sang in her place. This necessitated a change in the programme, and the aria, "Oh, Love, Aid Thou Me in My Weakness," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," was substituted for the selections originally chosen from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Three French songs—"Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet, and "A une Fiancee," by Ferrari—were put on in place of the three German songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms, chosen by Mrs. Nikisch.

The concert opened with Wagner's "Faust Overture." This work, not as well-known as it ought to be, is overflowing with rich coloring, and was intended to form the first movement to a "Faust" symphony. One not aware of this latter fact, is apt to suppose that the whole idea of "Faust" is contained in this single so-called overture. The first part explains itself sufficiently as portraying the meditations of "Faust" alone, but in the latter half occur several tender passages, which are often supposed to refer to Gretchen. This, however, is said not to have been the composer's idea, except as these passages happen to express in a general way the loneliness and longing of "Faust." It is a pity that the title Wagner gives the piece in a letter to Liszt, that of "Faust in Solitude," has not been retained. Mr. Nikisch gave a broad and masterly rendering of it.

Mrs. Wyman, a popular singer, with a well-placed, sweet mezzo-soprano voice, sang the Saint-Saens aria faultlessly enough, but with very little dramatic effect. Her interpretation might almost have been called monotonous. The three little French songs were delightfully accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch, who in assuming the task, followed the popular example of Mr. Seidl. Mrs. Wyman's singing of these songs was excellent. She was refined and sympathetic. The songs by Massenet and Ferrari, are gems of their kind.

Mr. Schroeder's fine rendering of the Saint-Saens' violoncello concerto in A minor was heard attentively. The work is, of course, a "show-piece," like many concertos, but it is unusually rich in attractive themes. Some exquisite alternating passages between the violins and the soloist were remarked in the course of its development, and a delicate sort of perpetual motion movement in one part rather suggested the movement of the "Rouet d'Omphale," by the same composer.

The second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony were full of the plaintive minor motives so often found in the Russian's music. The andantino is perhaps the more interesting of the two movements, though the scherzo pleased the audience. The concert closed with the always-wonderful "Heroic" symphony of Beethoven. It is doubtful if Brooklyn has ever heard a finer rendering of it than Mr. Nikisch gave yesterday. In itself it is so inexhaustible that each new hearing is a surprise. When it is interpreted by a splendidly-equipped orchestra, under the leadership of an able and reverent conductor, one listens with absorbed enjoyment, only to sigh when the end is reached. When the rendering of all the movements is admirable, it is hard to select any one for commendation. Probably, out of four persons, no two would agree upon the same movement. The writer found the handling of the funeral march unusually satisfactory, and was delighted with the massive breadth and fine contrasts of the last movement. The programme was, as usual, supplemented by interesting notes upon the selections, including a translation of Wagner's estimate of the symphony, from his "Programmatische Erläuterungen."

The entire programme will be repeated this evening, commencing at 8:15, instead of [illegible] as formerly.

Feb 14
Brooklyn
Eagle 2/14

Those delightful artists, the Henschels, will begin their American tour on March 15, under direction of Charles A. Ellis, who is likewise managing the Boston symphony orchestra, the Kneisel quartet, Eugen D'Albert and Mrs. Nordica. The first appearance this season of Mr. D'Albert will be made on the 11th of March. It is noticed in the circulars that Mr. D'Albert is called Herr, though he was born in Glasgow and his father was an alleged Frenchman and it is said that his real name is Jones. But he can play on the piano, so what does it matter.

J. N. Pattison was one of the best known of concert pianists in the country fifteen years ago and he wrote operatic fantasias and waltz songs that were popular everywhere, beside a "Niagara" symphony that never was popular because it never was played. Recently, however, he composed a "Patti Waltz Song" and dedicated it to Patti, who is alleged to have been so pleased with it that she is alleged to have given an alleged diamond of large size and much brilliancy to the composer. Such conduct is most unusual with Patti.

[128]

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 16.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet gave their fifth concert last evening at Union Hall before a large and fashionable audience. The first number of the concert was Beethoven's quartet in G major, opus 18, consisting of the allegro—adagio cantabile; scherzo (allegro) and allegro molto, in which Messrs. Kneisel, Rorb, Srecenski and Schroeder took part.

Mendelssohn's sonata for piano and violoncello made up the second number. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk presided at the piano, and Mr. Schroeder assisted with the 'cello, a decided feature of the evening, which was warmly applauded.

The third and last number was made up of that ever delightful quintet in C major, opus 163, Mr. Leo Schulz's 'cello being added to complete the quintet. It comprised an allegro ma non troppo, adagio; scherzo and finale (allegretto).

The sixth concert will take place in the same hall Monday evening, March 7.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1892.

Union Hall: Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave its fifth concert in Union Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in G major, op. 18, No. 2.
